

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Harvard's Elm-Trees.*

BY CHARLES T. BROOKS.

Ah! whither, when they vanished, flew
Those four fair years we journeyed through,
From '28 to '32,

Beneath old Harvard's elm-trees!

From '28 to '32

How sweetly beamed the noon-day blue,
How sweetly Summer moons looked through Old Harvard's ancient elm-trees!

From '28 to '32

A band of brothers, fond and true,
What thrills of hope and joy we knew
Under old Harvard's elm-trees!

From '28 to '32

Morn gleamed upon Castalian dew
As merry college birds, we flew
Beneath old Harvard's elm-trees!

And when the glow of evening threw
Around the scene each magic hue,
How sweet the twilight rendezvous
Beneath old Harvard's elm-trees!

From '28 to '32,

Ah! hopes were high and fears were few,
As boyhood into manhood grew
Beneath old Harvard's elm-trees!

Then soft life's picture fancy drew,
And called our spell-bound eyes to view,
Through her enchanted avenue
From under Harvard's elm-trees!

Ere yet the sober truth we knew,
Or envious fate the signal blew,
That sent a wintry shiver through
The leaves of Harvard's elm-trees.

And each live stem a mast-head grew Whence all the pennons seaward flew,
That summoned us to bid adieu
To Harvard's dear old elm-trees.

Ah! moments, months, too fast ye flew,
From '28 to '32;
Yet still our hearts past hours renew
Beneath old Harvard's elm-trees.

Shades of the dead! once more with you
We live departed moments through,
And heavenly words we listen to
Beneath old Harvard's elm-trees!

Oh, when I sink, as all must do,
Above me plant no funeral yew;
Down on my rest let stars look through Fair Harvard's dear old elm-trees!

Companions dear of '32!
When God in mercy leads us through
The shining gates—to me and you
Were heaven quite heaven without the view
Of Harvard's dear old elm-trees!

Mr. Costa's Naaman.

[From The London Times, August, 1864.]

It is nine years since Mr. Costa produced his Eli. How it was received by the people of Birmingham at the Festival of 1855, how variously its claims were discussed—some extolling it as a masterpiece, others denying it any particular right to consideration, others—by far the greatest number—weighing its deserts with its shortcomings, and calmly adjudging it an honorable place among modern compositions of its class, are matters of history. The conclusion arrived at by impartial lookers-on must have been that Eli was decidedly a work of merit, and, for a first creation of even remarkable merit. The mere facts, however, of its having lived these nine years, of its still being occasionally performed, and of several pieces having made their way into the concert-room, where they obtain unanimous acceptance, are enough to account for the very general interest felt in a new work of the same kind, from the same pen, written expressly for and about to be given at the same festival. How many oratorios since Mendelssohn's Elijah (1846)—nay, since Mendelssohn's St. Paul (1836)—have survived three years? It would be invidious to signalize by name the many that have not; while those that have might be specified by a few strokes of the pen. One or two by Spohr, one or two by Ferdinand Hiller, and one, which, though it may not have been heard in England since the Norwich Festival of 1860, has at least been heard in Germany, and is assuredly fashioned of lasting materials—Herr Molique's Abraham—and all are counted. An oratorio, like an epic poem, is a big matter; and as a dull epic, laboriously as it may be built up, is unendurable, scarcely less so, with all the attractive compensation of voices and instruments, is a dull oratorio. Now, Eli, without offering any pretensions to be called a great oratorio, is certainly not a dull one; and for this reason, if for no other, being endurable, it has endured and is likely to endure. A further experience of nine years has not only afforded the composer of Eli an opportunity of putting his own house in order, but of visiting the mansions of the illustrious dead—not only of judging himself severely, but of chastening and maturing his style by the example of those imperishable models of which it is his fortunate privilege so frequently to superintend the public performance. How far Mr. Costa may have profited by these advantages his second oratorio, Naaman, written expressly for the Birmingham Festival, which takes place a short time hence, will show. Meanwhile, though it would be out of order to attempt influencing public opinion beforehand through the medium of any purely critical remarks, a brief outline of the plan of the new work, with reference both to the lyrical and musical treatment of the subject upon which it is founded, may not be unacceptable.

The book of Naaman is by Mr. W. Bartholomew, who also constructed that of Eli, and, as all the musical world is well aware, had the distinguished honor of being Mendelssohn's lyrical associate in preparing the English version of Elias (Elijah). The materials to which Mr. Bartholomew has had recourse are found in the 2nd, 4th, and 5th chapter of the Second Book of Kings. He has adopted the text of Scripture where convenient, elsewhere abridged, modified, or paraphrased it, and, elsewhere, where amplification of the sentiment or situation is required, substituted words of his own. The oratorio (like Eli) is divided into scenes. The first scene, by the river Jordan, comprises the translation of Elijah and the miracle of dividing the waters. Here, though Elijah is talked of, he is not permitted to speak—a precaution due probably rather to Mr. Costa's unwillingness to tread on perilous ground, than to the reticence of his poet, who, by omission of all allusion to the last impressive dialogue between Elijah and Elisha (2nd Kings, chap. 2-9, 10), incurs the risk of becoming a little obscure. Mr. Bartholomew, nevertheless, has surmounted the difficulty with tolerable success. The Sons of the Prophets, as in the sacred narrative, alternately witness the crossing of the Jordan by the two Prophets in company; their final interview; the translation of Elijah in the fiery chariot; and the return of Elisha with Elijah's mantle, which enables him to repeat the miracle of dividing the waters, and thereby show that he is Elijah's appointed successor. The music connects the incidents of this scene together in a form that may lay claim to originality. The declamatory recitatives of the two chief personages, the detached phrases of melody, sometimes rhythmically worked out, sometimes in plain recitative, through which the Sons of the Prophets describe the impression produced upon them by the miracles of which they are privileged beholders, and the chorus, "Hail, master, Hail," occupying the place of coda, are knit together by a series of orchestral movements taking their tone from the various incidents as they occur. We have thus a well-constructed whole, which by its elaborate orchestral coloring makes up for the absence of an instrumental overture, and fulfils at the same time the conditions of what is formally termed an "introduction." A point, apart from criticism, may at once be cited in Mr. Costa's favor—namely, the studied avoidance of all possible resemblance to Mendelssohn's great work, in a scene of which, though his lips are sealed, Elijah is certainly the conspicuous figure.

The next situation embodies the miracle of the widow's oil being multiplied by Elisha from one pot into many full vessels, that her creditor may be satisfied, and her two sons rescued from bondage. The music comprises dialogue-recitative (accompanied) for the widow and Elisha; an air, "Arise, O Lord! O God lift up thine hand!" in which the Prophet solicits Divine intermission on behalf of the suffering poor—with choral sequel, "The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked" (sung, it may be presumed, by the Sons of the Prophets); a duet, "I sought the Lord, and He heard me," in which the Prophet and the widow pour out their thanksgivings; and a chorale, "When famine over Israel prevailed," deducting, after the manner of Chorus, in the Greek plays, general laws from individual occurrences—an expedient which, originating in John Sebastian Bach, has always been prominent in German oratorio, and was especially acceptable to Mendelssohn—witness his Paul, his Lobgesang, and his Elijah. Mr. Costa may be credited, en passant, with using it judiciously,—that is to say, sparingly, and not, as is too frequently the habit of modern composers (as also with choral recitative, by the way), running it to death.

The scene following is built upon the same incident as that which immediately succeeds the multiplying of the widow's oil in the Bible—namely, the promise of a son to the good woman of Shunam, who has given food and shelter to the Prophet. The music here consists of dialogue-recitative, with a trio, "Is anything too hard for God the Lord?"—for, Elisha, the Shunamite, and Elisha's servant, Gebazi—in which the previously incredulous woman declares her confidence in the promised blessing, and her faith in God's omnipotence. The Biblical sequel to this narrative (the death of the child, and the miracle of its restoration) is postponed to the second part of the oratorio, to make way, doubtless, for what the Germans call the "Tütelrolle"—that is for Naaman, the Syrian, whose tardy apparition looks somewhat paradoxical. Up to this point, indeed (if not subsequently), the oratorio of Naaman might be called Elisha with just as much propriety as Elijah is called Elijah. In the next scene, however, the invincible captain, instrument of the Lord in the deliverance of Syria, returns victorious to Damascus. A grand triumphal military march heralds and accompanies his arrival, the Syrian people the while celebrating the deeds of Naaman and Benhadad, the King, in a chorus—"With sheathed swords and bows unstrung"—uttered simultaneously with the march. The wife of Naaman, whom Mr. Bartholomew calls Timna, joins in the exultant strain, and, with her maidens, echoes the praises of her valiant husband, the whole terminating with a new theme, "Naaman, thy deeds of glory," which also acts as coda to the march. Timna then approaches her hero with signs of conjugal affection; but Naaman rejects them on account of his affliction, which he attributes to the "gods of Syria's foes;" and this, in dialogue-recitative, is followed by an air, "Invoking death to end my woes"—the warrior relating how, in the midst of battle, he had hoped to find delivery, but in vain, his arms being everywhere successful. The martial character of the first part of this air is contrasted with the pathetic tone of the last, where Naaman, the conqueror, mourns for the slain, and, maddened by his own sufferings, proclaims his weariness of life. In a tuneful chorus—"Be comforted!"—Timna and the people promise to offer sacrifice to Rimmon and the Gods of Syria, who have shielded Naaman in the fight and will heal him of his leprosy. The scene following—the house of Naaman—introduces us to Adah, the little maid, who, a captive from the Israelites, attends on Naaman's wife. Adah, in a recitative and air, "They shall be turned back," declares her abhorrence of idolatry and her faith in the true God, whom she petitions for strength to convert the heathen in His name. From Naaman's house we are transported to the Temple of Rimmon, where, in a long and characteristic chorus, homage is paid by the Syrians to their idol, and prayer is offered up for Benhadad's leprous chief. Returning to the warrior's abode, however, we find the appeal to the false god has been impotent. Naaman lies stretched upon a bed of pain, tended by his wife and Adah. An orchestral prelude, in tones of befitting poignancy, suggests the intensity of his torments, while Adah, in a short prayer, "Remove Thy stroke away from him, O God," intercedes for her heathen master; when Naaman, suddenly awakening from a troubled dream, informs them that he has seen a bald man, staff in hand, clad in a mantle, girt with a leathern girdle, who bade him "Go in peace." Adah thereupon advises him to seek the aid of Elisha, the Prophet, whose miracles she recounts, and the omnipotence of whose God she glorifies. Half convinced by her unstudied eloquence, Naaman consents to go to Elisha at Samaria. This is given in dialogue-recitative, eventually culminating in a trio for Adah, Timna, and Naaman—"Haste, to Samaria let us go"—the argument of which may be guessed without explanation. How much of the foregoing belongs to Scripture and how much is the invention of Mr. Bartholomew, a glance at chap. v. of the Second Book of Kings, in which the whole historical account of Naaman is compressed, will suffice to show. But leaving Naaman and his consolars, on their journey to Samaria, we come to another episode in the prophetic career of Elisha—that of the healing of the waters, which in the Biblical narrative directly follows the appointment of Elisha as Elijah's successor—Elisha's second miracle, in fact, his first being the dividing of the Jordan. Upon this is built what may be termed the "finale" to the first part. The incident—despite many amplifications, perhaps necessary to its effective lyrical treatment—is related with Biblical exactness; and although Naumann has nothing to do with it, the composer is afforded an opportunity of enriching the personage of Elisha with a devotionally characteristic air:—

"The seed shall be prosperous
The vine shall give her fruit;"

and of ending the first part of his work with a grand chorus of thanksgiving, in which he is enabled to exhibit his familiarity with the technical resources of his art under a more comprehensive and varied aspect than perhaps anywhere else.

The Second Part opens with the sequel to the story of the good Shunamite and the miracle of her son's reanimation. This is one of the longest, most carefully worked out and most impressive scenes in the oratorio. The scriptural version is pretty closely followed, with such innovations and additions only as are at once consistent and dramatic—for Naaman, it will be readily understood, like the majority of what are styled "oratorios," is neither more nor less than a sacred drama founded upon certain historical passages in Holy Writ. The scene is the abode of the heart-stricken Shunamite, who after mourning over her dead child in an appropriately pathetic air—"Look up, my son"—resolves to seek the man of God at Mount Carmel. She is encouraged by angels.

"God, who cannot be unjust, Heedeth all on Him that trust," &c.

Elisha comforts her, in an air—"Lament not thus,"—and promises that, if she be resigned, her son shall be restored to her. The staff of the Prophet, laid upon the face of the child by Gehazi, producing no effect, Elisha reproaches his servant with want of heart. A "Sanctus" of angels, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of might!"—the music of which is elaborately worked out—enhancing the solemnity of the situation, Elisha arrives at the house of the Shunamite, whose son lies dead, and invokes the Almighty in prayer, the child during the progress of his invocation being restored to life. The last part of the invocation—"The flesh is waxing warm," &c.—is accompanied by orchestral music, the design of which is to suggest the gradual steps by which the miraculous resuscitation is accomplished; the newly awakened child, in an air—"I dreamt I was in Heaven"—describes a vision of the "Cherubim and Seraphim;" and the scene terminates with another grand chorus of thanksgiving—"Thanks, grateful thanks, Almighty Lord."

Naumann now again appears, approaching the residence of Elisha, attended by his family and retinue, to the strains of an instrumental march. Gehazi explaining (in recitative) that he is to wash seven times in the Jordan, Naaman, indignant, replies (in an air, "What meaneth he?") that the Syrian rivers, Abana and Pharpar, are as pure or purer than any in Israel; and resolves to return to his own country. Once, more, however, persuaded by Adah, he consents to perform the ablutions, proceeding to the banks of the sacred river, accompanied by the strains of the same march which was heard on his arrival, and which gradually dies away into piu mosso as he retreats. In the scene following, Elisha and the sons of the Prophets are beside Jordan, to witness the cure by ablution; Adah (for Mr. Bartholomew has made an uncommonly important personage of the little captive maid) offers up a prayer—"Maker of every star," &c.—that the miracle may be accomplished; and its ultimate accomplishment, after the seventh ablution, is hailed by an exultant chorus of the people, leading to a quartet—"Honor and glory, Almighty, be Thine"—in which Adah, Naaman, Naaman's wife (Timna), and the Prophet Elisha exalt God for His divine mercy and wondrous deeds. Naaman then, vainly pressing a guerdon (a "blessing") on Elisha—whom he recognizes as the bald man who, in his dream, had bade him "go in peace"—declares his thorough conversion, blessing the name of "the Lord God, the God of Israel;" and the oratorio concludes with a quintet, grand chorus—"Great God of gods"—and jubilant "Hallelujah."

What may be the effect of the new oratorio remains to be proved; but a tolerably clear notion of the materials out of which it is constructed may be gathered from the foregoing. The music must decide. Meanwhile, the composer could hardly bring out his work under more auspicious circumstances. Such an orchestra and chorus as are usually assembled at the Birmingham Festival are to be heard nowhere else in Europe; while the distribution of the solo parts is strong almost without precedent. Naaman (first tenor) devolves upon Mr. Sims Reeves; Gehazi (second tenor) upon Mr. Cummings; Elisha (bass) upon Mr. Santley; the Child (first contralto) upon Mme. Sainton-Dolby; Timna (second contralto) upon Miss Palmer; the Shunamite woman (second soprano) upon Mme. Rudersdorff; and Adah (first soprano) upon Mlle. Adelina Patti. Then, of course, Mr. Costa conducts the performance of his own work; and with what zeal he will be supported by his orchestra, choral and instrumental, may readily be imagined.

The Italian Language: Its Evil Influence upon Music.

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

I have elsewhere said what I am now about to say, and I will repeat it again and again in private, and in public when and wherever I may find opportunity: for I cannot hope that the protest of one feeble individual—nay, that the conviction of one generation—may be able to uproot an evil whose growth has been unchecked and even fostered for more than a century and a half. The Italian language has been, and is, a most baneful influence to music, affecting its production, its performance, and its effect.

The repetition of this manifest truth would be vain were there not still unadduced facts and arguments to support it. First among these may be cited the notable case of Handel's operas. These are cast in a form that limited the workings of the mighty genius of the master, and allowed no play to its higher attributes. Entirely without choruses—for the simple pieces of four-part harmony with which some of them conclude are scarcely to be classed under this definition in its general acceptance—his operas presented no field for the exercise of his boundless contrapuntal resources, by whose means, and by his almost unique power of choral distribution, he wrought the gigantic effects for which he is pre-eminent, and by which, more than by anything else, he is rendered immortal. Consisting exclusively, or very nearly so, of airs that embody no dramatic action, and in many instances constructed with the object rather of executive display than of poetical expression, his operas gave the rarest opportunity for that wonderful power of characterization, and that unsurpassable felicity of verbal declamation which particularly make his personages and the words they utter to live before the hearer. Based upon subjects that are entirely unsympathetic to our times, and constructed upon principles that are totally uncongenial to our stage, his operas will never, and can never, be performed again; the revival, as an antiquarian curiosity, of Giulio Cesare, in 1787, was, and will be, the last occasion of the complete representation of any one of them, and a large mass of the labors of one of the greatest, and, perhaps, the very grandest of musicians, wrought at a period of life when men's abilities are at the strongest, are obsolete and virtually lost to the world for ever. The exceptional performance of some very few detached single pieces from these works in no degree invalidates what has here been urged, but proves only how countless is the loss from among which these priceless fragments have been rescued. Now, Handel wrote his operas in subservience to a fashion which set in but two or three years before his first coming to this country: a fashion for affecting to believe that the Italian language was better fitted than any other for the purposes of music, and for affecting to admire performances in the Italian tongue above any in the vernacular of the nation. This fashion was founded, as many fashions are, upon falsehood. To wit: the first and highest element in vocal music is the general expression and minute declamation of the words. This element is a nullity with an audience by whom the words to which music is set are not familiarly and habitually spoken, and thus, and only thus, fully understood; and no language is, therefore, so good for the most important of all musical purposes as the native language of the people before whom it is performed. It was, then, to this gross falsehood of fashion, this lie against all sense and reason, this perfidy against pure art and undistorted nature, Handel sacrificed the best years of his manhood. Let us note how he was addressed by Aaron Hill, the dramatist, when he first produced before the public his compositions, to English words, Esther and Acis and Galatea; and let us remember that it was this Aaron Hill who, having taken the Queen's Theatre in the Haymarket upon speculation, after the failure of the performances given there by Van Brugh and Congreve, engaged the master to compose for his establishment Rinaldo, his first Italian opera for London, for which he, Hill, framed the libretto. Thus writes he:—

"To MR. HANDEL.

"December 5, 1782.

"Sir,—I ought sooner to have returned you my hearty thanks for the silver ticket which has carried the obligations further than to myself; for my daughters are both such lovers of musick, that it is hard to say which of them is most capable of being charmed by the compositions of Mr. Handel.

"Having this occasion of troubling you with a letter, I cannot forbear to tell you the earnestness of my wishes, that, as you have made such considerable steps towards it already, you would let us owe to your inimitable genius the establishment of musick upon a foundation of good poetry, where the excellence of the sound should be no longer dishonored by the poorness of the sense it is chained to.

"My meaning is, that you will be resolute enough to deliver us from our Italian bondage, and demonstrate that English is soft enough for opera when composed by poets who know how to distinguish the sweetness of our tongue from the strength of it, where the last is less necessary.

"I am of opinion that male and female voices may be found in this kingdom capable of everything that is requisite; and I am sure a species of dramatic opera might be invented that, by reconciling reason and dignity with musick and fine machinery, would charm the ear and hold fast the heart together.

"I am so much a stranger to the nature of your present engagements, that if what I have said should not happen to be so practicable as I conceive it, you will have the goodness to impute it to the zeal with which I wish you at the head of a design as solid and imperishable as your musick and memory.—I am, Sir, your most obliged and most obedient servant.

"A. HILL."

The practical answer to this letter is the series of English oratorios and secular cantatas through which the name and the genius of Handel are universally known.

Let us step forward in history, and turn to another country, there to find Mozart most anxiously desiring to set music to his own German language. His biographies, confirmed by his correspondence, amply testify to this. His remarkable power to fulfil his desire whenever he had the most rare chance, is shown in the too few examples of German songs which good fortune, breaking through the fog of fallacy and bad taste, enabled him to produce. By reason of the court prejudice of Vienna against the language of the land, his two German operas were composed for minor theatres, adapted to the capabilities of inferior singers, and set to books which were written by men unpractised in operatic construction. Had his natural wish more frequently been gratified, had his more important and more regularly formed works been set to the words of his native speech, they perhaps could not have been better—it is impossible to suppose that the music of Mozart could have been better than it is—but they certainly would have been better understood, and might, doubtless, have been produced with greater pleasure to their author.

Advancing yet a generation further, let us note the struggles of Weber against the Italian opera of his day, and lament that, whether his opponent was Morlacchi in Dresden, or Spontini in Berlin, his best efforts were sorely hindered, if they could not be frustrated, by the ever poisonous working of the Italian prodilections of his time.

The greatness of these three instances throws into insignificance the innumerable others that might be brought forward of musicians whose thoughts have been perverted, or whose efforts have been thwarted by the compulsion to defer, or even to succumb to Italian supremacy. Let us consider, now, the influence of this language upon the performance of works which have been written in spite and through the midst of its antagonism.

First, then, as regards the singers. The majority of those who now-a-days present themselves at the Italian theatres in London are Germans, or Swedish, or French, or American, or English, or in some other way foreign to the manner born of the text they have to enunciate. Our experience of foreigners' speaking English affords signal proof that, however they may master the dictionary and the grammar of a language, it seems all but impracticable, since it is all but unexampled, for a stranger to a country to utter its speech with the accent and inflexion of a native. Turn we from the range of our foreign acquaintances, who may have no object in speaking our language but to make themselves generally understood when asking for their common necessities, to those French, Italian, and German actors and actresses who have of late years appeared upon the English stage, and we shall call to mind that these talented artists have one and all failed to make their English sound like that of their companions in their performances, and that they have been more or less impeded in their impersonations by having to contend with an assumed form of utterance. In like manner the greater number of the vocalists, and nearly all the best of them, who sing in Italian to London hearers, have the embarrassment, and make the consequent shortcomings of contending with an acquired, and, therefore, to them unnatural language. To judge from the practice of a large number of these, and of nearly all the private singers who study under the best esteemed Italian teachers, it would be fair and right to denounce the Italian language as eminently, nay, pre-eminently bad for music; and this because it appears to induce a habit of false musical phrasing, and of violating one of the most obvious and simple laws of musical expression. Every one knows, for instance, that the note following an appoggiatura should be unaccented, and that the whole stress of the phrase should be thrown upon the leading note itself; but English vocalists, who sing Italian, commonly give emphasis to a final, instead of a penultimate note, and strongly accentuate the second instead of the first syllable of such words as "mio," "padre," "core;" if, in cases like the last, they do not substitute an "a" for the "e," in order, apparently, to give extra force to their false rendering of the musical requirements. Had these very persons to close a phrase with such words as "father," "loving," "tender," their natural habit of speech would compel them to give the stronger accent to the note set to the first syllable, because they would feel, even more than they would know, the gross impropriety of placing it upon the second, and thus the sound would be served by the sense, and musical truth would be induced by the influence of its handmaid, language.

All disinterested persons must pity singers, artists, and amateurs, who are fettered by fashion to the insuperable disadvantage of an unaccustomed tongue; while they pity, however, they cannot but in some degree condemn those who do not exert their will to break the bonds. What must be felt, however, for the composers whose works are perverted in their meaning, and materially altered in their effect, by the substitution of words of other sound, and often of other sense, for those to which the music was set! One might forgive this paramount injustice to a musician, under either of two circumstances. Firstly, were the so-called translation into the native language of the executant, who would then be enabled to invest its performance with such natural impulse as is incompatible with the enunciation of a strange tongue; secondly, were the text rendered into the native language of the audience, who would thus be enabled more thoroughly to apprehend the musical purport than is possible through the aid of the English side of an opera libretto, or even through the preparatory help of school education. Let us try to suppose what would be the effect of Elijah or the Creation, I will not say upon the masses, but upon the most accomplished and the most intelligent of English listeners, were it to be performed in Italian instead of in the language which is all but innate to those whose entrance into life was welcomed by its words! So strongly and so thoroughly do we feel the benefit to these works of their English presentation, that we ever condone the faulty utterance of our vernacular by foreign singers, to whom, occasionally, the parts are assigned. We are unmoved by its comicality, and we are aware only of the lawful wedlock between the musician's ideas and the sentiments they were designed to embody. How monstrous is it, then, that a different rule should prevail at Covent Garden Theatre from that which works with admirable effect at Exeter Hall; and that while in the latter the masterpieces which have been set to foreign words are shown to be beautiful since made to be intelligible, in the former the works of equal esteem in another style are impaired by translation into a language which is uncongenial to most of the singers, and incomprehensible to nearly all of the audience. Why should the compositions to German words by Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, and Weber, and those to French words by Gluck, Cherubini, Auber, Rossini, Meyerbeer, Donizetti, Gounod, and Verdi—nay, even those to English words by Weber and Balfe—be denied the inestimable advantage which is accorded, as a matter of right and reason, to those by Haydn and Mendelssohn?

In operatic Italianization there are grounds of complaint still more cogent than have yet been set forth. For instance, the word-mongers—higher definition may not be applied to them—to whom the most delicate and most difficult task of translation is for the most part confided, appear to have such entire disregard of its great responsibility, such utter ignorance of the meaning of the original, and such total unfitness for the duty they undertake, that they not only place syllables of different vowel sounds to emphatic notes from those to which these notes were set, and so materially affect the mechanism of vocal production, but they vary the construction of their sentences so as to distort either the verbal sense or the musical phrasing, and they not rarely substitute other and even contrary meaning for those to which music of pointed significance and careful expression has been written. An example of this last, which would be amusing were it not offensive, occurs in the duet of Pizarro and Rokko in Fidelio, where the gaoler, having asked what is the important task with which he is to be entrusted, the music abruptly modulates into the key of F sharp minor, the inverted-harmony of the dominant 7th is exceptionally resolved upon an inversion of the chord of the prepared major 7th of D, and Pizarro answers with the singularly harsh melodious progression from C sharp down to D, to give full significance to the malignity he feels and the horror he must excite in pronouncing the word "Morden," the sound of which is closely imitated, as the meaning is exactly represented, by the English word "Murder"; and for this the Italian verbalist has substituted "Andrai" ('thou shalt go'), the broad vowel sound of which has the utmost possible unlikeness to the impressive mystery of the original, and, by the absurd nullity of its meaning, one of the most remarkable points of expressive declamation in the whole opera is rendered a ridiculous misapplication of means to an end. Again, in the same piece, when the governor has described how he will steal into the dungeon of his intended victim, and then declares "ein Stoss" (one blow), with a breathing point or a moment in which we may tremble between hearing of the full purpose and of its expected result, "und er verstimmt" (and he is dumb); and to the six wonderful burning notes that speak these terrible syllables into the very heart of the listener, mindless of the intervening rest except to make nonsense worse nonsensical of his own diction, the traducer has adopted the words, "Dal sen gli strappero." Not even an Italian could sing the passages thus perverted from their sense with the deep meaning Beethoven embodied in them, and even in Italian could only hear in them a wanton ado about nothing.

For another instance. It is cruelly to the memory of Mozart, of Beethoven, and of Weber whose careers were each a lifelong conflict with the poisonous influence upon art and nationality of the Italian opera, to appropriate, or to misappropriate, to the Italian stage the works which they wrote in the joy of their hearts and in support of their principles, and thus to place them in the front of the enemy's battle, and make them fight upon the side they would have overthrown; yet thus it is with the Entführung aus dem Serail, the Zauberflöte, Fidelio, and the Freischütz.

Yet for one more instance. The exigencies of the Italian stage demand ceaseless music throughout a lyrical drama; but the works just named, and many others in the repertory of our theatres for misrepresentation, were constructed with a view to the alternation of music and speaking, and the entire design of the compositions has to be altered to suit them to the solely singing requirements. The question is not of the superiority of this or that form of operatic construction, but of the sacredness of a great work of art, and of the indecency of outraging a great man's design. In the department of dramatic poetry it has been the practice to purify the masterpieces of our stage from the long accepted corruption by Dryden, Tate, Cibber and Garrick, and the boast of successive theatrical managements to present these works "according to the text of Shakespeare;" and the literary world and the playgoing public have welcomed this just act of homage to the merit of the dramas and the genius of their author. It is at least anomalous that, coincidently with the reign of this spirit of poetical justice, there should ride rampant a demon of musical spoliation, and that the same public should witness the restoration of Shakespeare, and the desecration of Mozart, Beethoven, and Weber. No one will dispute that Berlioz, Costa, Balfe, and Arditi, are names as honorable as those of the literary functionaries above quoted; but no one can pretend that these honorable men have any better right to tamper with the greatest models in their own art than had the scribes of the last century to make their ruthless insertions in the greatest works of the stage.

And now let me offer one proposition. Amateurs may learn what they like, and may be taught how they can, for, when they pretend to practice music but for amusement, if they be more amused with fallacy and folly, it would be intrusive to force truth and sense upon them. With artists, however, the case is otherwise, since music ought to be to them as much the object of life as the means of livelihood; and if they have hitherto been misled by the practice of the age, it is a duty to point out to the rising generation the path of error, and to exhort them to walk in the road of reason. The vocation of English singers is, in the highest rank, to sing oratorios, which are always in English, and, in the successive lower gradus, to sing translated foreign or original English compositions. The study of Italian songs does nothing whatever to fit them for this vocation by enabling them to pronounce the words, or to interpret the music of these works, from the grandest to the lightest, from the oratorio to the ballad. Nobody whatever wants to hear Italian songs from the lips of English singers, or cares for them in any respect but as vehicles for the exhibition of foreign celebrities who are engaged from year to year at our opera houses. Every English singer that holds the highest ground in general esteem, has gained this standing by singing English. So it is with Mme. Sainton-Dolby, with Miss Louisa Pyne, with Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, with Mr. Sims Reeves, and with Mr. Santley; and if some of them are, or have been, admitted among the natives of all other countries to sing on the Italian stage, it is their performances in their own language that command the high respect they enjoy, and that have been their credentials for entrance into those motley assemblies. I could name more than one example of our countrymen and women who have cast their lot among the so regarded Italians, and have never obtained any firm footing with the world at large, nor received the best consideration in their false position. My proposition is, then, that rising vocalists waste not their best years and their best energies in the study of music and words that can be of no possible avail to them for technical training or popular advancement, but that they devote themselves to the practice of works in the language which it is their duty to enoble, by freeing it from the vulgarisms of mispronunciation, and which they will find, and may prove to be, better susceptible of musical expression than any which is not next to intuitive in themselves and their hearers.

Music in the Public Schools of Boston.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON MUSIC.

In School Committee, Sept. 10, 1868.

The Committee on Music ask leave to submit the following report:

Ten years ago, in the month of September, 1858, the Standing Committee on Music presented their first report to this Board. A partial review of the progress of the department of instruction under their charge during the decade now closed may not be uninteresting.

At the time this Standing Committee was instituted no instruction in music was given except in the Girls' High and Normal School, and the two upper classes of the Grammar Schools. The responsibility of such instruction was divided among four teachers. Two half hours in each week were required to be devoted to the study and practice of vocal music.

The Committee, in their first report, submitted a programme for the regulation of the branch of education under their care, providing that, in addition to the time heretofore given in the upper classes of the Grammar Schools, some elementary instruction and exercises in reading simple music should also be had in the lower classes, under the direction of the regular teachers; and that in the Primary Schools, likewise, singing form part of the opening and closing exercises of every session, and such time be devoted to instruction in music as the Sub-Committee of each school might deem expedient. No change was then proposed in the existing administration of the musical instruction. The four incumbent teachers continued to exercise their functions as before, using such text-books as they preferred, subject only to the approval of the Standing Committee. On observation and experience it soon appeared that this plan did not work favorably. There was a want of unity and uniformity in the method of teaching, and the variety of text-books caused difficulty and confusion. In saying this the Committee do not mean to reflect upon the devotion and assiduity of the then existing corps of instructors in music, who were certainly zealous and attentive to their work. But the plan was in itself defective.

The first change was the appointment of a separate teacher in the Girls' High and Normal School, and the requirement, on his part, in addition to his ordinary duties, to give such instruction to the pupils of that institution as should qualify them, in their turn, to become teachers of vocal music in our Public Schools. It was recommended, likewise, that thereafter in deciding upon the qualifications of candidates for the office of teacher in our schools, of whatever grade, their ability to instruct in music should be taken into account and insisted upon by the Examining Committee.

Under the more extended supervision of the Standing Committee on Music, progress was manifestly made; but defects and deficiencies resulting from the want of some simple, thorough and progressive plan of instruction soon became apparent. It was evident that the requirements of the rules in regard to musical teaching in the lower classes of the Grammar Schools were, for the most part, a dead letter. It was equally evident that in the Primary Schools the singing exercises at the opening and closing of the session were, oftentimes, a meaningless and routine performance, and that the time devoted to musical instruction in that grade of schools was next to nothing.

With these convictions the Committee, in their Report of September 1861, urged upon this Board the necessity of the more extended introduction of musical instruction into the Primary Schools. In their Report of 1863, they again referred to the subject, and recommended the appointment of a special instructor of music for this grade of schools. It was a measure that would have been sooner pressed upon the consideration of the Board, but for the difficulty experienced, on the part of the Music Committee, in finding a teacher competent to assume a post of so much responsibility and importance.

In June, 1864, Mr. Mason received his appointment, and in September of that year he entered upon his work. In due course three years must elapse before the fruits of this primary instruction could appear in the lowest grades of the Grammar classes. Three years subsequently, therefore, (in the autumn of 1867) an extensive examination was made in these lower grades of the Grammar Department, with a view more especially of witnessing the effect of the progressive instruction in music in the Primary Schools. The result was gratifying and surprising. Making due allowance for the deficiencies, which could not but be expected in so large a field under the supervision of a single teacher, the legitimate effects of this systematic and general instruction among the Primaries were almost everywhere apparent. The Committee had hitherto endeavored to encourage the regular teachers throughout these two lower classes in the Grammar Schools to act up to the letter of their requirements, in giving to the pupils under their charge such instruction in music, aided by its special teacher, as lay within their power. Now, for the first time, the pupils appeared to be prepared to receive such instruction understandingly, and a corresponding interest was manifested by the teachers.

About this time, likewise, the operation of the rule passed by this Board some time in the preceding year, giving to each Master the position of Principal over all the Grammar and Primary classes within his District, went into effect. This, in the minds of your Committee, was a fortunate coincidence. The interest of the Masters in carrying out all the requirements of our rules and regulations, in regard to all the studies of the schools, became unmistakably aroused, and, with their cordial coöperation, in a majority of cases, and the aid of the intelligent and assiduous teacher of music, some real progress began to be made in this hitherto fallow field of effort. It now became apparent that the time had come for special attention to these classes, in order that the progressive steps of musical instruction should not here be arrested. The subject had been prominently brought forward in the Report to this Board, under date of March 19th of that year (1867), in which the Committee say "it is evident that the plan of instruction, which in its progressive march has now reached up into the highest class of the Primary Schools, and is ready, in its regular order, to be carried into the lowest class of the Grammar Department, should not be allowed an interregnum of a couple of years before it is again taken up in the upper classes of this grade."

Hitherto no specified time had been marked out for daily attention to music in the classes under consideration, and, as a first step towards the insuring of a better compliance with existing rules and requirements, an order was submitted by the Committee, and passed by this Board with great unanimity, requiring that fifteen minutes each day should be devoted to this study.

What was evidently further needed was that a special supervisor should be provided for the musical instruction of these lower classes, in like manner with the provision previously made for the Primary Schools. Your Committee have only hesitated to make such definite recommendation before, because of their unwillingness to seem to precipitate any additional expense in this department of public instruction. They believe, however, the time is now fully come for such action, and hence their request, which is now before the Board, for authority to nominate a suitably qualified person to take charge of the musical instruction of these classes. They feel also, that the events of the past year have shown that the Board are now ready for such appointment.

It will thus be seen that it has been the effort of the Music Committee to systematize, and, as far as possible, centralize the plan of musical instruction by placing each department under a recognized head, whose duty shall be to supervise and give direction to such instruction throughout his particular sphere of duty, enlisting as his agents the regular teachers of the schools who are expected to understand and teach this equally with the other branches of school study. This has necessarily been the growth of time. Only now are we ready to recommend the extension of the plan over the lower classes of the Grammar Department. Ultimately, it is to be hoped, the same system can be adopted throughout the upper classes also, meaning by this that the Music Director shall be able, through the assistance of the masters and teachers of the classes in that grade, to communicate his instruction to every room, and not be obliged, as now, to instruct personally the several classes at one and the same time, in the large hall.

Further than this, it is the hope of your Committee, as has been many times expressed in their previous reports, that at some future day the general control and supervision of the whole plan of musical instruction in our schools shall be made to rest in one responsible and intelligent head, subject to the executive authority of the Standing Committee on Music. In the nature of things, however, we are not as yet prepared for this culmination of our plan. The exhausting personal labors of the instructor in music of the two upper classes must for a time be continued; but the large extension of his field of labor in the addition of the Roxbury District, compels us to ask for an associate teacher who shall divide the work with him, while, at the same time this assistant shall hold himself responsible to his Principal in adopting and carrying out the existing plan of instruction.

It is recommended likewise that the musical instruction of the Roxbury High School be placed under the same direction as that of the Girls' High and Normal School.

To repeat then, the present plan of musical instruction is this,—to continue the instruction of the Primary Schools under the supervision of its present head, who shall teach that specialty, as now, with the aid and mainly through the agency of the regular teachers; to institute a similar supervision over the lower grades of the Grammar classes through a special teacher to be appointed by this Board; to continue the instruction of the upper classes of these schools through the personal teaching of their present head, with the aid of an associate; and lastly, to couple the Roxbury High and Girls' High and Normal schools under the personal instruction of the present incumbent in this last named school.

And, to carry fully into effect the provisions above named, the following orders are respectfully submitted:

Ordered, That the Committee on Music be authorized and instructed to nominate for confirmation to this Board a suitably qualified person as teacher of music in the lower classes of the Grammar Schools, at a salary of twenty-five hundred dollars per annum.

Ordered, That the salary of the teacher of music in the Roxbury High and Girls' High and Normal schools be fixed at the rate of one thousand dollars per annum for the current school year.*

During the past year classes for Normal instruction have been formed, in which the teachers of the Primary Schools under Mr. Mason, and of the Grammar Schools under the joint instruction of Mr. Eichberg and Mr. Sharland, have had opportunity to learn to teach what is required of them in music, and very many, we are happy to say, have availed themselves of the opportunity thus afforded. It is the hope of the Music Committee to again establish such Normal classes under the direction of the several special teachers of music.

The want of some suitable text-book, or manual, adapted to our plan of progressive musical instruction in the schools, has long been felt, and oftentimes expressed in these reports. Mr. Julius Eichberg, the accomplished head of this department of instruction in the Girls' High and Normal School, having signified to the Committee his intention of spending his summer vacation in Europe, was requested by them to avail himself of that opportunity to learn what he could of the operation of this department of common school education in Germany and elsewhere, and to gather, from whatsoever sources, such materials as he could, to aid, at some future day, in the publication of a proper series of musical text-books for the schools.

Mr. Eichberg was received and treated with the greatest attention and courtesy by the authorities to whom he was accredited, and acquired a fund of practical and useful information in connection with the object of his mission. These results he has placed in the hands of your Committee, in the shape of a large collection of printed documents, and, in addition, has embodied his own observations and researches in an extended and most interesting report. We make no apology, therefore, for extracting from this report, at length, such passages as our space will admit, and which, in our judgment, will tend to illustrate the whole subject:

* These orders were referred to the Committee on Salaries.

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, MARCH 2.—Who can hear the Ninth Symphony and not feel that Beethoven stands alone in symphonic music! What a gigantic work! The hearer does not attempt to explain the impression made upon him, but simply receives it and wonders. Let him take the score and follow the motive, simple in itself, through all the windings, all the complicated texture of double counterpoint; see how each part remains its individual self, now appearing on the surface, now buried in the general waft of sound, only to rise again in turn, and all so symmetrical, so perfect in form;—he may discover why the work is so gigantic, but it will only increase his wonder. It is a waste of words to call the Scherzo beautiful. How can one sufficiently praise a language for which there is no translation but in the soul! The exquisite horn passages of the second movement are almost tantalizing, so short are they. And in the Finale how unexpectedly you are called back to the Scherzo by one of its sentences being repeated here, as if Beethoven meant it should not be forgotten even in the tremendous whirl of the last movement! The latter must be heard often to be appreciated. The great composer meant with one grand finishing stroke to express in intensest light what Schiller describes as "Götterfunken" (Spark of Deity). The very utmost is demanded of instruments and voices. Indeed Beethoven seems to have considered the latter as so many wind instruments to be used as simple members of the orchestra, for what is demanded of the voices!

The Symphony was given last night with great success by the "Berliner-Sinfonie Capelle" in the Sing-Akademie. The whole programme was fine, and I give it here:

Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis".....Gluck.
(Arranged by Richard Wagner).
Aria from Elijah, "Höre Israel".....Mendelssohn.
Scenes der Furiæ des Hades. Soli and Chorus from the "Armide" of.....Gluck.
Ninth Symphony.....Beethoven.

The scena from Gluck's Armide has been rarely heard of late in the concert room, and was all the more welcome, as not a single note of Gluck has been heard this season. It is really to be deplored that the name of Gluck, Germany's best tragic opera writer, has not been once in this season's repertoire of opera.

As I wrote you in my first, the "Bilse Concerts" are a feature of Berlin musical life. They are given in the new Concert-Haus on Leipziger Strasse, the hall of which is built on the very best of acoustic principles, and about two-thirds the size of our Boston Music Hall. The second and third floors are given to private boxes for ten persons each; the space on the floor of the hall is occupied by tables and chairs. Your first impression on entering the hall is, "Really, this is German life;" for seated around the tables are families and mutual friends, and others who have come to enjoy the music and pass a social evening. Many of the ladies come quite early, often in the afternoon, and are joined by the gentlemen of the family in the evening. Most of the former bring their "work" and busy themselves as if at home. By the time the first part of the programme is finished it is generally "supper-time," and such a pleasant scene is scarcely known outside of Germany. One would imagine that, with all this material for disturbance, quiet enjoyment of the music were impossible. The contrary, however, is the fact; a stiller and more attentive audience could not be desired. The beginning of any piece is the signal for a silence which continues perfect till the last note is played. Then recommences the uproar of hundreds of voices in general conversation, mingled with the clatter of plates and orders to waiters. I have been often amused at the sight of some old lady, deserted for the time being by her friends, seated alone at the little table, inquisitively peering over her spectacles at all that goes on around her, all unconscious of the stocking which she is quietly and contentedly knitting. You exclaim again, "This is German life," and wonder if it will ever be a phase of American society. The programmes are always good, light and modern intermingled with the more strict and classic music; waltzes in particular are played to perfection. Saturday evening is always reserved for a great Symphony concert. The orchestra numbers a hundred musicians in the following proportion: 40 1st and 2nd violins, 13 violas, 13 cellos, 10 contra basses, 1 harp, 3 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 clarionets, 2 fagottos, 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 tuba, timpani, triangle, drums, &c. The orchestra are under fine discipline, and play always with vigor and unity. On these Saturday evenings the tables are removed and the whole space is given to seats. Another feature of the Saturday concerts is that smoking is forbidden, which at other times is allowed after the first part of the programme. Here is the list of pieces as given last time:

Overture to "Anacreon".....Oberubini.
Sinfonia Eroica, No. 3.....Beethoven.
Overture to "Midsommer-night's dream".....Mendelssohn.
Invitation to the Dance, (arr. by Berlioz).....Weber.
Variations from A-major Quartet, played by 68 strings.
Beethoven.
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber.
Introduction to "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner.

The last should be brought before a Boston audience. It is still a novelty here. Many praise it, many call it "stuff" (Zeug). Most of those who have heard it say nothing, from the simple reason that they don't know what to say. It is a "Riesenarbeit" (gigantic effort), to say nothing more. The very first chord is almost deafening. The score shows that everything was written according to the strictest rules of counterpoint, and Wagner has twisted and turned his original motive till he has wrung from it its very existence. Whatever musicians may say of Wagner, certain it is, that no new composer will attempt a new era in opera without first consulting him.

The Bilse concerts draw fashionable audiences and are also in every way popular. Who does not long for the time when such an innocent amusement shall have become general in America as it is here in Germany? The rising generation would be only too thankful for such a place of resort, at once social, reputable, and affording opportunity to cultivate a taste for the most beautiful of arts. In Berlin there are three such, visited by the best families of the city.

Among other musical novelties we have lately had the entire music of Weber's Preciosa, given by the Berliner Capelle and the Stern Society. This week comes the "Hohe Messe" of Sebastian Bach, and two weeks later we shall have the St. Matthew Passion by the same. Last week was the "Seasons" of Haydn. Next week we have another Quartet Soirée. o.

PARIS, MARCH 8.—On Sunday, Feb. 21, I found myself in my old place in the amphitheatre at the Cirque Napoleon, drawn thither by the king of symphonies and of souls. Loyal subjects, too, were the four thousand men and women who followed the music so attentively, and who knew so well how and when to applaud. Good listeners all, and probably most of them well acquainted with that particular composition. So quiet were they, that during the entire performance there was positively no sound to be heard save that of the instruments. "You may find better music at the Conservatoire, but you shall find no better manners," seems to be the motto of this audience, and yet a large portion of it is composed of the so-called "common people," who enter for the modest sum of 15 sous each. Will Miss Emptyhead, of New York, who lives in Madison Avenue, and who attends the "Philharmonics" because they are fashionable, condescend to take a lesson in decency from the French Ouvrières?

Here is the programme of the concert under consideration:

Ouverture de la flûte enchantée.....Mozart.
Symphonie en la.....Beethoven.
Canonetta du quatuor (op. 12).....Mendelssohn.
Tous les instruments à cordes.
Fantasie-Caprice, pour violon.....Vieuxtemps.
Par. Mme. Norman-Neruda.
Ouverture de Leonore.....Beethoven.

Mme. Neruda is the best lady-violinist I have ever heard, with the sole exception of Camilla Urso. In one respect she excels the latter lady; her bowing is strong, nervous, masculine, and for a woman really wonderful. This is the greatest merit of her playing, and it is precisely here that Mme. Urso fails, in so far as she can be said to have any failing. I have heard Mme. Neruda repeatedly, but it has happened to be almost always in this Capriccio of Vieuxtemps (which she plays from memory). At this concert she received much applause, and at a previous one her rendering of a Mendelssohn Concerto is said to have been equally successful.

Here is the list of pieces performed at the two succeeding concerts:

February 28.

Jubel Ouverture.....Weber.
Souvenir de Rome.....G. Bisc.
Allegretto Agitato.....Mendelssohn.
Gondellied. Chanson de Reinsiger.
Masurka.....Chopin.
Chantée par Mlle. Schroeder.
Septuor.....Beethoven.

March 7.

Symphonie en mi bémol.....Schumann.
Adagio du quintet en sol mineur.....Mozart.
Exécuté par M. Griess, (clarinette), et tous les instruments à cordes.
1er Concerto pour piano.....Mendelssohn.
Exécuté par M. Brassin.
Le Comte d'Egmont, tragédie de Goethe.....Beethoven.

The ninth concert of the Conservatoire took place yesterday with the following programme:

Symphonie en si bémol.....Schumann.
Fragments de Fidelio.....Beethoven.
Ouverture de Freyschütz.....Weber.
Finale du 2me acte de La Vestale.....Spontini.

The previous concerts have certainly been attractive enough, but this one was to me the most enjoyable of all.

In the first place the Symphony was so played that the hearer lost all sense of time and space; the barrier between music and players was broken; there was no orchestra, no composition, only the triumph of a splendid idea cleaving like lightning through the heart of darkness and superstition, and, meteor-like, lighting the heavens with its burning train. The sense of soul-power, of immortality, springs into life with the very first note of the introduction, and carries everything before it to the close. Only once is the chain broken; towards the end when it has attained its highest, fullest meaning, the music changes, and, from the realms of the gods, we are suddenly transported to the edge of a wood, to witness a fairy revel by moonlight. Nothing can be more vivid than the picture of these little soulless creatures tripping through their quaint minuet upon the green-sward, while we, still possessed by that great and irresistible sense of destiny, are watching them. No more effective blow at materialism than this passage has ever been struck, and the dramatic effect is like that of the Mazurka in Chopin's F-sharp minor Polonaise. No man without a perfect perception of that innate virtue and grandeur—denied to humanity by modern creeds—could ever have written that Symphony.

The selections from Fidelio were the wonderful "Prisoners' Chorus" and the air of Leonora, which was sung in the most perfect manner by Mlle. Krauss. It is impossible to praise too highly her rendering both of this air, and of the soli from the Vestale, each morceau of which is like a pure and perfect chrysolite.

On the 3d inst. the first representation (for the season) of Faust took place at the Grand Opera, on which occasion the Emperor honored the Salle with his presence. At the Theatre Lyrique we have a strange melange made up of Gluck, Halévy, Mozart, Adolph Adam, Verdi and Rossini. Don Juan was lately represented for the fourth and fifth time. M. Padeloup in person conducts the orchestra. There is some fault to find with the singing, and still more with the acting; but, bearing in mind the general tendency at the present day towards a decline in art and taste, this reformation movement should meet with encouragement and sympathy.

Among the sensations of Paris should be classed the "Quatuor Suedois," the members of which are described as students, who possess good and melodious voices, and who, wishing to travel through Europe, profit by their talent to indulge their migratory taste. They sing their national airs and songs, without accompaniment, and in a style so admirable that one can hardly believe them to be amateurs.

On the 28th ult. the posthumous "Messe Solennelle" of Rossini was performed at the Theatre Italien; another representation took place during the week and a third will soon follow. I have not yet heard the composition and can only say that, according to the general impression, it is a work which will even add to the maestro's fame. A. A. C.

NEW YORK, MARCH 8.—On Saturday evening we had our 4th Philharmonic Concert with the following programme (orchestral):—

Suite, Overture, Air, Gavotte.....Bach.
Overture, "Melusine".....Mendelssohn.
Symphony, D minor, op. 120.....Schumann.
Double Chorus from "Lebenslied".....Wagner.

The Arion and Liederkrantz Societies assisted, and Mme. LaGrange sang the "Letter Aria" from Don Giovanni and the Scena and Aria from Fidelio.

The Suite is a very charming work; it was first produced here by Theo. Thomas at one of his Symphony Soirées last winter, and was also one of the attractions at the Musical Festival. It improves upon acquaintance, and seemed to please the vast unmusical majority.

The "Melusine" Overture, charming as it certainly is, suffered by contrast with the Bach music and the magnificent Schumann Symphony, and left me with a dissatisfied feeling which it would be difficult to define, and which it would be rank musical heterodoxy to express.

The last of Schumann's Symphonies was played in an almost faultless manner and was most enjoyable to those whose taste has been educated up to the standard of Schumann's school. While it is less attractive to me than are either of the other three symphonies, it yet has many points of beauty and interest, and through the entire work the genius of the author shines unmistakably. The last movement possesses enough life, energy, and vigor to suffice for a dozen ordinary authors, and Mr. Bergmann took the tempo at a rate that was positively bewildering.

Mme. La Grange demonstrated the fact that even an admirable and most artistic execution cannot supply the place of a voice long since departed; it is unfortunate that such a great artist should not have gracefully retired from public life while at the zenith of her renown. An encore—elicited by her excellent performance of the "Letter" Aria—was really a tribute to her past reputation rather than to her present ability.

The Wagner Chorus was capitally rendered by our two prominent German Singing Societies, and very nearly gained an encore.

The 5th Concert is to occur on April 10th. The orchestral pieces will be Beethoven's 1st Symphony, Gluck's Overture to Iphigenia, Liszt's "poem" called "The Ideal." The soloist upon that occasion will be Mr. Richard Hoffmann (piano).

Mr. Thomas's 15th Sunday Concert presented many points of interest, among them, the following:

Overture, Jessonda.....Spohr.
Andante, "Surprise Symphony".....Haydn.
Finale, Loreley.....Mendelssohn.
Overture, William Tell.....Rossini.

Miss Hoffe (soprano), Mr. Letsch (trombone) and M. Prume (violin), assisted; the latter created a marked sensation by his wonderful execution and very excellent tone. Mr. Prume played the Mendelssohn Concerto at one of the Philharmonic concerts some four years ago. F.

MARCH 15.—On Saturday evening we had Theo. Thomas's 4th Symphony Soirée, with the Mendelssohn Union, Mr. Thomas's orchestra, and the following programme:

Suite in canon form, op. 10.....Grimm.
Motet, "I wrestle and pray" (1st time).....Bach.
Symphony, E flat, op. 28, (1st time).....Max Bruch.
Gipsy Life, op. 29, Chorus and Orchestra, (1st time).....Schumann.
Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner.

This is a fine array of good things and they were, generally speaking, very well performed. This remark applies particularly to the orchestra, which did admirably; but less praise is due to the Mendelssohn Union.

The Grimm Suite was especially noteworthy on account of the artistic manner in which the theme of each movement was "imitated." The Andante was simply a String Trio, in which the viola was taken by Mr. Matzka, the cello by Bergner, and the violin by Thomas himself, who descended from the conductor's stand for the purpose. This movement (the Andante) proved very attractive to the audience, and it was emphatically encored. The third movement (Tempo di Minuetto) has a very neat episode in E major, and the Finale is full of vigor and purpose.

The Bruch Symphony seemed of unequal merit, the first and second movements being far the best of the five; indeed the Scherzo (second movement) in G minor is a gem in its way and has an exquisite trio. The treatment of the wood wind instruments reminds one very strongly of Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream Scherzo, a little too strongly for the credit of Herr Bruch.

Schumann's "Gipsy Life" is simply charming, and had the fragmentary and episodic solos been taken by competent persons, the general effect would have been far more satisfactory.

The Soirée closed with the superb Tannhäuser Overture, which was played with electrical effect by the fine orchestra.

At Mr. Thomas's 16th Sunday Concert were performed:

"Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus," op. 43.....Beethoven.
2 movements from "Departure" Symphony.....Haydn.
Overture, "Oberon".....Von Weber.
Scherzo from "Reformation Symphony".....Mendelssohn.

Miss Josey Hoffe and Mr. August Arnold (pianist) were the soloists. The former acquitted herself creditably, while the latter hardly equalled his performance at the 13th concert. F.

Concert Record.

March 11. On the Thursday intervening between the last two Harvard Concerts, Mr. CARL ZERRAHN gave his "Annual Concert," with the assistance of the brilliant young pianist, Miss ALICE TOPP, and the Harvard Symphony-Concert Orchestra, which has played us so many noble Symphonies and made such marked improvement in the rendering thereof under his energetic, careful lead. The audience was large, although the Music Hall was not filled up to the usual mark of the subscription concerts. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 4.....Beethoven.
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra.....Schumann.
The Unfinished Symphony, B minor.....Schubert.
Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner.

The Orchestra, in the absence of the Quintetto Club, had hardly its full complement of strings; but the several works were given,—especially that warm and lovely Symphony of Beethoven—with rare precision, delicacy and fervor. The two Schubert movements, in spite of the oppressive melancholy which gets the better of their sweetness, and of the not altogether successful struggle of the genius shown in flashes for triumphant mastery of form, seem always to be listened to with much delight, and never more so than on this occasion.

Miss TOPP's playing in the admirable Concerto of Schumann was superb,—far better even than her rendering of the same work at her first appearance here (in the Festival.) Her recent journey through the country seems to have given her full health and strength, and there was none of the nervousness which somewhat impaired her freedom in the Chopin Concerto in the first concert of this season. With what even and unflagging force and fire and beautiful precision, and what vital touch, she kept on through the long series of full, difficult chord passages! The piece possessed her fully, and found expression in all its fire and its variety of moods and light and shade, with a triumphant ease. No doubt it added to the wonder of the audience that she played it without notes. But there are dangers, hair-breadth escapes, in sliding over such thin ice, which an audience does not always notice. Memory may prove treacherous with the best. In the middle movement (the Romanza) musicians knew, what publicists do not suspect if the movement be only continuously kept up, that the fair artist forgot herself more than once, skipping a bar or two and having to go back for the orchestra. We name this only as an argument against this practice, introduced by modern piano virtuosos, such as Bülow, of trusting wholly to their memory in playing long and difficult Concertos with an orchestra. It may give the solo player greater freedom as well as greater prominence; but in the latter view it looks like affectation; for, after all, in such a case the piano is but one part among many, and there would be equal reason why each and every instrument in the orchestra should play without notes, since their parts in such a whole are something more than mere accompaniment: each is an indispensable and individual factor. If one is to play without notes, why not all? And the Conductor, why should he have any score before him?

The Tannhäuser Overture sounds strangely indeed after a whole winter of purely classical orchestral works. One could hardly help asking himself: If they were music, what is this? We must confess it did not charm us quite so much as it did once; and yet it is too peculiarly interesting to remain very long withdrawn from hearing. It had been much called for, and no doubt many were more than gratified, for it was played brilliantly.

March 12. The third Quartet Matinée of the brothers LISTEMANN, with Messrs. HEINDL and SUCK, had the usual attentive audience, though on a dreary afternoon. Mozart's Quartet in C major, No. 6, opened the entertainment; and the second of Beethoven's "Rasoumoffsky" set (op. 59), in E minor, with the quaint Russian theme and variations in its third movement, closed it. Good leadership and careful, if not yet perfect, coöperation, must be credited to the interpretation. Messrs. BERNHARD and FRITZ LISTEMANN gave a fine specimen of easy, fluent violin playing in a Sinfonie-Cantante (No. 1) pour deux violons, by Alard; the composition in itself is but a show piece. The vocal contributions were by Miss JULIA GAYLORD, the young lady whose fresh, bird-like voice, free, rapid execution and bright, winsome manner lent so much attraction last year to Mr. Eichberg's burlesque operetta, "The two Cadis." She sang a song: "The moon is sailing o'er the sky," by F. Petersiles, in which the verbal rhythm seemed to suffer violence in its forced adaptation to the music, —otherwise a not unpleasant song,—and Schubert's "Barcarolle." The voice, in gaining strength, seems to have lost some sweetness, and the delivery, before so spontaneous and natural, seems hard, stilted and self-conscious. Perhaps this is only temporary, incident to the transitional gymnastic period of "voice-building,"—during which is it not wiser for the pupil not to come out in public?

The fourth Matinée (yesterday) presented Schubert's Quartet in D minor (posthumous), and Beethoven's great B-flat Trio.

March 13. Mr. J. C. D. PARKER's third Trio Soirée.

Second Trio, in G..... Beethoven.
Aria, "Quando miro"..... Mozart.
Piano Solos. a. Romance..... Schumann.
b. Mazurka..... Chopin.
Songs. a. Widmung..... Franz.
b. Neue Liebe..... Mendelssohn.
Second Trio, in C minor..... Mendelssohn.

The fresh clear, buoyant early Trio of Beethoven, one of the three in op. 1, now but seldom heard here, made a good contrast with the full, rich, brilliant and impassioned Trio by Mendelssohn in C minor, which has been interpreted to us by about every one of the pianists of any note. Mr. PARKER proved himself quite equal to the task, and was well supported by his colleagues, Messrs. SCHULTZE and FRIES, in the violin and 'cello parts. It was pleasant to hear again the warm, rich tones of Mrs. BARRY, who sang her beautiful selections in her usual refined, artistic style and with true musical feeling.

March 18. HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—The tenth and last of the subscription series of Symphony Concerts was an occasion of uncommon interest and crowded the Music Hall beyond all past precedent in concerts of so high and pure an order. This seemed to show that, in spite of newer schools and fashions, the best still wears the best, and the star of Beethoven keeps in the ascendant. The grandest of Symphonies and Overtures, familiar as they have grown to all, but at once suggestive of such high and golden hours, some of the best experiences of life, proved irresistible. It was fit to end the rich series with a Beethoven programme:

Overture to "Fierabras"..... Schubert.
Triple Concerto in C, op. 56, for Pianoforte, Violin and Violoncello..... Beethoven.
Ernst Perabo, B. Listemann, and Wulf Fries.

Seventh Symphony, in A major..... Beethoven.
Overture, "Lacoon," No. 8..... Beethoven.

And Schubert's noble Overture to Fierabras, full of beauty and of fire, one of his real inspirations, clear, symmetrical, concise for him, as felicitous in form and in mastery of instrumentation as in ideas, was worthy to usher in a Beethoven programme. This Overture, first introduced here in the first season of these concerts, has held its place in every season's programme thus far, and with increasing favor. This time it was indeed admirably played; the plaintive little horn phrase which runs through it, the splendid outburst of the tutti, heroic and impetuous, the sweet melodic episode of the oboe, and the grand summing up, were all satisfactory.

The Triple Concerto, if not to be ranked among the greatest inspirations of Beethoven, being, by the very fact of bringing three instruments into equal prominence, necessarily more full of bravura than is the wont of so great a master, is yet a very interesting work, abounding in delicate beauties. The orchestral part is full of fine suggestion, often by the happy use of a few notes of accompaniment, the slightest sketchy phrase, outlining and hinting a great thought, sure at length to be worked out into grand proportions. We refer particularly to the first movement. The Polacca, which leaps out from the deep and pensive Largo, is full of sunshine, vigor, and vivacity. The whole Concerto went much better than it did last year, when it was rather hurriedly undertaken for the first time; with PERABO at the piano, and LISTEMANN and WULF FRIES for violin and 'cello, it could hardly fail of worthy presentation. The chief drawback lay in the nature of the composition as heard in so large a hall. The violoncello, which has really the most difficult part, and most important of the three, has often to play above its common register, soaring and circling like a mate to the violin in rapid, figurative passages; and to do this so as to be heard, yet without forcing the tone at all, is almost too much to expect of any one. Bating a slight swerving from pitch now and then in a high note, Mr. Fries was remarkably successful. So were the other two protagonists. Mr. PERABO's only public appearance this winter was of course significantly greeted. Then there was a certain artistic air and spirit visible in the whole group, which lent faith to the listener and charm to the performance.

Of the Seventh Symphony, or of the greatest of Overtures, what is there to be said, more than we would say of the best friends of years; that they never seemed so good, so thoroughly themselves, and may they live forever! Seldom have they been played so well, or so eagerly followed, so sincerely, deeply enjoyed by so large and remarkable an audience. Mr. ZERRAHN has again cause to be proud of his orchestra, and the Harvard Association at the end of this their fourth and most successful season, have every encouragement to aim at a still higher mark next year.

March 20. Mr. PARKER's Fourth and Last Trio Soirée showed increase of interest and of numbers. In the first place there was the attraction of a new element; an amateur club of male voices, Mr. Parker's friends, and all of them, we believe, members of his own Vocal Club, for the first time, in compliment to him, stepped just outside of their purely social and private sphere and sang, to the great delectation of all present, four beautiful pieces: "The Night," by Schubert; the spirited and breezy Foresters' Chorus from Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose" (this with accompaniment); a Serenade by Eisenhofer, and Mendelssohn's Rhine Wine Song. The voices, all musical, congenial and of good power, were ten in number, and a finer specimen of part-singing, one must go far to hear.

In the next place the Trios were selected with tact and were very finely rendered. For the opening there was one by Haydn in A major, in three movements, one of the simplest, clearest of its kind, yet charmingly genial, and shaped with that masterly, sure art which seems like instinct. This is the second specimen of Haydn's thirty Trios for piano, violin and 'cello, for a first hearing of which we are indebted to Mr. Parker. Hitherto the little one in G alone, the No. 1, so often played as a Sonata Duo for violin and piano, has visited our concert rooms. And, for the closing number, the glorious Schubert in E flat, the op. 100, was repeated, and carried the audience away with it as fully as before. By the way, Kreisler von Hellborn, in his new Life of Schubert, tells us that the fascinating solemn theme of the Andante con moto, introduced by the 'cello, is a Swedish national melody. The tenor singer, Berg, Jenny Lind's first teacher, now director of the Conservatoire at Stockholm, used to sing it in Vienna, and Schubert, liking it exceedingly, used it as a subject in his Trio.

Another point of interest was Mr. Parker's piano solo: Andante con variazioni, by Mendelssohn, which he played with artistic finish and expression.

NEXT IN ORDER. To-night (Easter Eve) we have a new Oratorio, Costa's "Naaman," by the Handel and Haydn Society. An account of it, written before its first production at the Birmingham Festival in 1864, will be found on our first page. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN takes the part of Elisha; Mr. JAMES WHITNEY, Naaman; Mr. W. VINCH, Gehazi; Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, the three parts of Timna, the Widow, and the Child; Miss WHITTEN, Adah; and Miss GATES, the Shunamite woman.

To-morrow evening, the noble Oratorio "St. Paul" will be given with the same grand chorus, orchestra and organ, with Miss HOUSTON for principal soprano (who kindly consents to sing again, in the continued illness of Mme. PAREPA-ROSA), and Mr. VINCH in the principal male character.

An extra SYMPHONY CONCERT, in aid of the Musical Education of the Blind at the South Boston Institution, who in their recent concerts and exhibitions have astonished everybody by the zeal and success with which so many of them are making musicians of themselves, will be given by the HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION in the Music Hall, next Thursday Afternoon. Tickets, at $1.00, now for sale at the Hall. The programme consists of the Haydn Symphony in G (so popular last year); Chopin's E-minor Concerto, played by HUGO LEONHARD; Schumann's "Cologne" Symphony, in E flat, a repetition of which has been continually requested; and Wagner's Overture to Tannhäuser. It is understood that one of the ways of most effectually promoting the musical education of the Blind will be the providing of means of going to Europe for Mr. CAMPBELL, their teacher, who has already wrought wonders with them, standing really at the head of this instruction of the blind in this country, and who desires to learn all that can elsewhere be learned so that he may do still more for them.

Mr. PECK's Annual Concert is postponed to April 16, on account of Mme. Parepa-Rosa's illness, which involves a reconstruction of the programme.

FOLK SONGS AND PIANOFORTE COMPOSITIONS FOUNDED ON THAT FORM.

The influence of national, or Folk-songs, upon the development of music during the middle ages, and even before that time, until our day, can scarcely be exaggerated. As genuine products of the unknown poet hearts from which they sprang, as the wild flower is of its native soil, they will never lose their primal freshness. But like the flying seed of the flower, or more like the winged bird, they are tireless wanderers; they pass over desert, mountain, and sea, from workshop to study, from street to field, from church and theatre to the battle field—and the reverse way. As a modern author has remarked, "Some of these melodies resemble the wandering Jew—never resting, never dying! Some of their motives possess such vitality, that their existence is almost as old as our chronology." It is scarcely necessary to observe here that all modern composers of distinction have deeply studied this inexhaustible source of melody and expression. Among these, Chopin was neither last nor least. Of his polonaises and mazurkas, Liszt says: "His polonaises, characterized by an energetic rhythm, galvanize and electrify the torpor of indifference. The most noble traditional feelings of ancient Poland are embodied in them. The firm resolve and calm gravity of its men of other days, breathe through these compositions. Generally of a martial character, courage and daring are rendered with that simplicity of expression, said to be a distinctive trait of this warlike people." * * * "In all that regards expression, the mazurkas of Chopin differ greatly from his polonaises. Bold and vigorous coloring gives way to the most tender, delicate and evanescent shades, in the Mazurkas. No longer is the feminine and effeminate element driven back into shadowy recesses. On the contrary, it is brought into such prominent importance that all else disappears."

NOTES.

1. William Byrd, Byrd, or Bird, was born about 1538, died 1623. He was one of the greatest Musicians of his time. He created remarkable works in several styles of composition, such as Masses, Motets, Madrigals, and pieces for the organ and virginal. The Spinnet was at that time called the Virginal in England, and belonged to the family of keyed instruments, such as the harpsichord, clavichord, and modern pianoforte. The Prelude and Carman's Whistle, by Byrd, are from a collection called "Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book." To judge from the difficulty of the pieces this book contains, Queen Elizabeth must have been a player of remarkable talent.

2. Orlando Gibbons, a celebrated composer of Madrigals, Anthems, and pieces for the harpsichord, etc., was born at Cambridge in 1583, and died 1625. He occupied the post of Court Organist to Charles the First of England.

Henry Purcell, born in London, 1658, died 1695, was the greatest composer that England ever produced; indeed the only English composer who was at once truly great and thoroughly national. Few of Purcell's single songs appear to have been printed during his lifetime. The collection of his vocal, secular music, which reflects the greatest honor on his memory, was published by his widow, two years after his death, under the title "Orpheus Britannicus." The fresh and elegant song on the programme is taken from that collection.

3. Dr. John Blow, born 1648, died 1708, was one of the most eminent of English Church composers. His setting of Old Hundred as a harpsichord lesson, is original and bold in its contrapuntal and harmonic treatment. His pleasing and elaborate "Song to Pan," is taken from the first edition of Dr. Blow's collection, entitled "Amphion Anglicus," which he is said to have published in emulation of Purcell's still more famous "Orpheus Britannicus."

4. Henry Carey, born about 1697, was a musician and poet; he wrote ballads, operettas, poems, and farces. Dr. Chrysander has lately established Carey's undoubted right to be regarded as the composer of "God save the King." He was a man of remarkable genius, but poor and unsuccessful, and in a fit of despair committed suicide about 1744. Mme. Ritter has selected the authentic version of his simple ballad "Sally in our Alley," which now, from its great popularity and character, deserves to be included among English folk songs.

5. Domenico Scarlatti, son of the great composer Alessandro Scarlatti, was born at Naples, 1683, and died at Madrid, 1757. Though Scarlatti wrote many operas, besides masses and other works for the Church, he owes his greatest reputation to his success as a player on, and composer for, the harpsichord. There are many anecdotes current, all more or less romantic, respecting his curiously entitled composition "The Cat's fugue." The simple fact seems to have been, that the old master's cat ran over the keys of his clavichord one day. The keys which she happened to press down were taken by the master as the principal notes of the theme from which he formed this fugue. It is certainly a quaint and original one, and Scarlatti's contrapuntal resources wrought a charming morceau from it.

6. The canticle, Alla Trinità, whose composer is unknown, belongs to a collection of music from the 14th century, preserved in the public library at Florence. This collection is supposed to be that of the most ancient melodies, with Italian words, in existence.

Francesco Cavalli, born at Venice 1600, died 1675, although not the first Italian composer who introduced airs in operas, as has been falsely related in some historical works, is considered to have surpassed his predecessors and many of his contemporaries in richer harmonies, more elegant form, greater carefulness in detail, and superiority of instrumentation.

7. Nicolo Porpora was born at Naples in 1687, died 1765. Porpora has written a number of operas, oratorios, and instrumental works; but his fame rests on his distinction as a teacher of singing, the master who produced such pupils as Farinelli, Caffarelli, Mingotti, and other celebrated singers.

8. Benedetto Marcello, a noble Venetian, was born 1680, and died 1739. Marcello was distinguished both as a statesman and composer. His greatest work is his setting of the first fifty psalms for solo voices, duettos, and chorus. This work was considered not only its author's chef-d'oeuvre, but also as one of the best productions of ancient or modern art. The 8th psalm is one of the finest among all; it is characterized by tender, poetic expression and exquisite simplicity in its harmonic treatment, while the melody is as fresh as if it had only been written yesterday.

9. Galuppi, born near Venice, 1703, died 1785, was a great opera composer, who wrote with all the fire of youth until past the age of eighty. He was also a talented performer on, and inventive composer for, the harpsichord.

10. Pergolesi was born 1710, died 1736. His operetta "La Serva Padrona," is considered a masterpiece of simplicity, elegance, and dramatic truth. It is written for two characters only, master and servant girl, and a small orchestra; yet the genius of the composer triumphantly overcame this self-imposed monotony.

11. Summer is a coming in, loudly sing, cuckoo!

Growth seed, and bloweth mead,
And springeth wood anew;
Ewes are bleating after lamb, calves lowing after cow,
Bullock starteth, buck departeth; merry sing,
cuckoo;
Well singest thou, cuckoo, nor cease thy singing now!

Summer is a coming in, loudly sing, cuckoo!

Hawthorn's green, each root between Looks out the violet blue;
Maids are fain, and every swain goes singing through the dew;
Streamlet floweth, sunshine gloweth, merry sing,
cuckoo!

Well singest thou, cuckoo, nor cease thy singing now!

This is one of the oldest English folk songs known, and was popular before 1200. In the year 1226, the melody of the song was taken by a monk of Reading, and was worked out by him with great contrapuntal skill as a canon; a manuscript of this canon exists in the Harleian collection. The present arrangement of this song is by Macfarren; the translation (or modernization) of the first verse from the Anglo-Saxon, is by Longfellow.

"Bin albe."—This is a very old Swiss wedding song, and was formerly sung and danced by the bride, bridegroom, and guests at the peasant marriage feasts; most recently, in the neighborhood of Bucheggberg. It is newly arranged by Mme. Ritter from an old and rare collection of Swiss tunes, containing the words in the original dialect. "Colin"—The first phrase of this air is almost note for note the same as that of the Arab air "Kradoutja." But whatever its original source, it has been a popular French song for three centuries.

13. "El Contrabandista"—A Spanish national song, newly arranged by Mme. Ritter. "Lisetto"—This song originated among the slaves in the French colonies; the words are in negro creole patois. The negroes mark the peculiar rhythm of the refrain with a rustic tambourine.

TRANSLATION OF "LISETTO."

Young Lisetto sought the mountains,
Peace and joy went with her too,
And mine eyes have turned to fountains,
Since no more her face I view.
Cutting canes all day I wander,
Love my only thought and theme;
All night long on love I ponder,
Or of lost Lisetto dream.

Dear Lisetto, fly the city,
Sailors gay you there will meet,
Who deceive our maidens pretty,
With soft words, like syrup sweet.
In a brigantine, to-morrow,
If you're false, I'll cross the main;
You have caused me so much sorrow,
That I ne'er will love again.

TRANSLATION OF "ROSESTOCK."

Elder flower! Red rose tree!
When I my darling see,
How throbs my heart with joy
Free from alloy!

Face bright as milk and blood,
Maiden so fair and good,
Foot that leaves all behind,
Swift as the wind!

Arm so smooth and round,
Lip with health's freshness crowned,
Tender, brave, pure, true, fair,
Would mine she were!

When her dear soft dark blue
Sparkling clear eyes I view,
Think I, "Within them lies My Paradise."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Song of the Sea. 3. D to f. Bissell. 35
The words are by Kate Seafoam, and the whole is quite musical, and refreshingly reminds one of bracing ocean breezes.
- The days of Old. 2. E♭ to f. Hoag. 30
A very sweet talk with "Lulu" about the joys of former days.
- The agreeable young man. Chilton. 30
This young man was obliging to a fault, and thereby fell into very comic perplexities. Good music.
- When we grow old. Solo and Duet. 3. G to f. Sargent. 30
A sort of "John Anderson my Joe" song, with a nice duet at the end.
- The Dying Wife. Pathetic Ballad. 3. E♭ to c. Porter. 30
A song to make the tears start. Somewhat similar in character to "The Dying Californian."
- Little Diamond Dew Drops. 2. D to c. Blamphin. 35
A nice little affair, and very pretty for children to sing.
- Frank the Forester. 2. B♭ to c. Foster. 35
Charming love song, all about Frank and the Miller's daughter.
- Blessed be the Lord. Benedictus with Bass Solo. 3. E♭ to g. Emerson. 50 Fine quartet or chorus for choirs.
- By Rippling Brook. (Forget-me-not). 3. F to f. Ganz. 35
A "Forget-me-not" ballad in pleasing style.
- To my Heart. (Au mein Herz.) 3. D to f. Oliver. 30
With German and English words, and is in excellent taste.
- Come under my Plaidie. Scotch air. 2. D to f. Meir. 35
Very simple, sweet and peculiar.
- Childhood's happy home. 3. B♭ to a flat. Rudersdorff. 30 Sunny remembrances of childhood.
- The Old Meadow Gate. 3. B♭ to f. Rudersdorff. 30
Calls to mind the days when we (probably) swung on, or courted near, the old gate. A fine ballad.
- A te. To thee. 3. F to f. Campana. 30
An impassioned Italian song with a translation.

Instrumental.

- Galop. "Premier Jour de Bonheur." 3. G. Auber. 30 Waltz. " " " " 3. F. " 40
Polka. " " " " 3. G. " 30
"Le Premier Jour" is a Comic Opera by the (now) old master, and a little above the grade of Opera Bouffe music in general.
- President Grant's March. Gilmora. 50 Brilliant.
- El nino Eddie Galop. 2. F. Turner. 30
A very pretty air for little Eddie, who should practice it carefully.
- My Dainty Lass. (Austrian song). 4. C. Pacher. 40
An Austrian melody, gracefully varied.
- Les Roses Valse. 4 hds. 3. C. Arr. by Matra. 1.00
An unusually attractive duet.
- The Voice of Spring. Pol. Red. 3. A. Fernald. 35
A graceful musical tribute to the coming season.
- Valo. (Dear friends good-bye). 4. Sanderson. 30
Vale, meaning "farewell," very properly names the music, which is pensive and pleasing.
- After Dark. Quadrille. 3. Coots. 60
Quadrilles usually are danced after dark. This is a good one, and contains a number of popular melodies.
- Schutzen March. For Brass Band. 1.00
Popular. Try it.
- Tarantelle. 5. A♭. Hoffman. 60
Not especially difficult to play slowly, but, of course, needs a high rate of speed. Light, graceful, and airy.
- Friedrich's March. For Brass Band. Gung'l. 1.00
Try this with the other. Both good.
- Merry Wives of Windsor. Overture. 4 hds. 4. Nicolai. 1.25
Play it, merry wives and daughters!
- Light Fantastic. Schottisch. 3. G. Swallow. 30 Light, but fantastic only in name. Very pretty.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Folk-Songs.

I.

Delicious wafts from new mown meadow hay,
That float o'er lawns whose every flower is sweet;
Sun-fringed showers that drift with silvery feet
Down gold-green valleys on a summer day;
Spring brooks that leap and wind and slip and flow
Beside a river's large, majestic swell;—
Clear chime, from high church tower, of crystal bell
That strikes through deep toned organ-peal below;
Stars, throbbing, sparkling, round the full-orbed
moon;
Or perfect pearls, encircling jewels rare
As violets stud rose-garlands, yet look fair;
Or lay of thrush, though with the lark 'tis June;
Such are these ballads, fresh, spontaneous, free,
When likened unto loftier minstrelsy.

II.

At what far fountain were these poets taught
The songs they sang so warmly and so well?
Whence came the healthy power, the tender spell
From which that glow of purity they caught?—
They followed but the simple clues that lead From Man's to Nature's heart. Their pulse was stirred
By love of her; they talked with her, gave heed
To those fine truths she speaks in song of bird,
In ring of metal, drop of leaf, or gush
Of vine-juice in the vat, or ocean's flow,
Or sigh of grass, or stormy hurricane rush;
And in some passionate hour, their joy, their woe
They uttered in her wild, her wondrous tongue,
Unconscious as the air, while thus they sung.

FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

Extracts from Elise Polko's Reminiscences of Mendelssohn.*

Hildebrandt remembers a saying of Mendelssohn's, with regard to Father Haydn, which I shall quote here as characteristic.

Once, on the occasion of a merry jovial meeting, a select circle of friends, with uplifted glasses, found fault with the weakness of the chorus in "The Seasons," in praise of wine. "We should like to sing something far more spirited in its place," said they, scornfully. "The 'old Papa' must have been drinking detestable wine at that time to put so little fire into its praise." Mendelssohn smiled. "Father Haydn can well forgive your calumny," said he, "and can afford to wait patiently till you once more come to your senses. Let the frothy period of youth pass away, and then sing his chorus to a glass of wine, and tell me whether it still seems insipid. At this moment the wine itself is your chief object. When Haydn wrote that chorus, he did not drink wine as you do, merely to enjoy it, but only in order to gain strength for his work, and to rejoice in the strength it imparted. So I say again—Wait!"

"We often marveled," says Hildebrandt, "at all the wisdom in this young head. We constantly felt how immeasurably he was above us; and yet, at other times, he was full of boyish mirth and high spirits as the youngest among us."

Many little incidents, recalled by friends, gleam like fitful rays of light respecting the artistic value of those days. One of Mendelssohn's favorite stories was an ancient Roman tradition of a motionless assembly of Senators, seated in death-like silence, whom a guileless Gaul mistook for stone statues, and was therefore bold enough to pluck the beard of one of the circle, when the supposed statue started into life and cut down the audacious Gaul with his sword. In remembrance of this anecdote, Mendelssohn and Hildebrandt agreed, that whenever they met, no matter where, even in the most aristocratic society, never to say "good day" to each other without a certain form. Hildebrandt was suddenly to stand still and assume a stony face, when Mendelssohn was to go up to him slowly and solemnly and pull his beard, while he was in return to submit to a sharp Roman blow on the shoulder, which dissolved the magic spell, and they were then to greet each other with their usual cordiality.

Of Cécile Mendelssohn I had only the fleeting impression of wonderful hair and blue eyes, beaming from under a dark velvet bonnet; but a finished picture of him and his grandly-modeled head was at once impressed upon my memory. He wore what was then called a Spanish cloak, that entirely concealed his figure. I have never hitherto seen any portrait (the one by Hildebrandt I have unfortunately never met with) that represents that artistic head as it lives in my memory; there is something effeminate and sentimental in all the Mendelssohn portraits, which were certainly not the attributes of the living head. A marvelously executed little ivory relief, a profile in the possession of a musical friend of the deceased master, Knauer's statuette, and the large bust, alone are exempt from this character, and therefore bear more affinity to the image in my memory. His hair was black and curling, the forehead of the highest order of intellectual beauty, the nose somewhat bent, the lips well chiseled, the shape of the face oval, the eyes irresistible, brilliant, and spiritual. His slender figure, scarcely attained to middle size, seemed to increase in height and to become imposing when he stood at his director's desk. His hands were of remarkable beauty; Catus, that connoisseur of human beings and hands, would have defined them as "full of soul." A very graceful movement of the head was peculiar to him; and when he carelessly threw it back, while his rapid glance, like that of a general, passed in array his musical forces, there was not one among them who did not at that moment silently vow to do his duty to the uttermost. He appeared elegant and calm while directing; no peculiarities attracted the attention of the audience; not a vestige of embarrassment, and yet entire security.

No words can tell the devotion with which the different members of the orchestra clung to him. But then how careful he was of them, how warmly he had their interests at heart, what an open ear and open hand he had for all their complaints! He was not satisfied with the temporary addition to their salary of the 500 dollars that he had wrung out of the magistrates for their benefit; he never rested till he succeeded in effecting a real improvement in the position of the members of the orchestra.

"Just because the orchestra is not an article of luxury, but the most necessary and important basis for a theatre—just because the public invariably regard with more interest articles of luxury than more essential things—on this very account, it is a positive duty to endeavor to effect, that what is legitimate and necessary shall not be disparaged and superseded by a love of glitter."

A lively set of young people formed at that time a critical concert audience, the members of one of the gayest little musical circles in the world, who all gave each other rendezvous at the Gewandhaus concerts, on those far-famed Thursday evenings. Many, many looked down on us at that time, shaking their heads in disapproval of such "fledglings" presuming to usurp the places of those who were highly cultivated; and yet it was not from the midst of the "fledglings" that, during a sudden pause in a Beethoven Symphony, the words "bacon paste," the subject of conversation between two ladies, sounded distinctly through the hall, the motto of which is "Res severa est verum gaudium." Oh, bright and memorable musical garland! how has it since been scattered by every wind. And yet we then thought that it would for ever remain the same!

I believe that Mendelssohn, who knew nothing whatever of our doings, would, like every warm-hearted musician, have been pleased to see how much we were in earnest in our studies. What we accomplished was as incomplete as most juvenile productions, but enthusiasm for music was deep and fervent within each of us. Then there was such happiness in being able to sing and play together, we took such harmless pleasure in the weak tea, herring salad, and mulled wine, and in all our little innocent interests and passions—and likewise in Schubert and Beethoven, Mozart and Haydn, Father Bach and Mendelssohn. How they rise before me, all those charming girlish heads, fair and dark, and those bright eyes, many of which since then have been "too used to weep," and those youthful cavaliers who have long ago won names in different ways, and have long enjoyed titles and orders! How thoroughly were we in earnest in what we attempted, and carefully studied after our own fashion; how we mutually sat in judgment on each other, and dreaded each other; and how we all unanimously agreed in our enthusiasm for the one person who was the chief interest in Leipzig—Felix Mendelssohn! How many times in the course of those evenings we drank his health, how many fair lips gave toasts in his honor, while bright eyes sparkled at the words! We had also our particular favorites in the Gewandhaus concerts, and many a celebrity failed in winning our approbation; whereas we were sometimes loud in praise of those who did not till much later in life justify our enthusiasm. With what interest did we observe and discuss every gesture of the most distinguished members of the orchestra; above all, how closely we watched any exchange of smiles between David and Mendelssohn, and the friendly nod or frown of Klingel! It was then, and still is a singular arrangement of the Gewandhaus Hall, that the greater part of the audience do not sit opposite the orchestra, but face each other; thus we had to twist our necks awry the whole time, till we were exhausted, in order to see Mendelssohn directing. Sometimes, during the long interval, he was to be seen in one of the two boxes above the orchestra, chatting for a time. I think a Gewandhaus concert seen in perspective from the boxes on a level with the chandelier, must have given the impression of a bed of flowers, in the rich adornment of those pretty heads, dark and fair and gayly decked, and all those elegant toilettes where brilliant colors preponderated; and though there was much to hear, assuredly there was not less to see. Alas! how many a fragrant rose, then in its bloom, has long been faded and dead!

Musical Pitch.

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

Acuteness is brilliancy! Altitude is brightness!! There never was a greater fallacy in the whole history of error. The heavens have forbidden it ever since the creation, and have made their protest manifest to man ever since he was inspired to calculate the distances and to analyze the composition of the stars. Yet, while astronomers and other men of science reverentially pro-less the opposite conviction, it is possible, strangely possible, and not only possible, but true, that some musicians assert the mistake and maintain it as steadfastly as if it were Gospel. Unhappily, some of these stand in high and authoritative places, and have thus the power of enforcing their false creed, to the destruction of voices, to the deterioration of instruments, and to the injury of music. Hence the present superiority of the musical pitch of England over that of all other countries—most inferior superiority, when sound is higher than sense and intonation is higher than reason! And hence the present endeavor on the part of many admirable artists to serve humanity and to benefit art by obtaining, not an innovation in the matter, but a restoration of our musical pitch to the standard of half a century ago.

The analogy is perfect between sound and light in respect to quality, and nothing but quality, being the cause of its more or less brightness of character. This same quality results wholly from the peculiar constitution of the sound-giving or light-giving body. Thus it is not the proximity or remoteness of the orbs of heaven, not even their relative magnitude, that induces the greater or less intensity of their light, which is entirely a consequence of the proportions and combinations of their chemical elements. Thus also, it is not the acuteness or gravity of a musical sound,—not even its loudness or softness, that induces the greater or less brilliancy of tone, which in like manner is entirely a consequence of the peculiar structure of the natural or artificial organ by which it is produced. Every one knows that the tone of a Stradivarius violin is more brilliant and that of an Amati sweeter than the other; that the tone of an oboe is more piercing than that of a clarinet; that the tone of trumpet, when played pianissimo, is brighter than that of a flute; that the tone of Mr. Santley's voice is more brilliant than that of Signor Foli, as was the tone of Mme. Grisi's less brilliant than that of Mme. Persiani, when both these songstresses were at their meridian. Now it is a matter of taste, in certain cases a matter of fitness to some special musical expression, whether greater brilliancy or mellowness, brightness or fulness, intensity or sweetness, poignancy or richness of tone be preferable; but it is a matter of fact that the one or the other quality depends upon the particular organization of the one or the other voice or instrument, and has nothing whatever to do with the acuteness or gravity of intonation. Were the case otherwise, were the assumption at the head of these remarks as true as it is unmitigably false, our lovers of brilliancy would but have to transpose all music into higher keys, and the sweetness of an Amati would scintillate into the brilliancy of a Stradivarius, the mellow richness of a clarinet would be transformed into the poignancy of the oboe, the delicate softness of the flute would be changed into the piercing brightness of the trumpet, and all voices, male and female, would forfeit their individuality and merge their identity into that of all others. Even between pianofortes the amount of power would be the only point of choice, and all the nice gradations of quality would be lost which render this or that speciality of tone more delightful to one or another hearer; since an extra turn of the tuning fork would produce the brilliancy which some persons desire at any or at all cost.

It is of course admitted on all hands, since it would be idiocy to dispute the position, that the voice of man, being produced by natural organs, cannot be strained beyond its natural limits without serious detriment to these organs; and the average shorter career of the best singers of the last generation than of the great vocalists who preceded them in time, proves that the recent extravagant upward tendency of the pitch has had the sad effect of straining their voices, of prematurely wearing out their vocal organs, and of rendering the exercise of their talents impossible at the time of life when their powers of perception and all their highest functions of artistry were in best perfection. With regard to voices, however, the altitude of musical pitch would be of little moment were there no past and were music to begin anew from to-day, could we be content to bury the great works of the greatest masters and to subsist entirely upon the music of the future. Composers would then write the songs in the key of E flat which, had they lived fifty years ago, they would have written in those days in the key of E natural, and their executants would produce the same sounds, though they would call them by other names. Accordingly, modern composers for the voice write in keys with many flats even in pieces which aim at the utmost brilliancy of effect; whereas, had they been born a generation earlier, they would in agreement with the practice of that time have written the same music in the natural keys of the same alphabetical names.

The fact is otherwise with regard to artificial instruments. Wood and metal and the manufactured intestines of animals may be cut to any shortness or length without affecting their disposition to wear and tear. Here then is reason for exultation to the persons who blindly, and it must be urged, deafly, pretend that music is made more brilliant by the sharpening of its pitch! Not so; the untruth is as complete over which they would jubilate, as is that of the pretension that a voice has a different quality in a different key. The thin strings necessary for the present acute pitch have not, and cannot have, the resonance, the roundness, fullness, richness of tone of the thicker strings formerly in use. The best instruments of the violin class made at the epoch when the pitch was at the lowest, are obliged to be strengthened by the insertion or the addition (according to the practice of the repairer) of pieces of wood of a different grain from the original, and in the latter instance by glue to affix them, which cannot but affect the freedom of the vibration of the original substance, and which are declared by the best judges materially to impair the tone of the instruments. It is not the shortening of pipes that alone is needful to the raising of their pitch; the bore must be graduated in proportion to the length of a tube, and as this is made more narrow the tone it yields loses in volume. Thus, though in music that is to come the old vocal effects may be reproduced by calling the same notes other names (by saying we sing A flat what once we should have named A natural), the old instrumental effects can never be made with our thin strings, our pieced violins, and our narrowed tubes; neither can the increased tension now applied to pianoforte wires allow them to give forth such ample sonority as they would, with the present improved structure of pianofortes, were they tuned to the lower pitch that prevailed in England during the first thirty years of the Philharmonic Society. Doubtless to increase the tension and to lessen the density of strings, and to diminish the bore of pipes, attenuates their tone as much as, if not more than, it raises their pitch.

At the price, then, of all the vocal music of the best composers in every school prior to these last fifty years—a considerable cost—we might continue to enjoy unimpaired, but in the ordinary course of nature, the beautiful voices of our singers in the music written to accommodate the present extravagant English height of the pitch, and nobody would have anything to regret save those who loved the greatest masterpieces of vocal music. Even this countless sacrifice, however, could not procure for us the same roundness, richness, body of tone from our present modified instruments that was yielded by those of other days; since in this case it is not the translation of the calling of the notes from past into present nomenclature—defining the B flat of our infancy as the A of our manhood,—but the changing of the very sound of the notes, define these by whatever name one may, through the altered constitution of the artificial instruments which produce them. The cry has been loud and unquestionably just in behalf of vocalists, that our pitch should be lowered; but the claims of instruments, not to say instrumentalists, for the restitution of their rights in respect of tone are immeasurably stronger. I know, indeed, that it was the practice of De Beriot to tune his violin for the performance of certain pieces, sometimes a tone, sometimes more than a tone, above the pitch of the accompanying orchestra, so that when he fingered in the key of D he truly played, for example, in accordance with the other instruments in the key of E. I know that even Mozart, in his double concerto for violin and viola, employed the same expedient, writing the part for the latter in the key of D, and those for the former and all the orchestral instruments in the key of E flat; but I do not know that anything can be gained by such extra tightening of the strings besides an increase of facility in playing the extreme top notes, the stop of the violin being in proportion to the length of the string, irrespective of the pitch of its open note.

Hector Berlioz.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette of March 11th).

The composer whose death we announced on Tuesday was, in some respects a remarkable man. The quality of greatness will scarcely be claimed for him. He filled a large space in the world's regard, as Liszt did in his working days, and as Wagner still does, by reason of eccentricity rather than of merit. Thus it would be vain to expect—what we assuredly do not hope—that Berlioz, any more than his just named contemporaries, will have an abiding influence upon music. He disturbed its legitimate progress while living, but with the removal of the cause the effect will cease. For all this, however, Berlioz was a musician of importance, and one whose passing away deserves more than simple mention.

While a youth Berlioz came up to Paris from his native place (a village in the Isère department) for the purpose of studying medicine. He soon played the chief part in a familiar little domestic drama. Medicine was not his vocation (though he might have done less harm even as a doctor than as a composer), and having quitted it against the paternal wish, Berlioz was thrown on the world to make what he could of himself. He set to work in earnest, and began his musical career as a chorus singer at the Gymnase Dramatique. The second step was to give lessons, and the third, to take lessons himself. His talents were not precocious—he entered the Conservatoire a man of twenty-three—but an ambitious and enterprising spirit soon brought the future "chief pillar of modern development" into notice. The time was in his favor. France, during the few years preceding the revolution of 1830, was agitated by novel theories in politics, philosophy and religion. "Why not also in art?" Berlioz seems to have asked himself, answering the question in a practical manner by propounding one of the boldest heresies music has ever known. The central idea of his system must be found in the later works of Beethoven. That great master, however, can scarcely be held responsible for its existence, and not at all for its development. While it is true that Beethoven suggested the "programme music" which Berlioz taught as his highest and truest form of art, he did so incidentally. The expression of ideas was not his aim. "Beethoven in his symphonies," says a modern writer, "may have expressed grand psychological conceptions, which, for the mind that interprets them, may give an extra charm; but if the strains in themselves do not possess a magic—if they do not stir the soul with a keen delight, then, let the meaning be never so profound, it will pass unheeded, because the primary requisite of music is not that it shall present grand thoughts, but that it shall agitate the audience with musical emotions." The truth of this was never absent from Beethoven's mind, and hence his works are above everything in works of art. They develop an ideal more than they express ideas; and so far as ideas are expressed at all the result is due in most instances rather to chance moods and states of mind than to deliberate intention. It must be granted, however, that Beethoven, especially in his last few compositions, gave Berlioz a point of departure, and from it the young French musician started upon his career. All he took of Beethoven was the notion of conveying ideas in musical sounds (the thing most easily appropriated), but this fully suited his purpose. Berlioz speedily developed it into a system, and did not shrink from putting his system, when developed, to the severest test. In the "Symphonie Fantastique—Episode de la Vie d'un Artiste" and in "Romeo et Juliette" he fully showed of how much, or rather how little, the theory he advocated was capable. Those who are at all acquainted with the works of Berlioz will not ask a discussion upon their chief characteristics. Let it suffice to say that the basis upon which they stand is utterly false and rotten. Music will not lend itself to "programmes," and if it be forced to describe events and circumstances it takes a revenge by always doing so equivocally. Schumann himself, whose early leaning to the Berlioz doctrines is unmistakable, saw this and recognized the danger. "It is a bad sign for music," said the whilom lover of "superscriptions," "when it needs a superscription; for it is a proof that it is not the result of genuine inspiration, but some outward suggestion. That our art is able to express a great many things, and even to follow the course of an event, who will deny? But those who are inclined to test the value of the images thus originated can do so easily—they need only erase the superscriptions." To what a ludicrous extent composers of the Berlioz school have carried the idea which Schumann had sense enough to abandon is well-known. M. Schluter asserts that modern tone-poets usually invent a title after writing the music, and tells of one who doubted whether to call his overture "Minna von Barnheim" or "Clavigo," and of another who hesitated between "Abd-el-Kader" and "The Falls of Schaffhausen." We cannot sum up the entire Berlioz theory better than by quoting a passage from M. Felix Clément's "Musiciens Célèbres," one of the few trustworthy expressions of opinion the book contains. Speaking of Berlioz and his imitators M. Clément says: "They seek truth of expression, and they find hyperbole. Natural contrasts are replaced by strange antitheses; serene light by a dull day. For the idiom of art is substituted a polyglot vocabulary of which the initiated alone possess the secret. Keys are disconnected, relations and affinities destroyed, and the result is chaos." Remembering a certain overture to "King Lear," he must be bold who would dispute M. Clément's dictum.

While yet a novice in the Conservatoire classroom Berlioz began to embody the ideas he had formed. In two years he wrote the overtures to "Waverley" and "Les Francs Juges," as well as the "Symphonie Fantastique" already mentioned. The next year (1829) "Les Concerts des Sylphes" appeared, and in 1830 his cantata, "Sardanapale," gained the first Conservatoire prize, enabling him to visit Italy. The journey in no degree changed his peculiar notions, for at Rome he produced the "King Lear" overture and the symphony "Le Retour à la Vie." Like Schumann, Berlioz used the press to defend his theory, and in several papers, especially the Journal des Débats, he returned blow for blow with unflinching vigor. But, as a composer, he was not idle, writing successively the symphony "Harold en Italie" (purporting to represent incidents of his own career), the "Messe des Morts," the "Romeo et Juliette" symphony, and the "Carnaval Romain" overture, lately played at the Crystal Palace. The merit of all these works was fiercely contested, but the composer's opponents signally triumphed when "Benvenuto Cellini," an opera in two acts, was produced at the Académie (September, 1838) and promptly damned. By this time Berlioz must have discovered the musical opinion of France to be hopelessly against him, and one result probably was the German tour of 1843. He crossed the Rhine too soon, for the modern school of German music had not then worked much mischief. "We were not prepared," says Brendel, "for Berlioz's innovations." His works were pronounced insignificant, having nothing attractive about them but a "brilliant ethereal coloring." Once more the audacious musician resolved to challenge his Parisian critics, and in December, 1846, "La Damnation de Faust," called an "oratorio fantastique," was brought out at the Theatre Comique. As might have been expected, this extraordinary series of musical pictures—among which, however, there are some worth preserving—failed to conciliate public taste. (In Vienna, twenty years later, it had an enthusiastic welcome from young Germany.) This work was the apotheosis of the Berlioz theory; and, having written it, the composer relaxed his efforts, and, to some extent, his opinions. The oratorio, "L'Enfance du Christ," and the five-act opera, "Les Troyens," produced at the Lyrique in 1863, show some signs of a return to the correct principles of art, but not enough to guard against opposition and dislike. How far Berlioz would have retraced his steps can only be conjectured. We may, however, regret that so great talents should have been devoted all through life to the spread of ideas every way injurious to art. The composer was not without honor in his own country. As Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, librarian of the Conservatoire, and member of the Institute, Berlioz filled a respectable position. But no more in his case than in any other are such things a gauge of real worth.

The connection of Berlioz with England was very slight. His works found but little favor here, and he himself is remembered chiefly as the conductor of some orchestral concerts at Exeter Hall many years ago, in which capacity he directed perhaps the best performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony ever given.

We have before said, what we now repeat, that the influence of Berlioz is likely to be very transient. The art of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn is not likely suffer permanently from the errors of a man whose extravagance was its own antidote.

Hector Berlioz.

The following notice of his life and works appeared in the Athenæum of March 13. "The first impression awakened by the news is, that the active life just closed has been a long mistake. Berlioz has been one of the hommes incompris du siècle. Born in 1803, he began to work at his darling pursuit just when the romantic reaction against the classic in Art, which had obtained unlimited acceptance in the Napoleonic times, was daily gaining fresh strength. It was natural that the enthusiastic young musician should sympathize with the movement. He did more; he sought to effect a revolution in music which should correspond with the revolution that had been made in literature. Anticipating to some extent the ideas of Herr Richard Wagner, he conceived the notion that all music should have a distinctly defined object. Hence the mass of "programme-music" which in the course of years he produced, and which has fallen into the neglect that awaits all Art, whatever its merits, created on false principles. The very opposition which Berlioz encountered in his early years had the effect of fixing him firmly in every purpose which he made. He was sent to Paris to learn medicine, and when his father, irritated at his preference for music, cut off all his supplies, the youth accepted the place of chorus-singer in a theatre in order to pursue his favorite study. Entered as a pupil of the Conservatoire, he incurred the dislike, natural enough, of Cherubini, but nevertheless, after numerous rebuffs, he eventually triumphed, and in 1830, when he was twenty-seven years of age, obtained for a cantata, 'Sardanapale,' the premier prix de Rome. Finding that his works—such as a Mass, first given at St. Roch, overtures, entitled 'Waverley' and 'Les Francs Juges,' and a symphony styled 'Episode de la Vie d'un Artiste'—brought more derision than fame, Berlioz determined to educate the public into an understanding of the principles on which he worked. With this object he began to contribute to various newspapers articles on musical subjects—including some wild analyses of Beethoven's symphonies, then all but unknown in Paris—and at length, securing the Journal des Débats for a pulpit, he became the most influential musical critic in France. His symphonies, 'Harold en Italie' and 'Romeo et Juliette,' both known in London, and both filled with musical thoughts of rare beauty, and his brilliant and eccentric overture, 'Le Carnaval Romain,' heard a few weeks ago at Sydenham, were—now that his position was recognized—received with unopposed praise. Berlioz was powerless, however, to command success upon the stage. His 'Benvenuto Cellini,' produced at the Grand Opera in 1838, proved a failure; and when brought out at Covent Garden, fifteen years later it met, with the same disastrous fate. In like manner, 'Les Troyens'—his last work, we believe—could not hold their own when, some three years ago, the plains of Troy were transplanted to the Theatre Lyrique. 'La Damnation de Faust' and 'L'Enfance du Christ,' make up the tale of Berlioz's larger works. He had a ready pen, and his keen sense of the ludicrous, no less than of the beautiful, gives a zest to all his writings, most of which have been collected under various fantastic titles. Perhaps the most useful labor of Berlioz's life was the compilation of his 'Traité d'Instrumentation et d'Orchestration Moderne.' His own strong point was, unquestionably, writing for the orchestra, and on this subject he spoke with the authority of a master. Hector Berlioz was not made for the universal popularity that waits only on genius; but in his death the art of music loses a keen critic, an appreciative historian, an original thinker, and a true worshipper."

Hector Berlioz.

[From "Le Ménestrel."]

A composer of boldly innovating spirit; a writer of cleverness and humor; an impassioned critic; a noble poet; a man of rare intelligence, and of excellent heart, Hector Berlioz died on Monday the 8th inst., at his residence in the Rue de Calais, Paris. He was only sixty-six, but for fiery souls like his, years count double, and repose comes only with death.

While paying a tribute of homage to the memory of a great artist who experienced the singular affliction and bitter consolation of being so often misappreciated in his own country, though received in triumph everywhere abroad, it is not our intention to present our readers with a complete and thorough study of the man and of his works. Such a study, to be worthy of its object, would require a long period of reflection, and considerable development.

There is a book to be written on Berlioz. That book will be written as an act of tardy justice to one who was killed by the systematic disdain of his countrymen. He died of that disdain, which is a disease unknown to vulgar minds, but which is a frightful disease, the torture of every minute, for a man who, feeling his own superiority, and obeying the imperious necessity experienced by an artist of making others share the impressions by which he himself is seized and carried away into the Ideal, beholds himself condemned by the crowd to live in the crowd, struggling with his solitary aspirations, or, what is worse, to receive from commonplace courtiers commonplace flattery, or insincere praise. Oh! how horrible is the praise which does not hit upon the essential qualities of a man's works, the omnibus-like praise, the stereotyped compliments! What stings, inflicted by well-meaning fools on men of genius, or inventors! Indifference is a thousand times better. Indifference wounds our amour propre, but it fortifies our pride, and doubles our strength until the last is gloriously crushed.

Whatever may be the verdict of posterity on the works of Berlioz, he will always stand forth as possessing the most marked individuality in the romantic school of music, as endowed with one of the most original and most poetic minds of the age. His whole life was one desperate struggle for the triumph of a system of musical poetry of which we may not approve, but which he at least invented, and which did not lack imitators, commencing with Richard Wagner.

But Wagner, having departed from his model to obey the extreme consequences of an anti-musical system of music, has raised church upon church, dogma upon dogma. At last, Berlioz was able to say of the school of the Future, despite the first-rate beauties to be found in all the scores of the German Revolutionist: "If such is this religion it is exceedingly novel, I own, but I am far from professing it; I never did belong to it; I do not belong to it, and I never shall belong to it; I raise my hand, and I swear: non credo. There is one thing I believe firmly: the Beautiful is not horrible, and the Horrible is not beautiful. It is not, no doubt, the exclusive object of music to be agreeable to the ear, but it is a thousand times less its object to be disagreeable to the ear, to torture, and to flay it."

The fanatics of the new school were naturally indignant at such a profession of faith, solemnly uttered by a great composer. The traitor!—they exclaimed, to repudiate thus the doctrines of a harmonic religion of which he was so long the self-constituted high priest, especially in Romeo et Juliette.

I determined to see what grounds there were for this accusation, and, therefore, obtained the score of the work so deeply compromised. Well, I who like only those passages of the Music of the Future in which it agrees with the good music of the Present—I passed a delicious evening reading this fine score, one of the things that most dazzled me in my youth. Romeo et Juliette, when I heard it, many years ago, with an imposing orchestra, and a numerous chorus, under the direction of the author himself, produced in me one of those profound but undeterminate sensations which do not command enthusiasm though they inspire respect. I saw before me a great artist; I felt I did; my reason told me that I was listening to grandiose music, full of poetry; but it was only with difficulty that my ear, then inexperienced, could follow its ingenious and bold development; on the other hand, the accents of the melody, chaste, voluptuous, fantastic, gloomy, brilliant, ardent, impassioned, in turn, but always bearing the stamp of genius, that is to say, of originality, merely glided lightly over my heart without penetrating it. In the presence of this original work I remained cold but dazzled, as an inhabitant of the plains of Texas, or of the volcanic mountains of Peru, would be, if suddenly transported, without any preparation, from those solitary and distant regions into the midst of a city like Paris, on some grand fête day.

Since that period I have understood Berlioz's music better, and, I repeat, the personal of the great symphonist's celebrated work procured me a most interesting and most happy evening by my fire-side.

I heard with my eyes the notes which were dead upon the paper, but which were vibrating, warm and full of life, in my soul—a phenomenon arising from the memory of sounds, which is nothing more nor less than prolonged sensation. I heard and I applauded the ingenious instrumental introduction, the prologue, bearing the stamp of savage grandeur, the poetic strophes which follow it, the scherzetto à deux temps, which transports you into the fantastic realms of Queen Mab, whom I afterwards saw appear in a scherzo of incomparable effect; then the festivities at Capulet's; symphonic pages scored as no one had ever scored before Berlioz; the admirable scene of love and of despair, a masterpiece of exquisite sentiment, of noble and tender poetry; then that other scene, Juliet's funeral procession; and the garden scene, where the young Capulets, coming from the feast, sing a double chorus, containing reminiscences of the ball music; lastly the invocation at the awakening of Juliet; the great quarrel of the Capulets and the Montagues, partly made up of designs from the prologue, above which we hear bursting forth the angry and tumultuous voices of both parties, suddenly interrupted by the revelation of Friar Lawrence, which is followed by the oath of reconciliation between the rival families. Yes, I heard all these splendid pages, worthy the immortal text of Shakespeare, which inspired them, and both my mind and my heart were entranced.

Many persons have imagined that the Muse of Berlioz was a rebellious Muse, and that he worked with difficulty; this is a mistake: he never wrote except when in the vein, and in obedience to an inspiration. What more curious example of this can be afforded than by the history of La Damnation de Faust, the book and music of which he wrote simultaneously?

It was while travelling in Austria, Hungary, Bohemia and Silesia, that Berlioz laid the foundation of this work so curiously original and striking. He extemporized the verses just as the musical ideas suggested themselves to him, and at no other time did he ever experience such facility in working. "I wrote when I could and where I could: in a carriage; on a railway; in steamboats; and even in the towns, despite the various cares imposed upon me by the concerts I had to give." It was in an inn at Tarsau, on the Bavarian frontier, that he wrote the introduction:

"La viel hiver a fait place aux printemps."

At Vienna, he sketched out the scenes on the banks of the Elba, the air for Mephistopheles, "Voilà les Roses," and that incomparable scherzo, the ballet of the sylphs. Just as he was setting out for Hungary, he scored and developed the famous Hungarian March upon Rakoczy's motive, a march which procured him, a Frenchman, a very handsome crown, as a tribute of homage from the youth of Gior. In Pesth, by the gas-light of a shop, he wrote down in pencil the choral burden of the "Ronde des Paysans." At Prague, he got up in the night to write the chorus of angels for the apotheosis of Margherite,—

"Remonte au ciel, âme naïve, Que l'amour égara."

At Breslau he wrote the words and the music for the Latin song of the students,—

"Jam nox stellata Velaminus pandit."

"The rest," he tells us, "was written in Paris, but always extempore; in my own house; at a café, in the Tuileries Gardens; and even upon a post on the Boulevard du Temple. I did not seek for the ideas; I allowed them to come, and they presented themselves in the most unexpected order."

This astonishing facility in extemporizing works, though sometimes very complicated, explains the considerable number which Berlioz left, independently of his effusions as a literary critic, and notwithstanding the time he spent in getting up concerts to render the public acquainted with his music. We will mention a few of the works of this composer whose loss we shall always regret.

In the way of dramatic music and oratorio, we find: Benvenuto Cellini (opera, 3rd September, 1838); Beatrice et Benedict, comic opera in two acts, represented at Baden; Les Troyens, grand opera in five acts (Theatre-Lyrique, 1864); Romeo et Juliette, grand dramatic symphony, with chorus, vocal solos, and choral prologue; La Damnation de Faust, a legend in four acts; La Fuite en Egypte, oratorio in three parts.

In the domain of instrumental music, we may mention,—the overtures to Waverley, King Lear, of the Carnaval Romain, of the Francs Juges, and of Le Corsaire; the Episode de la Vie d'un Artiste, a fantastic symphony in five parts; Harold in Italie, a symphony in four parts; Symphonie funèbre et triomphale, three parts, &c.

For the voice: Irlande, collection of melodies; Les Nuits d'Été, id.; Fleurs des Landes, id.; Feuilles d'Album, id.; Vox Populi, two grand choruses with orchestra; Tristia, three choruses with orchestra; "La Captive," "Sara la Baigneuse," &c.

We must not forget the Messe des Morts (Requiem); "Le cinq Mai," a song upon the death of Napoleon; Le Retour à la Vie, a "Melologue," or mixture of music and prose with vocal solos, chorus, and orchestra; and a "Te Deum" for two choruses, orchestra, and organ, &c.

Berlioz published, also, a grand Traité d'instrumentation. He scored, besides the "Marseillaise," the "Marche marocaine" of Léopold de Meyer, and Weber's "Invitation à la Valse." He has left, moreover, some Memoirs.

A few particulars concerning the last days of his life will not be without interest for the musical world that laments his loss, nor for his sorrowing friends.

Ever since the fall he had at Nice, on his return from Russia, the health of Berlioz, already much shaken, became worse and worse. He sometimes lost his memory, and forgot the names of his most intimate friends. Sometimes, too, he appeared to be deprived of all perception. It was in one of these moments, when his intellectual life seemed to have left him, that music worked a perfect miracle upon his soul.

Mme. Charton-Demeur called upon the illustrious patient. A visit from the great French vocalist, who had so worthily created the part of Dido in Les Troyens, was always a poetic consolation for Berlioz, bringing with it an alleviation of his physical sufferings. But on the day in question—I am speaking of some three months since—he could not even smile on her. He gazed without seeing her, and made no reply to the voice of friendship. Mme. Charton-Demeur then thought she would try music, that language which still speaks to the soul, when words are no longer heard by the mind. She sat down at the piano and sang some phrases from the opera of Armida, the score of which was open upon the instrument. At the accents of Gluck, Berlioz awoke from his torpor; he recognized the fair singer, pressed her hand, thanked her, rose, and talked. He was restored to life for art and by art, beating time, applauding, making observations on the lost traditions of Gluck's music, and weeping with joy. "Ah!" exclaimed Mme. Charton, "that is his food; music is what he requires, and for the future he shall not be without it."

She wanted to get up, with Saint-Saens, for the patient, and at his house, special musical performances. Unluckily, the fact of his disease becoming more aggravated every day did not allow her to carry out her noble project.

The last time Berlioz gave any signs of intellectual life was on the 17th December. On that day he appeared more depressed than ever, and death was already hovering over his eagle-head, so proud, so sharply marked, and so artistically energetic. Paralysis had struck him dumb, and the words addressed to him remained unanswered. But Mme. Charton wanted the dying man to make an effort—to write his name in Mlle. Nilsson's album. "My dear Berlioz," she said, bending gently over him, "I want to ask you a favor. You know Mlle. Nilsson, whom you applauded in Don Juan; she likes you very much, and would be most delighted if she could have your signature in her album. You alone are wanting. All the great men are there,—Rossini, Auber, Lamartine, and Hugo. Will you not do me a service, and grant her this favor?"

Berlioz heard her, understood her, and made certain movements. The album was brought him. By one of those returns to life which are met with in men of nervous constitutions and completely baffled science, Berlioz took the large book on his knees, traced a dozen staves, and, without making a fault, wrote the words and music of one of his earliest melodies, "Reviens, reviens, ma bien-aimée." Mme. Charton was weeping, and my own eyes filled with tears at the recollection.

The doubtful, or, at any rate, exceedingly short, success of Les Troyens shook Berlioz's courage to its utmost depths. Yet there are beauties of the first order in this score, which will, perhaps, some day, be revived with brilliant results. At the very moment the composer was breathing his last, there was a knock at the door. It was M. Gevart, who had come, telegram in hand, to announce the great success of Les Troyens at Moscow. Poor Berlioz! This last piece of consolation failed him.

He lay upon his death-bed, calm and majestic. The flight of his soul had imparted to his features an indescribable and sublime expression of serenity, which imposed respect and banished fear. He might have been taken for Dante, the great Italian poet. The friends who never quitted him, and who received his dying breath, are Ernst Royer, Edouard Alexandre, and Damke, the composer. The last two are the executors under his will.

Berlioz has bequeathed to his mother-in-law, Mme. Recier, the mother of his second wife (his first was the English tragic actress, Miss Smithson) a sum of 20,000, and a life annuity of 4,000 francs. These modest savings were inherited from his father, and not derived from music. Art, of which he will ever be one of the noblest representatives, produced him only regrets, with some few moments of ineffable delight. OSCAR COMETTANT.

The funeral service of Hector Berlioz was celebrated in the church of the Trinity. The corners of the pall were held, from the house of mourning to the church, by M. Guillaume, President of the Academy of Fine Arts; M. Camille Doucet, member of the French Academy; Baron Taylor; and M. Emile Perrin, manager of the Grand Opera. From the church to the cemetery of Montmartre, they were held by M. Ambroise Thomas and M. Gounod, members of the Academy of Fine Arts; M. Nogent Saint Laurens, member of the Legislative Body; and M. Perrin. The Institute sent a deputation, consisting of MM. Ambroise Thomas, Dumont, Pile, Martinet, Guillaume, and Benlé.

During the funeral service, the following music was performed by the orchestra and chorus of the Grand Opera, conducted by M. George Hainl, and by the singing-boys of the Trinity, conducted by M. Grisy: The "Introit" from Cherubini's Requiem; Mozart's "Lacrymosa;" the "Hostias" and "Preces" from the deceased composer's own Requiem, sung by a double quartet of artists belonging to the Grand Opera; the March from Gluck's Alceste; and the Funeral March by Liszt, with Sax's instruments. The ceremony was brought to a close by the March from Berlioz's Harold, arranged for the organ by M. Chauvet.

The way to the Montmartre Cemetery was lined with considerable crowds. A band of the National Guards performed funeral marches during the passage of the procession.

The body is laid in a family vault.

Music in the Public Schools of Boston.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON MUSIC.

"My chief aim," says Mr. Eichberg, in the introduction to his Report, "was to surround myself with such facts and data as I could get from men foremost in the cause of public musical education, or of such other artists, who, without being teachers themselves, have attracted public notice, by the clearness and practical nature of their views in the matter."

"Popular musical instruction is now receiving a vastly greater attention than formerly. Its value as a civilizer of nations, its importance for the æsthetic culture of all, high and low, have never been underrated by German educators, but those intrusted to teach music in the schools were, with some exceptions, selected more for their general pedagogical than specifically musical excellence. This has been changed for the better, and music in public schools has enlisted either the active coöperation or, at least, the earnest interest of the most eminent musicians in Germany. Not only does this seem evident to me from the good musical training school-teachers are now receiving, but also from the superior character of most musical publications devoted to that end. While formerly (at a period within my own recollection) the music in use was an indiscriminate selection from works of little or no value, the recently published music-books show a vastly improved judgment on the part of their compilers."

Referring to the manner in which music is now taught in the public schools of some of the principal cities of Germany, he says:

"Music is not taught uniformly in the Hamburg public schools, but the several teachers instruct independently of system. Two music lessons, of one hour each, are given to the pupils, either by their regular, or, in the higher schools, by an appointed special teacher. In the Latin School, four-part songs, motets and chorals are sung, the lower classes singing soprano and alto, while the higher classes take the tenor and basso parts. Pupils are not allowed to sing during the mutation of the voice, but have to be present at the music lessons. Great care is taken to avoid choruses requiring great extent of vocal compass. I found here Mr. Benedict Widmann's different publications well spoken of. They are named 'Little Singing School, for the Three Divisions of Boys' and Girls' Schools,' and 'Preparatory Instruction in Singing.' These two little works (sixty-four and eighty-two pages respectively, in 12mo) contain many novel ideas on class teaching. He not only strongly advocates musical instruction in the Primary Schools, but maintains that the imitative faculties of the child render the teaching of singing far easier at an early age than it would be when the vocal organs have passed the period of their elastic softness.

"Not much has been done in Berlin, since the war, for music in schools. On arriving I presented myself to the Minister of Public Instruction, Herr Von Mühler, who directed me to the Royal Music Directors, Taubert and Ludwig Erk, as possessing the most information on the subject. The former being absent from Berlin, I applied to Mr. Erk, who holds the place of chief teacher of music at the Royal Seminary in Berlin. He gave me an extended description of the method in use at the seminary (we would call it here State Normal School). The musical requirements of a public school-teacher are the following:

- (a) Singing at sight and harmony.
- (b) Some proficiency in violin and piano-playing.
- (c) Capabilities in rudiment teaching.
- (d) Directing church-music and organ-playing.

(The latter (d.) because the school-master in the smaller towns and villages fills also the place of organist.)"

"In Prussia," says Mr. Eichberg, "according to Baron Alexander von Sybel, the insufficiency of the funds allotted to Musical Instruction by the State and Municipal Budgets prevents the engagement of experienced music teachers in the Public Schools, and, with the exception of the principal cities, such as Berlin, Königsberg and Cologne, and Frankfurt and Cassel in the newly annexed territories, musical instruction was rather a matter of routine than an object of live interest in the schools. On questioning Mr. Erk about this statement, the latter assured me that a great deal of improvement had taken place lately and that legislative action was shortly expected which would regulate and systematize the whole matter of popular musical instruction."*

Mr. Eichberg attributes this present meagreness in the appropriation of funds by the State to the drain upon its Treasury caused by the recent war and "the perhaps not groundless fear of another to come."

"During my stay in Berlin," continues Mr. Eichberg, "I acquainted myself with a large number of works on school-music and procured, among others, a copy of Dr. E. Fischer's book 'on Singing and Vocal Instruction' (now almost out of print), whose author was one of the pioneers of musical instruction in the Schools of Prussia. This remarkable essay is replete with useful hints to teachers and those having charge of schools. Among its many truisms I might be permitted to quote the following:

"The main hindrance to successful music instruction in schools lies in the indifference with which the subject is viewed by the School Directors and the rest of the teachers. It is not enough to set apart the required time for the lessons and not to hinder them otherwise, but the Director (master) of the School ought to manifest his interest by frequently assisting at the lessons and to make use of music on all fit occasions. This is the more indispensable as pupils are not (unfortunately) submitted to regular examinations in music as in the other branches. The indifference of the masters is promptly perceived by the pupils and they necessarily form their own conclusions as to the unimportance of this study."

* In an appendix to his Report, Mr. Eichberg has given a list of the numerous musical works of Professor Erk, who from the beginning of his Berlin career, in 1834, till now, has devoted the whole of his leisure time to the improvement of music in the Public Schools.

"Many more portions of Dr. Fischer's book could be quoted, all showing the necessity of placing music on a par with the other departments in the Public Schools.

"The first regular instruction in German Schools was given in the Berlin Gymnasium, in the year 1811, previous to which time such instruction was only and imperfectly given to such of the pupils as were employed in the musical performances of the church. The highest degree to which instruction is brought in the Prussian schools consists in establishing the pupils to sing correctly such works as Bernhard Klein's four-part motets, and choruses by Homilius, Handel, and other classical composers. In Berlin the most advanced pupils of the schools and gymnasium meet occasionally for the practice of some more extended work, and on certain occasions (such as distribution of prizes), whole parts of oratorios have been performed by the scholars, to general acceptance,—the bass and tenor parts being sung by the pupils of the high schools and gymnasium. The best pupils of the High School (Real-Schule) are, as a reward, allowed to sing in Professor Erk's Singing Society. I have to add that Mr. Erk thinks that a class of from forty to fifty pupils is as large as can be successfully instructed together.

"The Director of the Leipzig Conservatory of Music, Mr. Conrad Schleinitz, referred me to Prof. R. Müller, teacher of music at the Thomas School, as most qualified to explain to me the method of public music teaching in the Leipzig schools. These schools are divided into eight grades or classes, the three lowest of which, (corresponding, as I take it, to our Primary Schools) sing exclusively by rote, and go through such rhythmical and melodic exercises as are best calculated to lay a sound foundation for the theoretical instruction, which begins in the fourth class (corresponding with the lower classes of our Grammar Schools). The Primary classes receive their musical instruction from their regular teachers. From the fourth to the eighth class, inclusive, the lessons are given by music teachers especially engaged by the city for that purpose. Prof. Müller is one of these teachers and makes use, for his classes, of a small text-book compiled by himself, and which did not strike me as having any particular merit, either in plan or execution. Two lessons, of one hour each, are given per week to each class. Mr. Müller, who appears to be a very experienced and intelligent teacher, uses in his female classes only two-part exercises, as, in his judgment, it is injurious to the alto voices to circumscribe themselves within the small compass generally allotted to the lowest of three-part songs. I informed him that we avoided such injurious effects (in our High and Normal department, at least) by making the altos occasionally take the second soprano, and vice versa.

"Two weekly lessons, of one hour each, are devoted to music throughout the Kingdom of Saxony, but I failed to learn that music received any particular attention on the part of the Saxon school authorities. From information I received here and in Dresden, I am rather led to believe that music in the schools is rather tolerated than considered an object worthy of the greatest interest. All that is demanded of school choirs is the correct rendering of short motets and secular compositions,—reading at sight being neither demanded nor expected.

"Among the works in use in the Leipzig schools (and in Saxony generally) are the following:

"C. H. Voigt, People's Songs; Ludwig Erk, One Hundred School Songs; Heinrich Bellermann, Rudiments of Music; August Todt, Song Book for Public Schools, Book II; in addition to Mr. Müller's book, above mentioned. Most of these works contain novel and interesting matter and ideas, while the selection of songs is uniformly of a sound musical character, and much of it quite available for our three musical divisions.

"While in Leipzig my attention was directed by several teachers to the highly interesting work by E. Richter, teacher and Royal music director in the Seminary at Steinau, on the Oder, bearing the title: 'Directions for the Instruction in Singing in the Public Schools.'

"In the short space of one hundred and eighteen pages the author gives an exhaustive exposé of his views on the subject. The work is divided into two parts.

1st. Preparatory Instruction for Primary Schools.

2d. Instruction in the 'Volks-schule,' (corresponding to our Grammar Schools.)

"In this, as in most recently published books of its class, attention is drawn to the importance of the study of sacred music in schools. The protestant chorals of Germany have been considered in all times, and by the most illustrious composers, as the main basis of sound popular musical instruction. No music is more capable of improving the taste of the masses and acquainting them with the canons of the beautiful in music. These eloquent musical utterances of times long gone by will, sooner or later, have to form a principal object of study in our schools. To this day they are comparatively unknown in America. While I am in favor of the study of good secular works, yet do I venture to assert that not only will a systematic study of chorals be of benefit to the present pupils, but its excellent effect upon musical taste will be felt a long time after this present generation shall have faded away."

"In the future school music books, these and other chorals by the old composers ought, of necessity, to take the place now too often filled by modern psalm and hymn tunes of little or no musical value, often badly harmonized, and consequently gravely injurious to the taste of the pupils.

"In an interview with Robert Franz, in Halle, (Saxony), this great composer spoke most eloquently of the importance of strictly controlling the musical selections and keeping it constantly before the eye, that the musical development of this whole country depends on the first impressions the pupils receive in our schools,—that he only was to be entrusted with the teaching whose artistical convictions were of the right stamp. He also spoke of the necessity of an early cultivation of the ear and rhythmical feeling. My accounts of music in Boston were listened to with the utmost sympathy. The almost total deafness of Robert Franz cannot fail to awaken a feeling of sorrow among his many admirers in Boston.

"Dresden, the capital of Saxony, has always wielded a large musical influence throughout Germany. As early as under the reign of Elector August the Strong, the opera and orchestra in Dresden were considered the finest in the world. I was here directed for information to the well-known artist, Prof. Graben Hoffman, who not only has been for years the leading singing teacher in Dresden (both private and in the schools), but whose several works on music, and on "music as taught in the schools," have won for him the respect of his German colleagues. One of his works, "The cultivation of the singing voice," Dresden, 1865, is extensively used in German institutions, and is often quoted in musical writings as an unquestionable authority.

"As in most of the German cities, music is here taught twice each week, one hour at a time. The attendance of the pupil is obligatory, unless exempted for sufficient reasons, such as chronic disease of the throat or a defective ear. The first instruction in the Primary Schools is given by the teachers themselves, and begins at an age varying between six and seven years. The primary pupils are merely trained to sing in tune and good time a certain number of well selected melodies, both sacred and secular. Though simple in the extreme, the Primary School songs are well adapted, not only to acquaint the child with measure and intonation, but also to influence its musical taste very favorably.

"A child might begin to learn music," says Mr. G. Hoffman, "as early as its fifth or sixth year, if the teacher be competent and knows how to train young voices." "The objects to be attained by musical instruction in the primary schools," says Mr. Hoffman, "are those:

- a. The awakening of the musical faculties.
- b. Cultivation of the voice and ear.
- c. Singing by rote of a number of sacred (chorals) and popular songs.
- d. Preparation for singing by note.

The higher divisions will be prepared for the per-

* The following chorals, mostly dating from the first two centuries after the Reformation, are indicated for use in schools by an order of the Prussian Minister of Instruction, dated October, 1. 2. 8, 1854:

1. Auf meinen lieben Gott.
2. Ausklober Noth.
3. Erheben ist der herrlich Tag
4. Hina ist noth.
5. Herr Gott, dich loben wir.
6. Herrliebster Jesu.
7. Herrlich thut mich verlangen.
8. Jesu, meine Freude.
9. Komm, heil'ger Geist.
10. Komm, heil'ger Geist, Herr Gott.
11. Nun lob mein Seel den Herrn.
12. O Gott, du frommer Gott.
13. Schmücke dich, O liebe Seele.
14. Sollt ich meinen Gott nicht singen.
15. Was mein Gott will das gecheh alzeit.
16. Von Gott will ich nicht lassen.
17. Wer nur den lieben Gott lässt walten.
18. Wir glauben all an einen Gott.

formance, by note, of simple vocal compositions adapted for the use of schools, church and home life.

"Mentioning to Mr. G. Hoffman, the fact that we in Boston would not be satisfied with a programme thus limited, he replied that the opportunities for higher culture in music being so very abundant in the German cities, and within everybody's means, there was no harm in restricting the music lessons in the schools to the elements, either in theory or in practice, while we for contrary reasons should try to go over as much ground as the time given to music will permit. Mr. G. H. is now engaged at a work on singing, of which he kindly showed me the proofs, and I bespoke a copy of it for such uses as we shall be able to make of its suggestions. He was pleased with the description I gave him of the systems in use in our primary and grammar schools, and the earnestness and zeal of the music teachers of these departments met with his unstinted approval.

"In the (formerly) free city of Frankfurt-on-the-Main, the elementary musical instruction is in the hands of the school teachers themselves, who, if as a rule their knowledge is not very extended, have at least the habit of teaching and of proceeding systematically. No text-books are used, and for practice selections of Erk and others are studied. The recently published book by Richard Wuerst, "Guide for the elementary theory of music, with a collection of secular and sacred two-part songs for the use of schools," I found here well spoken of. Its theoretical portion is condensed in the short space of six pages, the rest of the book being filled by a really choice collection of genuine church music and excellent patriotic songs. This little work, compiled by an eminent artist, has much to recommend it. As in Erk's collection, each composition bears its chronological date. To introduce these chorals into the lower classes of our Grammar Schools, would be an excellent move, not only on account of their beauty, but also from the fact that the limited compass in which these chorals move, prevents the pupils from over-exerting themselves. Two hours, or in some cases four half hours a week, are given to music in the Frankfurt schools. The teacher of the high departments, including the higher citizens' school (hoehere Bürger-schule) and the gymnasium, is Prof. R. Mauss, a musician of scholarly acquirements, who very readily gave me the above information.

"The provisions for popular musical instruction in the kingdom of Wurtemberg are judicious, if not very ample. As in most of the German schools, every school teacher must be able to teach the rudiments of music, and only the upper classes are instructed by special teachers.

"Councillor Heigelin, member of the School Board of the city of Stuttgart (capital of the kingdom), wrote me, at my request concerning music in the schools, as follows:

1. 'Singing is taught in all the public schools.
2. Each class receives two hours' instruction per week.
3. The study of music is obligatory upon the pupils.
4. Every teacher (of primary and grammar schools) must instruct his own classes in music.
5. Musical instruction is given to the pupils when they first go to school.
6. Four lessons per week, of one-half hours' duration each, are given in the Primary Schools.
7. Pupils with defective ears or voices are exempted from singing.
8. The object of the music lessons are,—
To enable the pupils to sing the prescribed seventy chorals, children's two or three-part songs, and some easy sacred choruses."

"On leaving school the pupil is not expected to sing at sight.

"A somewhat more extended course is given to the pupils of the gymnasium, but it consists mainly of the practice of good choruses with very little theoretical instruction. It seems rather the desire of the school authorities to awaken a love for music than to promote the knowledge of it. I am not willing to underrate the importance of practising good music by rote only, but, limited to that, it certainly fails to produce such results as can be obtained by combining practice with theoretical instruction. All these points considered, it appears obvious to me that music is taught in a more thorough manner in Boston than in Stuttgart."

(Conclusion next time.)

LEIPZIG.—At the 18th Gewandhaus Concert, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony was performed for the first time here for several years. Mlle. Nantitz sang an air from Mozart's Titus, and also the series entitled "Frauenliebe und Leben." Herr Deeke, from Carlsruhe, performed the Violin Concerto, No. 7, in F minor, by Spohr, and the Romance in F major, by Beethoven.

MUNICH.—Third Soirée of the Royal Vocal Chapel.—Motet, Palestrina; "Crucifixus," Lotti; Motet, J. S. Bach; three German Folks-songs, Brahms; two Sacred Songs, Beethoven; two Madrigals, Morley, etc.—First Subscription Concert of the Musical Academy.—Overture to the Brant von Messina, Schumann; Pianoforte Concerto, Henselt (Herr von Bülow); Overture to Ali Baba, Cherubini; Fantasia on Hungarian National Melodies, Liszt; and Symphony in C major, Schubert.

PESTE. The Brothers Thern lately gave a concert, when the programme included, among other compositions, Sonata, Op. 106, in B flat major, Beethoven; Overture to König Manfred, Reinecke; "An die Nacht," Volkmann; and "Mazeppa," Liszt.

BOSTON, APRIL 10, 1869.

Music at Home.

The fortnight has been rich in good things. Among them we count two Oratorios,—one of them new, the other great; two Symphony Concerts, one on a large scale, and one on a small,—both choice; two Chamber Concerts (Listemann Quartette and Mendelssohn Quintette), besides the first of Mr. Leonhard's Piano Matinées,—all classical. Then we must add an extra (Benefit) concert of the Quintette Club, also classical; one or two Chamber Concerts of the two Conservatories; the Great Organ played by Mr. Paine, Mr. Lang, &c.,—and we think we have the list complete.

THE EASTER ORATORIOS. Mr. Costa's "Naaman" (which probably would have been called Elisha, but for Mendelssohn's Elijah) drew a large audience, but not so large as "St. Paul" the next night; it was creditably performed (considering the novelty and, withal, the strangeness), but not nearly so well, so heartily as "St. Paul," which really possessed the singers; it was enjoyed by many, after a fashion and in parts by all, but not as a whole, nor so sincerely and deeply, nor by so many as "St. Paul," which takes hold deeper down and has the hearer's soul.

"Naaman" is clever, but is not a work of genius; you would hardly expect that of the author of "Eli," the London conductor, thorough-bred, graceful musician as he is. It is pleasing—at least where the author is content to be himself and not too ambitious to keep step with the mightier ones,—but it is not great. It is frequently pathetic, sometimes imposing, oftener brilliant, but does not seem to have sprung from any strong religious sentiment, or from a deep nature, from a real inward call to write an oratorio; not from bonâ fide inspiration, so much as from the pardonable promptings of outward position, emulation and example. It cannot be called original, unless certain ingenious contrivances of effect in the way of orchestral illustration or intensification, dramatic surprises, &c., merit that distinction; for either the composer flows on easily in the manner native and habitual to him, which is Italian operatic, very good of that kind, although commonplace, or he labors after models like Elijah in too obvious imitation.

It is, however, quite dramatic (sometimes melodramatic), and herein lies perhaps its best distinction. The characterization of persons is well-considered and in the main successful. Certainly the part of the captive Jewess, Adah, the "little maid," is musically individual and charming.

And it was well suited to the pure, sweet soprano and the fervent chaste, devout expression of Miss WHITTEN, who sang it beautifully. The part of the distressed Widow and the miracle of the Oil are plainly modelled after the Widow in Elijah and come in at the same early stage in the proceedings. Miss PHILLIPS evidently had her own distress, that of a severe cold, so that she even sang out of tune for once, and with less force than usual, but artist-like, with true expression. She also sang the music of Timna, wife of Naaman, mostly recitative, except a solo with chorus: ("Be comforted") and the second voice in a Trio:—these more successfully; and very beautifully, touchingly and simply the Dream of the Child, the melody of which, however, is rather in the commonplace and sentimental modern English vein, somewhat ennobled by superior musicianship.

The scenes with the Shunamite woman contain some of the best and freshest music; for instance the Trio in the first part, which is in a nobler and less Italian stage style than most of the concerted pieces. There is real pathos, almost Handelian, in the air addressed to her dead son; and in all the part the clear, true, brilliant voice and excellent delivery of Miss GATES showed to great advantage. Costa has treated the part of the prophet Elisha, both in the cut of its recitative and melody and instrumental illustration, much after the manner of Mendelssohn's Elijah. Like that, it is the central figure of the Oratorio, dignified and grand, but far less interesting. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN rendered all intelligently and carefully, with artistic style, but in a somewhat dry, hard quality of tone, which seems unfortunately to grow upon him. Mr. JAMES WHITNEY, who sings always tastefully and with good feeling, lacks only strength for the unhealthy hero, Naaman, whose approach is always heralded by a sensational and pompous march in which form of writing Costa likes to indulge a turn for ingeniously eccentric instrumentation. His distressful utterances, with their feverish agitato accompaniment, are perhaps worthy of the subject, certainly an ill chosen one, but the music, with some fine passages, a little wearisome. The second tenor part, Gehazi, was fairly rendered by Mr. W. J. WINCH.

The most popular pieces were the two Trios and the Quartet: "Honor and Glory." These are pleasing, graceful compositions in their way, though, with the already named exception of one, they sound as if right out of the modern Italian opera;—from one of the better families thereof, which comes nearer to—Rossini? no—think of "Di tanti Regi!"—but one of the respectable juste milieu, say Costa. The Trio: "Haste! to Samaria," is bright, but trivial.

The choruses are various in character, musician-like, interesting, but they seldom rise to grandeur, nor are the most ambitious and elaborate the best. In these the parts flow less naturally and blend less generally; the intervals are difficult; and from the very fact that they were not sung with anything like the confidence and the effect to which we are accustomed in the choruses of Mendelssohn and Handel, that voices faltered and parts were faintly audible, one could infer that the music did not take hold of the singers very strongly; they could not feel it, could not give themselves away to it as in the glorious St. Paul choruses. We doubt not many of them liked the music, in details; this they might do, and yet not feel it as a whole, not be possessed with it and borne on, heart and soul and voice, in the resistless current. There is a simple grandeur, however, in the Chorale: "When famine over Israel prevailed," which is plainly harmonized, with organ, all the orchestral voices silent except the huge bass tuba. And "The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked" has a fine motive beautifully wrought out. The finale of the first part, like that in Elijah, is a chorus of praise and thanks for water after drought; and one must wonder how the composer could commit himself to such palpable imitation in almost all the salient particulars,—as the rush of the violins, the strange atmospheric modulations which convey the sense of moisture, &c. The chorus is skilfully wrought, graphic and exciting, but follows longo intervallo after "Thanks be to God who laveth the thirsty land."

The work abounds, as we have said, in striking and ingenious orchestral effects, showing great knowledge of resources, yet seeking strength and emphasis too often in barbaric brass. Several of the more melodramatic scenes, descriptions of miracles, &c., are quite suggestive.—On the whole, "Naaman" is the most important work of an accomplished musician, and was not unworthy to be brought out, considering that the Handel and Haydn Society could not get ready early enough in the season to take up the Passion Music of Bach or the "Israel" of Handel, and that, short of these great things, they had but little new to choose from. We shall be glad to hear "Naaman" again, for fear our first impression may not do it justice.

"St. Paul," on Sunday evening, was superbly rendered; the music seemed to carry all along with it. The choruses were sung with a will and came out full and round and strong; and the solos, by Miss Houston, Miss Phillips, Mr. J. F. Winch (Elijah) and Mr. James Whitney, were highly satisfactory.

QUARTET MATINEES. The LISTEMANN party presented the following selection on Friday, 26th ult.

Quartet in D minor (posthumous). . . . . Schubert.
Allegro. Andante con moto. (Schern) Allegro molto.
Presto.
First Concerto. . . . . Paganini.
Adagio and Rondo.
Mr. B. Listemann.
Trio in B flat major, Op. 97, for piano, violin, and violoncello. . . . . Beethoven.

The Schubert Quartet, which we have not heard for some years, is an engaging work of great originality. The mysterious and solemn theme of the variations in the Andante is the same with that of his song: "The young girl and Death." The Quartet was finely played. Mr. LISTEMANN excited great enthusiasm by his masterly playing of the Paganini solo; it was indeed admirable virtuosity.

The B-flat Trio of Beethoven,—the great Trio—was played by Messrs. PETERSILEA, LISTEMANN and Suck, and did not fail to make the usual deep impression.

This was the fourth and last concert of what we trust will not prove to be the last series; for it has been a true success, and has awakened a new appetite for good classical Quartet playing.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The fourth and last Chamber Concert, Tuesday, March 30, was after this programme:

Suite in Canon Form, op. 10, for two Violins, Viola, Cello and Contrabass. . . . . Julius O. Grimm.
Allegro con brio. Andante lento. Tempo di minueto.
Allegro risoluto.
Quartet in B minor, op. 8. . . . . Mendelssohn.
Allegro Molto. Andante. Allegro Molto. Finale.
Allegro Vivace.
Miss Dutton and Club.
2d Quintet (with two Cellos), in G. . . . . Boccherini.
Pastorale Amoroso and Allegro Vivace.
16th Quartet (the last) in F, op. 135. . . . . Beethoven.

The Suite by J. O. Grimm, one of the younger German composers (born in 1830, studied at Leipzig) proved an interesting novelty. It has been played of late in New York as an orchestral work, for the strings only, though the Andante was treated en quartette. It is a sound, vigorous composition, the movements well contrasted, never monotonous or dry, in spite of the persistency with which the Canon imitation is kept up through the whole. The early piano Quartet of Mendelssohn was a fortunate revival showing Miss ALICE DUTTON's powers to good advantage.—It is pleasant to get once in a while a taste of good old Boccherini, who was writing away in Spain while Haydn wrote in Vienna, and keeping up a friendly correspondence with him. He has been called "the wife of Haydn," as Luini won the title of the wife of Leonardo. Thoroughly genial, sunny, delicate and graceful are the movements of that 62nd Quintet (he was as prolific in such works as Father Haydn himself) and they were highly relished.—The last Quartet of Beethoven did not seem to win more favor or grow any clearer upon repetition, though in the Lento movement everybody felt the real Beethoven.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. The Extra Symphony Concert did not prove a great pecuniary aid to "The Musical Education of the Blind," although, thanks to the liberality of the Conductor, the soloists and several of the orchestra, who gave their services, it did yield something. The indifference of a public so eager all the winter for this kind of music is something unaccountable. There was, however, a goodly audience, and the concert in itself, artistically, was one of the very best of the whole season. Could it be otherwise, with that full orchestra of sixty, trained and assimilated by a whole winter's practice of such music, and with such a programme:

Symphony in G, No. 13, (first time this season). . . Haydn.
Adagio and Allegro. Largo. Minuet and Finale.
Pianoforte Concerto in E minor, Op. 11. . . . . Chopin.
Symphony in E flat, No. 3, (second time in Boston).
Schumann.
Overture to "Tannhäuser". . . . . Wagner.

The sunny little Haydn Symphony in G—so great a favorite last year—welcome as the sunshine which that moment, after three days of dreary March rain, stole into the Music Hall and played about upon the walls and bas-reliefs—made a most charming and enlivening introduction, thoughtfully tempered by one of the noblest and most soulful of Haydn's slow movements, the Largo. All were in the mood then to enjoy more keenly than ever the exquisite Chopin Concerto, the charm and poesy of which Mr. HUGO LEONHARD interprets so admirably. This time he left nothing to be desired.

The "Cologne" Symphony of Schumann was capably played and made a more splendid impression than before. It was indeed a triumphant achievement, and left no one in doubt that Schumann was a man of beautiful and great ideas, and knew how to bring them clearly out, with masterly, rich illustration. This led well up, by due material climax, to the Tannhäuser Overture, so that its originality and brilliancy did not seem so alien and strange, as when it follows after a more quiet Symphony of Mozart or Beethoven. Throughout the whole concert the Orchestra played never better, Mr. ZERRAHN and all his forces appearing to enter with a hearty unanimity into the spirit of the music.

Mr. B. J. LANG's first Symphony Concert, with a select Orchestra of thirty and odd instruments, at Mercantile Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, was a decided success in every respect: large and cultivated audience; fine programme (Beethoven's "Prometheus" Overture, Mozart's E flat Symphony, Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro giocoso, played by ALICE DUTTON, and the Italian Symphony), a rendering almost perfect, under his own conductorship, thorough enjoyment, and no end of congratulations at the end. This is all that we have room to say now.

Mr. LEONHARD's first Piano Matinée (Thursday, Fast Day) comes too late for report this week.

The following got crowded out last time:

March 19. The ORPHEUS MUSICAL SOCIETY, whose concert plans thus far had been defeated by the repeated illness of their director, Mr. KRIS-

MANN, gave on Friday evening an entertainment for the members and their friends, in Tremont Temple. The hall was full, the Maennerchor in good force and training, the solo artists all established favorites, and there was true enjoyment of the following programme:

Chorus, "Hymne an die Musik". . . . . Lachner.
Songs, "Dichterliebe". . . . . Schumann.
"Volkslieder".
Choruses, a. "Der Schweizer". . . . . Slicher.
b. "Der Soldat".
Song, "Er der Herrliche". . . . . Schumann.
Miss Addy Ryan.
Opus 22, "Andante spianato". . . . . F. Chopin.
Mr. Hugo Leonhardt.
Chorus, "Schöne Rührtrout". . . . . Veit.
Duet, "Unter'm Fenster". . . . . Schumann.
Miss Addy Ryan and Mr. Kreismann.
Chorus, "Das Reh". . . . . Gade.
Choruses, a. "Gondelfahrt". . . . . Gade.
b. "Die Studenten".
Song, "Wanderlied". . . . . Krebs.
Duet, "Figaro". . . . . Mozart.
Miss Addy Ryan and Mr. C. W. Langerfeldt.
Choruses, a. "Die Hohen und Wälder". . . . . Abt.
b. "Abschied". . . . . Kinkel.
Opus 18, "Arabesque". . . . . R. Schumann.
26, "Scherzino". . . . .
Mr. Hugo Leonhardt.
Songs, "Wegenlied". . . . . Banck.
"Morgengruss". . . . . Mendelssohn.
Chorus, "Grosses deutsches national-patriotisches Quodlibet". . . . . Kunz.

Mr. A. P. PECK's Annual Concert, postponed by the unfortunate illness of Mme. PAREPA-ROSA, is now fixed for next Friday evening (16th), when no doubt the friends of the efficient and obliging superintendent of the Hall, so serviceable on all good musical occasions there, will leave no place unfilled; for he has been kind to all of them, and he presents an army of attractions:—Miss KELLOGG, Miss PHILLIPS, Mrs. BROCKWAY (first appearance), Sig. LOTTI and Sig. RONCONI, for singers; Mr. T. J. PRUME, a violinist of celebrity, who will be new to us; Miss ALICE DUTTON, the pianist; besides Mr. LANG, Mr. THAYER, the organist, and others.

FARMINGTON, CONN.—Miss Porter's Young Ladies' School, under the direction of Mr. Carl Klausner, (one of the best musicians in the country, who has made excellent piano-forte arrangements of great orchestral works, and who edits Sonatas of Beethoven, Mozart, &c., with most critical accuracy), still keeps up its reputation for good classical chamber concerts. The 37th and 38th Concert took place on the 19th and 20th ult., with the following programmes:

I.
Sonata, E flat, op. 12, No. 3. . . . . Beethoven.
Messrs. F. von Inten and Theo. Thomas.
Folles d'Espagne. Variations. . . . . Corelli.
Mr. Theo. Thomas.
Chromatic Sonata in one Movement, op. 129. . . . . Raff.
Messrs. F. von Inten and Theo. Thomas.
Ballade, G minor, op. 13. . . . . Chopin.
Mr. F. von Inten.
Sonata, D minor, op. 121, in four movements.
Schumann.
Messrs. Theo. Thomas and F. von Inten.
II.
Sonata, G, (Köchel), No. 379. . . . . Mozart.
Messrs. F. von Inten and Theo. Thomas.
Variations Serieuses, op. 54. . . . . Mendelssohn.
Mr. F. von Inten.
Rondo, B minor, op. 70. . . . . Schubert.
Messrs. F. von Inten and Theo. Thomas.
Fantasia, op. 17, 3d movement. . . . . Schumann.
Mr. Von Inten.
Sonata, A, op. 47, ("Kreutzer"). . . . . Beethoven.

MONTREAL, CANADA.—Mr. Turrington, who made so good an impression when he played upon the Organ of the Boston Music Hall, gave a concert of sacred music on the 23d ult., in the Wesleyan Church, of which the Gazette says:

The programme was selected from the works of Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Haydn, Weber and Rossini, the chorus of some 60 voices being generally effective. The "Hallelujah Chorus" and the Recitative Chorus "Be not afraid" (Elijah) were both well rendered. As to the latter, if we mistake not, it is the first time it has been sung here, and was very creditably given. In the Chorus "Thanks be to God" (Elijah) there was, perhaps, room for improvement in the matter of steadiness. The Soprano solo, "On Mighty Pons" (Creation), was remarkably well given by Mrs. Caldicott.

In the second portion of the programme Weber's service in G was the principal feature. The Chorus was given with much precision, and the Quartets well rendered by Mrs. Caldicott, Mr. Thurston, Miss Ladd and Mr. Miller, with the exception that here and there the tenor was a little flat.

As to the organ solos, the "Adagio Cantabile" (from the Septuor) Beethoven, brought out some of the finest spots of the organ, such as the "Cor Anglais," "Cremona" and "Harmonic Flute," combined with the Gambas. The Grand Offertoire was well executed, the pedal passages being very effective. In the Overture to "William Tell," Mr. Torrington fully sustained his reputation as organist. His accompaniments to the choruses showed that the orchestration of the various pieces was fully understood by him, and the orchestral effects given. This was, perhaps, the most difficult part of the programme to render, as the musician has more difficulties to contend. We believe that Mr. Torrington was fully satisfied with the success of his concert, and we may add, the success was deserved.

THE FLORENTINE QUARTET party have been winning golden opinions in Paris. We translate from Le Menestrel: "Never did we hear greater perfection. It is an admirable thing to see what is realized by M. Jean Becker (a German), seconded by the irreproachable instrumentalists who accompany him on the tour of Europe.

...."Becker is truly the soul of this exceptional quatuor: he spreads life and inspiration over it. Together, these four artists seem to have present an irreproachable ideal, from which nothing can lead them astray. They have known how to place it at the service of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn; they have lent it to modern masters, several of whom have figured on their programmes, and have made an excellent figure there. Certain it is that the pieces by Rubinstein and Hartog, executed not less perfectly than the others, have equally in their way left nothing to be desired.

"And, speaking of the Presto from M. de Hartog's Suite, the musical journals of Vienna tell us that it is written with the hand of a master, and would be found already upon every desk, if it were signed Mendelssohn or Schumann. The author of that Presto must have particularly appreciated the astonishing and definitive perfection of this marvellous 'Quatuor Florentin.'—Where will you meet such unity, such vigor! Brave, M. Becker, and bravo, MM. Quartettists!" &c, &c.

An Oratorio by C. Ph. Eram. Bach, "The Israelites in the Desert," was lately given for the first time in Paris, at a Concert of the Protestant Society for Sacred Music. La France calls it a work full of science, and breathing, in several of its parts, a profoundly religious feeling.

ROSSINI'S SOLEMN MASS.—The grand performance of this great work took place at the Italian Opera for the first time on Sunday last, before a most brilliant audience. The boxes were full from the roof to the pit; the salle was one glitter of diamonds under dazzling gaslight—one wave of silk, velvet, satin and flowers. It was certainly an imposing spectacle; still, to be sincere, this evening was not so satisfactory to a lover of Rossini as the first rehearsal in the same house on the preceding evening. Then the salle was as dark as catacombs, lighted only by a few lamps which served to show up the darkness, and a ray of light which, proceeding from one of the loopholes in the upper galleries, fell directly on Alboni, Krauss, Nicolini and Agnesi in front of the stage. The background was completely in the shade, and nothing stood out behind the principal artists but the marble bust of the departed maestro, crowned with a wreath of golden laurel. A few guests and musical critics had been invited, and were dispersed in different parts of the house; their presence was scarcely noticed unless they moved or changed places, and then they had the appearance of figures feeling about in mysterious cathedral shade. Although the choruses at times hesitated, though the artists often sang their parts mezza voce, admiration was sustained from beginning to end, and when the last piece was over, it was like going forth from a sublime reverie into another world. All present met in the outer corridors with evident traces of emotion on their faces.

The Resurrexit and the Sanctus are two splendid productions; they are truly overwhelming songs of joy; but the Cum Sancto and O Salutaris are written in the other Rossinian style; they are somewhat too graceful for sacred music, and are certainly less expressive of religious adoration than of jubilant delight. A German master would have felt and illustrated otherwise, for these two pieces heard out of this work would be called rhythmic dancing music. With this exception, the whole Mass is in keeping with the Stabat. The Gratias is superb; it is a cry of melodious gratitude. It cannot be denied that the Kyrie and the Christe are the finest things Rossini has ever composed.

At the performance on Sunday Mme. Krauss was sublime; her whole soul was thrown into her part. Alboni, who has lost none of her prestige, was listened to with admiration combined with respect, for the devotedness shown by her in reappearing before the public for the execution of the great work of her best friend. Nicolini has very little to sing in the partition. Agnesi, who was formerly a chapel-master, has now acquired through the press the reputation of the "first psalmist" in Europe. The second performance is announced for this evening.—Paris Gazette, March 4.

THE COMBINED ITALIAN OPERA IN LONDON.—Messrs. Gye and Mapleson have published their scheme, from which it appears that the two companies can actually perform at the same theatre. Judging from the prospectus only, we might almost venture to say that Covent Garden had absorbed the personnel of her Majesty's Theatre. The announcement differs, indeed, so little from those which Mr. Gye has been in the habit of issuing, that it reads as though he had simply engaged some member of his rival's troupe. The theatre, the nights of performances, the prices, the orchestra and the stage-manager, are all the same as usual. There has been no change, we understand, either in the constitution of the band or in the terms on which they have been engaged. All the members of the orchestra have, with three exceptions, as we are informed, renewed their engagement. Nor is there any truth, apparently, in the report that the theatre is to be open every evening. There are to be four performances a week, as in former seasons. Signor Arditi is announced as one of the conductors, and Mr. Carrozzas as leader of the orchestra, from which we conclude that M. Sain-ton has followed the example of Mr. Costa in declining an engagement. The chorus is to be selected from those of the two theatres. We should have preferred to hear that all the fresh voices collected by Mr. Mapleson had been secured, though the long practice of the Covent Garden chorists may doubtless facilitate rehearsal. Mr. Harris, the best of all stage-managers, retains his post. The list of ladies is remarkably strong. It includes Mesdames Patti, Nilsson, and Ilma de Murska for soprani sfogati, Lucca and Tietjens for dramatic singers, Grossi and Salchi for contraltos, Vanzini and Sinico for comprimaries. The tenors include Mongini, Naudin, Tamberlik, who has not been here for three years, and Corsi, quite unknown in England. In baritones the company is as strong as in trebles; Mr. Santley (the most accomplished of all), Signor Graziani and Signor Cotogni being engaged. Signori Bagazioli, Tagliafico, Ciampi, Polonini and Foli make up the tale of buffo and bass singers. This list is a goodly one, but from it we miss two names. Trebelli and Marlo, we can ill spare. Mlle. Grossi and Mlle. Salchi both have superb and genuine contralto voices, but neither altogether replaces the highly-trained mezzo-soprano of Mme. Trebelli. We observe that Signor Corsi is put down for the tenore leggero parts—such, for instance, as Almaviva. Without prejudice to a stranger, we may say that he must be better than most new comers, if he is to make us forget Signor Mario. A long list of operas is published, into the cast of each of which the greatest possible number of popular names are inserted. But experience warns us that such brilliant combinations necessarily prove fallacious, even when made in the best faith. Two singers are several times announced for the same character, and in two instances as many as three. The question will be which of the three shall first play Margherita and Lucia, and will the others consent to follow suit? Meanwhile, we may note the first result of a coalition in the utter absence of novelty. It is stated, it is true, that "negotiations are in progress" for the performance of M. Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," but it is rare indeed for a prospectus to be issued in which not one revival is promised. Nor is "Medea," nor "Iphigenia," nor "Il Seraglio," the three revivals which have brought Mr. Mr. Mapleson most credit, even announced. If this be the effect of monopoly, music, as an art, must gain by free trade.—London Athenaeum.

MUSIC TO BE PERFORMED AT THE GRAND NATIONAL PEACE JUBILEE. 50

This book contains fifteen magnificent choruses and, independent of its particular use, is a valuable book to retain. Persons intending to hear the performances, will do well to possess books of the music.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff and italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Gervinus on Handel and Shakespeare.

From Ferdinand Hiller's Letters to the "Kölnische Zeitung."

May I ask permission to offer some observations on Gervinus's last book, Handel and Shakespeare, though that interesting work has already found an enthusiastic panegyrist in your paper? No musician should neglect reading it, since he will find nowhere else such abundant opportunities for experiencing delight, for feeling angry, for indulging in reflections, for being convinced and agreeing, and for passionately denying. Grand views, petty omissions, firmly based conclusions, and inward discrepancies, alternate with each other—it would be necessary to write another book to do justice, in a certain sense, to this one. This is what I am certainly not able to do, and if I venture to adopt, in reference to a man like Gervinus, a style of language which scarcely becomes me, I am fortified by the consciousness of feeling as a perfect layman in the history and the æsthetics of musical art, a fact to which Gervinus ascribes so high a significance in the case of that art.

The author commences with the subject of music, and its origin. Tone is, according to him, "the object of imitation" for musical art. Ought we not rather to regard tone as the material with which music works? But, by tone, Gervinus understands, as we shall presently see, not acoustically measured tone, but absolute sound (Schall und Klang), and, above all, the accent of the feelings in the discourse.

The period when man possibly worked his way from scarcely articulated emotional sounds to speech, and to song, has always afforded an opportunity for all sorts of hypotheses. Did he, as Lucretius and Gervinus assume, learn anything from singing-birds? Decidedly not—nothing that led to song, which, more than aught else should express human feelings—we should much rather seek in the imitation of song the origin of instrumental virtuosity. One of the oldest records of mankind speaks of instrumental music, which is so strongly impugned by Gervinus. In the fourth chapter of the first Book of Moses we read: "And his brother's name was Jubal; he was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ." In what grey antiquity a the fathers of those who compose our orchestras lost! It is a pity that the father, properly speaking, of the race was not worth much!

Man himself is the most perfectly constructed singing-bird, and the throat of no nightingale can be compared with that of a Sontag or of a Malibran. A question of far greater importance, however, would be whether an antediluvian "Jodeler" required a "Schnadelpuffer," on which to compose his singsong, and whether he invented the words and the tones at the same moment, or whether, like the lark, he poured forth his voice freely over hill and dale. If the last was possible (Prof. Vogl must be consulted on the point), we obtain for music an absolute basis, which no philosophy and no æsthetics can overthrow.

For Gervinus, however, "emphasis is the mother of language;" on the mediæval maxim: "accentus mater musices," reposes, he asserts, "the entire system of musical æsthetics." He proceeds to explain at length, in the most eloquent manner, how the strongly accentuated and vividly modulated delivery of a speaker contains in itself a kind of music, and, hence, that music has not really to invent anything new, but merely to master the current emotions in speech, in order to attain its ends. To meet the objection that, in this manner, musical art could attain only to recitative, but never to a rounded melody, far less to a piece of musical composition, he has first recourse to the history of musical art, commencing with the music of the Greeks.—The Greeks! what artist's heart does not beat more strongly on hearing that name! And what Gervinus says so beautifully about the way in which their life has permeated art, and about the mutually permeating life of their arts, fills one with yearning, and almost with sadness. Will there ever arise another public in the world such as the public of Athens probably was? Hardly, for some time—neither in Germany, France, England, or anywhere else. With regard to art, the civilized peoples of the world at present, widely separated as they are from each other, are united in one homogeneous nation—that of snobism.

What the learned author says of the music of the Greeks is, it is true, in many of the details, incomprehensible to the musician, but amounts to what we have been taught from our youth upwards: that their music can be conceived only in combination with their poetry, round which it twined, as the ivy twines round the oak. Who would doubt that the most elevated poetry, with its rich rhythms strengthened by beautiful tones, produced the most extraordinary effect upon the people from whose genius it sprang? But what is gone is gone; we willingly believe in it, but we cannot picture it. Our recitative, which, it is true, owes its origin to the attempt to revive Greek music, has, leaving out of consideration many other details, for its basis, harmony, with which the Ancients were not acquainted. Gervinus, who assigns a high position to recitative, appears to overlook the enormous importance of this one of its factors, when he ascribes the grand effects of recitative to the purely declamatory part of it, or at least asserts that it can attain such effects without extraneous means.

Supported by new and important historical researches (above all by those of the learned Ambros), Gervinus gives us a summary of the development of part-song in the Middle Ages—the summary being interspersed with extremely clever reflections—and dedicates a hymn of the most deserved admiration to Palestrina, when he comes to that composer. Yet this is precisely where we reach a point at which the basis of the author's system of musical æsthetics proves insufficient. We will assume that the separate voices in the works of the old Roman school sang not only simply, nobly and expressively, but in the closest connection with the accent of the words, yet with this their pure, grand effect had nothing to do. That effect is to be sought in the wonderful manner in which the different parts flow into each other, in the mystically sublime and passionless harmonies which they form, in the expression of the Eternal and endless resulting from this succession of sounds, without a division, and perfectly unattainable by single strains, however full of soul and profundity. The words of the text, when sung, are even for the best Latin scholars, mostly unintelligible, as each voice sings different ones. If we make ourselves acquainted with them, we shall feel their influence only in the most general features of the composition. If Gervinus succeeded in building up dramatic music, then in course of development, entirely upon his theory of accent, he would have to leave on one side a whole separate branch of art, complete in itself, and of which Palestrina must be regarded as the highest representative. But this cannot very well be done.

We come to the folk's song, to which an interesting section is devoted. Its age, its application, and employment are discussed, the magnificence of its melody is extolled, and the author then makes the assertion: "The movement of the feelings is the generating and creative power in melody as in all music." Here then we have the confession that a musical thought can flow freely from the soul of an inspired composer; but, with an interrupted cadence, the author quickly modulates back again to the words, and concludes with "melody that has grown out of natural emphasis" instead of the primitively generated melody. "A single strophe in a folk's song once put him on the track of the intellectual foundation of music." This is doubly interesting, for nothing is less calculated to prove his views than this very thing—folk's song. The same folk's melody serves not only for the various strophes of the same song, but serves in its entirety for different songs. The separate words in the latter are accentuated with tolerable grammatical correctness, but those most insignificant in sense have frequently the greatest stress. With the more delicate accent of feeling, such as art-music offers, it is exceedingly unusual to meet. What strikes us as so charming and precious in beautiful, genuine folk's melodies is precisely the freshness of the musical thought, that appears to have gushed forth like a mountain spring. If not produced before the verse to which—as is still at the present day the case with the Italian improvisatori—it might then serve as a kind of metrical guide, it was probably produced at the same time. To, or from it, certainly in exceptional cases alone.

The course of development through which, as we know, the branches of dramatic music (opera and oratorio) passed, and the progress of instrumental accompaniment and of instrumental music form the matter of the following sections. As the author does not make the slightest pretension to give us his own historical researches, but simply to deduce results for his ideas from what has already been achieved, it must be my task to reproduce, in a compressed shape, these ideas of his at this important point. The perfected imitation, then, of the sounds expressing our feelings furnishes the material by which music is enabled to perform what it has to do, namely, to represent artistically the endless world of those feelings. But it is only by words that it obtains sense and significance; separated from them, it becomes purely formal. Instrumental music can aid in augmenting the capability of expression possessed by words when sung—but purely instrumental music finds no justification before æsthetic reason; it can, at most, only possess a technical interest for musicians and connoisseurs. Handel is the composer who has fulfilled all the requirements of musical art more completely than any other. No other has produced so much that is profound, beautiful, and perfect, as he. All the æsthetics of musical art may be developed from him; from him may examples be drawn of all that musical art can do, and ought to do. This, unless I am mistaken, is the quintessence of all the views propounded by Gervinus.

Many objections may, I think, be raised to this. Above all, it must again be asserted that man received from Nature the gift and the impulse to express himself musically, without being urged thereto by words, and without leaning on them for support. We sing as loudly as our throat permits, and with our whole soul, because our soul yearns, and our throat is formed to sing. Thus the first place in man's love will always be assigned to vocal music, not because, borne by the words, it creates, as it were, a body, for impalpable feelings, but because in it the beautiful world of tune is opened up to us by that organ which, being a piece of ourselves, moves us more sympathetically than any other. This joy in the shapes of the world of tune, as such, the shuddering paroxysms, perhaps never to be explained, of emotion, of lofty feeling, and of ecstasy, into which they plunge us, constitute the foundations of our relations to that world. The musically Beautiful affects us, as such, as that clever writer, Dr. Hanslick, has admirably put it in his much discussed work, though he has not, perhaps, done full justice to the capability of expression possessed by musical art. Let any one observe, without prejudice, himself and others. Whether we listen to the naive folk's song, or whether Handel's "Hallelujah," borne upwards on a thousand voices, greets our ears, it is, in the first place, the charm of a melodic bud, scarcely opened, and, in the latter, the power and magnificence of the united elements of the entire world of tone, that charms or inspires us. That in the one instance we have to do with a simple swain's sweetheart, and in the other with the Kingdom of Heaven, has no share in the first, immediate, impression produced on us; that impression is purely musical in its nature, and would not fail to make itself felt, even if we did not, or could not, understand the words.

Christine Nilsson in Paris.

BY PARKE GODWIN.

[Correspondence of the Evening Post].

Paris, March 25, 1869.

There has been a little musical war here, not so violent as that which formerly raged between the Gluckites and the Piccinists, when the two schools of German and Italian music were struggling for the ascendancy, but very much of the same nature. The French, I must premise, are not originally a musical people, that is, in the sense in which the Italians and Germans, and even the Spaniards, are musical. If they were, that most stupendous of all architectural abortions, intended as the world's consummate temple of music, the new opera house, would not be permitted to cumber the ground for a week. Mr. Hausmann, who pulls down whole blocks of buildings with the facility of a monsoon, would have demolished it long since. If they were, the lateral facades of that edifice, adorned with busts and medallions of the great composers, would not have exhibited so few French names in the midst of so many that are either German or Italian. Boieldieu, Halévy, Herold and Auber are almost the only immortals that the French have to put beside the Pergoleses, the Cimarosas, the Rossinis, the Bellinis, the Haydns, the Bachs, the Mozarts, the Meyerbeers, the Mendelssohns and the Beethovens of other nations.

In consequence of this want of an original aptitude for music, it has become very much a matter of mere fashion. The enormous afflux of strangers in Paris, who come hither mainly to be amused, and who spend money lavishly on all forms of amusement, naturally attracts also a swarm of performers and artists, who consider a Parisian success as the final cachet of eminence, as a passport to success everywhere else. Jenny Lind, who had as much respect for herself as a woman as she had of veneration for her art, never would consent to submit her claims to so incompetent a tribunal. She never sang in Paris, and nevertheless managed to achieve a tolerable fame in the world. Few artists, however, can afford to be as independent as Jenny Lind was, and therefore they are compelled to go through the ordeal of a Parisian judgment. If they fail in it, they fancy themselves relegated forever to the lower ranks of the profession, if not wholly excluded from it; while success in it is regarded as the very stamp and signet of an unchallengeable excellence. Of course there is an immense strife for this so potent matriculation, and no end of rivalries and combats and intrigues among the candidates for its prizes and awards. "God grant me," says Victor Hugo, in one of his Prefaces, "proper repentance for having exposed the virgin obscurity of my name and person to the snares and squalls and tempests of the theatre, and above all to the wretched broils of the coulisses; for having entered into that most fitful, foggy, stormy atmosphere, where ignorance dogmatizes, where envy hisses, where cabal reigns or crawls, where the probity of talent is so often unrecognized, where the noble candor of genius is so generally displaced, where mediocrity triumphs by reducing superiority to its own level; in short, where there are so many little men for one great man, so many nullities for each Talma, so many myrmidons for each Achilles." Hugo has had no reason to be displeased with his own career as a dramatist, and his description is, on that account, all the more trustworthy and sincere.

The young Swedish singer, Miss Nilsson, has just gone through one of these periodical Parisian hurries of jealousy and intrigue, and as she proposes visiting the United States soon, it may perhaps entertain your readers to have some account of the affair. Miss Nilsson, being from the North, as you are aware, and a perfectly simple hearted and pure-minded young woman, does not so readily appeal to the French imagination, as a more sprightly, coquettish and easy-going child of the South would. She is as severe in her personal deportment as she is conscientious in her practice of her art. For several years she was permitted to sing here, at the Lyrique, a minor establishment, without attracting much attention from the native public. Her exquisite and flexible voice was admired, and the genuineness of her acting admitted; but she was nevertheless kept in second parts, while Mme. Carvalho took the first. The decided success, however, she won in London last June (where, you may remember, she, our own Kellogg, and Tietiens, entered the lists against Patti and Lucca) brought her more prominently forward in Paris. She was engaged for the Grand Opera, and her performances during the summer of the part of Ophelia, in a very poor opera called "Hamlet," secured her the leading place for the winter. Ophelia was so genuine and beautiful a creation that the most cynical of the critics were compelled to confess its merits, while the public thronged the parterres and the boxes. It was an unquestionable success, but not, I think, a success which amounted to an enthusiasm. The Americans, Germans and English went a little wild perhaps; but the French admiration was rather tepid than fervent—an approval extorted by undeniable merit more than a spontaneous outbursting delight.

In this state of feeling, it was determined by the management to bring out the opera of Faust, and to assign the part of Margaret to Nilsson. The opera had already been performed at the Lyrique, where Mme. Carvalho had produced a very favorable impression by her rendering of the principal female figure; and Nilsson, with a delicacy and generosity that is characteristic of her, offered to leave the part to her predecessor. But this the management would not listen to, and she accordingly undertook the rather ungrateful task of appearing in a part of which another had already formed the ideal in the public mind. She undertook it, however, as she does everything, with a determination to give it her own way—after the models that her own artistic genius and instincts might dictate, and not the accepted formulas. A careful student of German literature, she strove to realize the conception which Goethe had in his own mind, that of a pure, artless, simple, unsophisticated German girl, suddenly dazzled and seduced into crime, and then abandoning herself to a remorseless remorse and despair; and she has done it with a wonderful truthfulness of general form as well as of fidelity in detail. In person, expression, mien, dress, everything, she seems as if she had just stepped out of one of Ary Scheffer's pictures or of Kaulbach's drawings. She is the impersonation of unsuspecting purity—guileless, sweet, candid, modest and self-restrained—but with a tinge, perhaps, of melancholy in her face and bearing, as if the gentle mirror of her soul already reflected the dark shadows of evil gathering about her, and soon to wrap her away in storm and darkness and death.

I know not whether the French have been taught to believe that Margaret was an alert city maiden with the manners of a soubrette, or of a Parisian shop-girl; but this conception of the character did not please them. They accused Nilsson of coldness, of want of animation, of monotony of tone; in short, of nothing less than a signal failure. One of the more brutal critics went so far as to announce her debut in it as "a splendid triumph—for Mme. Carvalho." Another intimated that she ought to be withdrawn after so tame and lifeless a performance. Even the ordinarily stately and dignified Revue des Deux Mondes lent itself to the task of depreciation and found fault with her voice (which is incomparably fine) as well as with her general realization of the role. But the verdict was by no means unanimous. Theophile Gautier of the Journal Officiel, one of the most competent judges, was extremely eulogistic, and M. Ernest Feydeau, of the Revue Nationale, than whom there is no more capable and independent writer, battled manfully in her behalf. The latter, indeed, has written an eloquent and discriminating appreciation of her genius, which I will translate and send you as soon as it appears. All the Germans and Americans, and many of the English—all those, indeed, of every nation who appreciate the original creation of Goethe—upheld and applauded the rendering of the young Swede. Their opinion was expressed by the critic of Galvani, who averred that although he had seen every prominent singer in Europe, who had essayed the part, Nilsson alone had reached the spiritual and lovely conception of the poet. This has, at length, become the settled judgment, and a consequence of the little uproar has been, that for all the remaining nights of her engagement—twenty or more—not a box, not a stall, hardly a place to stand upon, is to be had for love or money, while Nilsson is in such demand for private concerts that she has scarcely a night to herself or for rest. A complete triumph over prejudice, ignorance and rivalry has never been achieved by an artist.

While I am speaking of the subject of Art, will you allow me, by the way, to commend to your readers a new publication devoted to the general subject—La Revue Internationale—which promises a more intelligent, disinterested and independent consideration of the subject than is commonly found in that class of magazines.

Music in the Public Schools of Boston.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON MUSIC.

The account of the nature, manner and extent of popular musical instruction in Bavaria (the country in which Mr. Eichberg received his own early musical education) is so full and so interesting that we copy it entire:

"In no part of Germany," says Mr. Eichberg, "does music receive more attention than in Bavaria and in Bavarian schools. By Royal decree, dated 29th September, 1866, concerning the education of teachers, their musical studies are fixed as follows:

FIRST COURSE.

(A) Singing.—General rules for the cultivation of the voice, breathing, position of mouth and body. Practice of major and minor scales, general musical theory, practice of intervals and singing of short songs within the diatonic scale.

(B) Piano.—Knowledge of the key board, notes and measures, five notes finger exercises, easy major and minor scales.

Books to be used.—Piano Method, by Wohlfahrt, Part I.; finger exercises by A. Schmitt, one hundred exercises by Czerny and Eukhausen's first Beginning.

(C) Violin Playing.—Position of the body. Practice of scales and intervals.

Book used.—Hohmann's Violin School, Part 1.

SECOND COURSE.

(A) Singing.—Practice of more difficult intervals. Use of accidents. Singing of two-part songs for soprano and alto. Attention to be given to correct breathing.

(B) Piano.—More difficult scales in two octaves, continuation of Czerny's one hundred exercises and Wohlfahrt's Piano method.—Sonatas by Mozart and Haydn.

(C) Violin.—All the scales in Hohmann II.

(D) Harmony.—Intervals. Theory of consonances and dissonances. Major and minor triads and connection of the same. Playing the perfect cadences by heart, in every way.

THIRD COURSE.

(A) Singing.—The preceding exercises have enbled the pupils (unless hindered by mutation of voice) to assist in the church choirs.

"For Catholic institutions the practice of easy Latin or German masses is required; for Protestant institutions, the practice of easy motets by Rink or Drobisch, as also the chorals of moderate difficulty from the Bavarian Church Melody Book, by Zahn.

(B) Piano.—Practice of Bertini, op. 29. Running passages by Czerny. Sonatas by Haydn, Clementi and Mozart. Four hand exercises by Bertini.

(C) Organ.—Explanation of the pedals and the various stops. Practice of simple cadences.

Book used.—Rink's first three months on the organ.

(D) Violin.—Progressive practice of exercises and duets. Hohmann's Book III. Practice of violin—parts from works by Michael Haydn, Mozart and others.

(E) Harmony.—Inversion of triads and their connection with triads. Chords of Seventh. Book used, Foerster's Examples I. The conducting of church music being among the duties of school teachers, pupils of the preparing school should now get acquainted with the use and nature of the several stringed and wind instruments, as afterwards, when in the seminary, but little time can be given for this purpose. Nevertheless the study of these instruments is not obligatory on the pupils.

"The plan of lessons for the Preparing School is as follows:

COURSE I. AND II.

Religious Instruction.....	3 hours per week.
German Language.....	6 " "
Arithmetic.....	4 " "
Geography.....	2 " "
History.....	2 " "
Natural History.....	2 " "
Calligraphy.....	2 " "
Drawing.....	2 " "

29 " "

"Religious Instruction, the study of the German Language, of Arithmetic and of Music are considered the principal branches, insufficient progress in either of which entails with it the repetition of the course. But if insufficiency in music is owing to lack of talent and not of industry, no repetition of the course is necessary.

PART II.

SEMINARIES FOR TEACHERS.

Chapter 10.—Music.

COURSE I.

"(A) Singing. (a) Catholic Seminaries.—Theory of choral singing. Practice of Psalm melodies, antiphonies, and other Church songs. Practice of one-part chorals, with the organ accompaniment played by the student.

(b) Protestant Seminaries.—Learning by heart of chorals, from the Bavarian Choral Book for the Protestant Church. Zahn's harmonization of chorals, for male voices; also, the four-part songs, by J. Rietz.

(B) Piano.—School of velocity, by Czerny. Organ lessons to be prepared on the piano.

(C) Organ.—Review of the lessons from the preparing school. Use of pedals. Preludes by Rink and others. Protestants to practice the whole of the Bavarian Melody-Book, as also preludes, by Herzog and Ett.

(D) Violin.—Hohmann, Book IV. Review of previous studies. Practice in orchestra playing.

(E) Harmony.—Theory of connected chords of the seventh and their inversions. Prolongations, their inversions. Organ-point. Playing of figured basses. Foerster's Examples B, II. and III.

COURSE II.

"(A) Singing.—Protestant Seminaries.—Church Songs of the 16th and 17th centuries by Zahn. Volks-Klaenge, for male voices, by Erk. Sacred choruses, for male voices, by W. Greet.

(B) Piano.—To be considered as a preparatory study for the organ. The more advanced students to practice sonatas by Beethoven, and Clementi's Graviss ad Parnassum.

(C) Organ.—Protestant Seminaries.—J. S. Bach's chorals, for four mixed parts, as preparation for the more difficult preludes. Study of the longer preludes and chorals, by Herzog and Ett. Extemporaneous preludes. System of ancient tonalities.

(D) Violin.—Hohmann, Part V. By diligent practice the student ought to acquire the capability of playing the first violin part of orchestral works, by Haydn and Mozart, correctly.

(E) Harmony.—Theory of modulations, demonstrated by the student, both in writing and at the piano. Four-part harmonization of chorals, or other given subjects. The study of the other instruments, without being obligatory, is advisable. The most advanced students are to practice orchestra playing once a week. The practice of so-called brass music is forbidden.

"Religious Instruction, German Language, Arithmetic, Mathematics, Theory of Teaching and Music are to be considered the principal branches; the other branches secondary.

"The following is the division of hours in the Royal Bavarian Seminaries for Teachers, both courses being equal:

Religious Instruction.....	3 hours per week.
German Language.....	4 " "
Arithmetic and Mathematics.....	3 " "
Geography.....	1 " "
Natural History.....	2 " "
Science of Teaching.....	5 " "
Natural Philosophy.....	2 " "
Drawing.....	2 " "
Music.....	6 " "
Total.....	30 " "

"The following is a schedule, to be filled up at the annual examinations:

Natural Disposition.	Moral Conduct.
I. Very great.	Very praiseworthy.
II. Great.	Praiseworthy.
III. Sufficient.	Satisfactory.
IV. Little.	Not free from blame.
Industry.	Progress.
I. Very great.	Very great.
II. Great.	Great.
III. Satisfactory.	Satisfactory.
IV. Unsatisfactory.	Unsatisfactory.

"According to Section 75, students applying for situations as school teachers, must have received at least No. III. for their musical qualifications.

[The mode of ascertaining the standing of the candidates in their studies must be necessarily omitted here.

"In all the Bavarian cities where school seminaries are established there exist, as branch establishments, Public Music Schools, where the seminarists receive their musical instruction. These music schools are, like the seminaries, under the supervision of the Director of Public Instruction in Munich, and an annual sum is provided by the Budget for their maintenance. The Royal Music School in Würzburg is the oldest of these institutions, having been founded on the 18th of April, 1804, since which date it has given a sound musical instruction to countless school-teachers, and in consequence has vastly advanced the cause of music in Bavaria. Although designed at first as a branch to the Würzburg Seminary, it has long since outgrown these limits, and has become one of the most prominent of German-Musical High Schools, from which numbers of eminent men have graduated in succession. The founder and first Director was the celebrated Dr. Joseph Fröhlich, Professor of Æsthetics, at the Würzburg University, one of the profoundest musical theorists of the century. After his death, in 1862, he was succeeded by the present Director, Mr. T. G. Bratsch, to whose kindness I owe a host of interesting facts concerning the good work that is being done in the Bavarian schools.

"In these schools singing is not merely tolerated, but forms a principal part in the common-school education. Pupils are not permitted to show a listless, indifferent manner at their music lessons, but are made to understand that this branch of education is considered by the school authorities as equally important with the 'three R's,' as we call them. Select voices from the public schools are occasionally allowed to join the seminarists in the performance of some important musical work, such as cantatas and oratorios;—and I have before me the programmes of Hieron's oratorio, 'Jerusalem,' and Spohr's oratorio, 'Our Saviour's Last Moments,' performed solely by the seminarists and select pupils of the public schools,—including solo parts, choruses and the full orchestra.

"Such results speak for themselves, and to the honor of the venerable music school which brought all this about.

"I was present, by invitation, at the musical examination of aspirants to the seminary, and when it is taken into consideration that it comprised singing, organ-playing, violin and piano, some short comings in any of these branches will not be wondered at. The choral and orchestral forces of the music schools (composed as above stated of seminarists and pupils of the public schools), meet, assisted by the music teachers, twice a week for the practice of oratorios and symphonies. The public are admitted to those exercises without charge or any formality whatsoever. The exercises are conducted alternately by the most advanced students, under the supervision of Mr. Bratsch.

"No musical text-books are in use in Bavarian schools, but the teacher uses the blackboard for the theoretical instruction; and for choral practice, in addition to the publications of L. Erk and Greef, selections from cantatas, motets or masses within their reach."

"The course of my investigations," adds Mr. Eichberg, "led me to visit other of the principal cities in Germany and elsewhere, but the results of my observations are not of sufficient importance to be added to this already lengthy report."

"In conclusion Mr. Eichberg calls the attention of the Committee to some points of interest, of a practical nature, suggested by his observations and experience during his visit, in regard to one of which, as bearing upon the interests of the branch of instruction under his immediate charge in the Girls' High and Normal School in this city, we quote from his report in full.

"It is the opinion of the most experienced class-teachers in Europe that, to make the lessons successful, the classes must be so limited in numbers as to enable the teacher to get acquainted with each pupil's voice, ear and musical disposition. This is not possible if the class number more than sixty to seventy pupils. No music-teacher can effectively control the progress of larger classes, and without it the results obtained must always be more or less superficial. It happens in all such large classes that the pupils sitting far from the teacher benefit little or nothing from his observations, partly because he cannot hear them sing, and partly, from a fact known to all class-teachers, that no pupils will give a live interest to musical studies unless they feel themselves under the constant control of the teacher. If in addition to large numbers, the music-room should happen to be ill-ventilated, drowsiness will quickly take the place of that close attention without which no kind of lessons can be truly successful. In the High School department, which has been placed under the writer's direct supervision as to musical instruction, a strict limitation of the size of the classes is of urgent necessity.

"It is the desire of the Music Committee that the graduates of the Boston Girls' High and Normal School, if called upon to teach in the schools, shall also be able to effectively assist the special music teacher in his duties by rehearsing the lessons with the pupils. In consequence of this the pupils of the aforesaid school ought, in addition to their theoretical lessons and choral practice, to become acquainted with the best method of cultivation of their voice; they must learn how to use the different registers, to connect them, to beware of faulty emission of tones. In a class numbering one hundred and sixty to one hundred and seventy-four young ladies most of this cannot be done, as the teacher is prevented from ever hearing them singly. Although the writer's efforts have often been kindly acknowledged by the chairman and members of the honorable committee, yet he feels that the above stated reasons prevent him from doing all that ought to be done and that could be done if the classes were properly limited."

The following is a list of the works selected by Mr. Eichberg, in Europe, having a bearing upon public musical instruction, which is added in the Appendix to his Report.

27. A. Rubinstein. The Water Fairy,—Female Chorus with alto solo.
28. Franz Liszt. Christmas Carol, for three female voices.
29. H. Marachner. Five three-part Songs.
30. Robert Schumann. Three-part Song (No. 2).
31. Ferd. Hiller. Eight Songs for three female voices (No. 2).
32. M. Hauptmann. Twelve canons for three soprano voices (two books).
33. Radecke. Evening Bells—Duet with female chorus.
34. Radecke. Three Terzets, without accompaniment.
35. Reissiger. Three hymns for three parts.
36. J. Stern. Fairy Questions.
37. R. Eisner. Terzett "Spring's Blue Ribbon."
38. R. Eisner. Sweet Airs Awakening.
39. B. Klein. Six Terzetta.

All the above-named works, together with Mr. Eichberg's report, have been placed in the hands of the Music Committee, and are now in the custody of the City Auditor for future reference and use.

Rossini's Messe Solennelle.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

With the half-affected modesty peculiar to him, Rossini called his latest work petite. The term will not hold. Neither in dimensions nor in character is the Messe Solennelle a little thing. In sacred music it is its author's masterpiece. Written at Passy in 1863, this work was first performed on March 13, 1864, at the house of Count Pillet-Will, before an invited audience of some 250 persons. The Sisters Marchisio, Signor Gardoni, and Signor Agnesi were soloists, the Conservatoire pupils acted as chorus; MM. Mathias, Peruzzi (pianofortes) and Lavignac (harmonium) accompanied, and M. Jules Cohen conducted. A lively writer in Le Figaro gives us a glimpse of the banker's salon while the performance is taking place. We see Rossini turning over for M. Mathias, with Carlotta Marchisio on his right, and her sister Barbara on his left. In a corner sits Auber, calmly listening, and whenever the music ceases, chatting with Mario, who stands leaning upon the back of his chair. Meyerbeer is near Rossini, applauding with vigor, moving restlessly upon his seat, "like St. Lawrence upon his gridiron," and once jumping up to embrace the hero of the occasion; while behind him Duprez shows what are called son torse d'Hercule et sa face Rubelaisienne. The work, as then performed, had a success great enough to bring upon Rossini one of his rare fits of industry, and he promptly scored it for full orchestra. Why he did not publish it is hard to tell. Assuredly nobody has benefited by the delay, save, perhaps, Mme. Rossini, whose sale of the Mass to M. Strakosch quickly followed her husband's death.

From the Stabat to the Messe Solennelle is a long stride in the direction of orthodox religious music. Rossini once told Ferdinand Hiller that he wrote the former mezzo serio, and never intended it for public use. However this may have been, we know that just then the master had not forgotten his old vocation. There is truth in the familiar criticism that he introduced the theatre to the sanctuary. His Mother of Sorrows weeps in the glare of footlights before a property cross. The man must be bold who would now say a word against the Stabat as music, but as religious music it is safe to assert that the religious element is in great part wanting. Happily Rossini did not pass away without showing himself able to supply this lacking feature. In nothing is the Messe Solennelle so remarkable as in the sacred dignity of style to which it here and there attains. While permitting us to recognize the master with whom everybody is familiar, it shows him partially clad in the sober garments of a Church composer. With undoubted Rossinianism is mixed up that which we did not before know to be Rossinian at all. The latter is a genuine surprise, and almost justifies Paris for raving about one particular fugue as though no such thing had ever before been written. It is strange, indeed, to see the man whose early breaking away from contrapuntal studies foreshadowed the character of his music, and who lived to flood the world with melody, at the last producing a work rich in scientific devices. The composer of Semiramide and Cenerentola a writer of fugues and double canons!—such is the revelation of the Messe Solennelle. At least one good result will follow. Those who say Rossini was a mere maker of tunes from necessity rather than from choice must forever hold their peace. To such detractors Guillaume Tell and the Stabat were severe blows. The Mass completes what those works began. It proves that had Rossini chosen he might have taken his place with the greatest scholastic writers. The proof comes late, and its cogency may lie more in the advance shown than in the point reached, but the question of ability is settled. We have already intimated that a good deal of the Mass is in its composer's familiar style. Yet even here, certain exceptions apart, we recognize unusual elevation and dignity, while the entire work shows that, at seventy-two, Rossini made a serious effort to write music worthy of the highest object to which music can be applied. As now published the Mass consists of fourteen numbers, including an "O Salutaris" not heard at the first performance, having since been made part of the work. With the instinct of an operatic composer, Rossini has freely used the solo voices. Out of thirteen vocal numbers six are devoted exclusively to them, and they are also largely employed in conjunction with the chorus. Few will complain of this, since it answers concert-room purposes not less than it increases effect. As a work of constructive skill the Mass has at least one fault. Like Mendelssohn's St. Paul, it begins in one key and ends in another. Apart from this, the general design is excellent, and its carrying out is marked by novel features of a special value.

The "Kyrie" (A minor), divided into two parts after a common fashion, begins with eight bars of instrumental prelude, chiefly remarkable for an agitated bass, which is a striking feature of the number. The voices enter successively in imitation, but the contrapuntal character of the opening bars is not sustained, and we soon recognize the sensuous harmonist of the Stabat. The movement, however, is extremely interesting, and, sung sotto voce nearly throughout, has an impressive effect. In the "Christe" (C minor) Rossini altogether changes his style. It is a short double canon on the octave for voices alone, such as might have been written by the most facile of early Italian masters. Noting its ingenuity and the easy flow of its parts, one would imagine the composer had devoted years to musical scholastics. This finished, the "Kyrie" is resumed in C major, with an amplification in A major, in which key it ends. The six numbers of the "Gloria" make one complete design admirable in its unity. A brief, vigorous, and broadly harmonized allegro (F major) proclaims "Gloria in excelsis Deo," and is followed by an andantino of peculiar construction, because built almost wholly upon alternate tonic and subdominant chords, which pass by abrupt modulations from key to key. The effect is strange and somewhat forced. It is such, in fact, as we should have looked for in a work by M. Gounod rather than in one by Rossini. But the master reasserts himself in the "Gratias" (A major), a trio for contralto, tenor, and bass. A melody of true Rossinian beauty is given out by the last-named voice and successively taken up by the others. Repeated in full harmony, it yields place to a second subject not less marked by elegant treatment. That this number will have an immense popularity we do not doubt, nor will we say that it does not deserve popularity even as religious music. At any rate it is the perfection of graceful and expressive writing. The "Domine Deus" is a long and ambitious tenor solo in D major, for which, effective though it be when well sung, we do not predict the triumph of "Cujus animam." It is melodious, but its themes are somewhat trite. The French critics have almost unanimously passed over this air, and we shall not accuse them of injustice. But they dwell long and lovingly upon the "Qui tollis," a duet in F minor for soprano and contralto. "Le 'Qui tollis,'" says M. Jouvin of the Figaro, "nous ouvre la monde des anges. Quelle melodie! quelle suavité!" and, addressing a votary of strict church music who is supposed to ask, "Suis-je sur terre ou dans les cieux?" he exclaims, "Vous êtes sur terre, mais dans cette contrée où Dieu place son Eden, et le pommier de notre mère Eve porte, non des pommes, mais des mélodies." Beneath this extravagance there is, however, not a little of justice. The "Qui tollis" is a beautiful creation. Clearly the work of him who wrote "Quis est homo," it is more elevated in style and expression than that famous duet. There are few things in music more intensely earnest than its plea for mercy, and few changes more happy than that into the tonic major, which well depicts the clearing away of doubt and fear. We might say something about the "Quoniam," an elaborate bass air in A major, were it not followed and overshadowed by the "Cum sancto." Taking thought for unity, Rossini commences the latter with the short allegro which opens the "Gloria." This leads to the fugue (F major) already mentioned as having set Paris by the ears. We are apt to over-estimate an unexpected good, and it was natural for the French critics to exhaust their copious vocabulary of praise in this instance. Here are some of the expressions used:—"Page monumentale," "une page Michel-angélique," "une page sublime," "vraiment colossal," "quelle fugue, grand Dieu! Depuis qu'il y a sur la terre de fugues et des fugistes, on n'en vit jamais de pareille." These terms are but a little too strong for what is really a great and noble effort. Truly, the "maker of melodies" was a maker of melodies and something more. He here works his subject with the ease of an accomplished fuguist and with admirable effect. Moreover, he appears thoroughly in love with his task. When a dominant pedal ughers in a long diminuendo and as long a succession of rich and solid harmonies, the master seems drawing to an end. Not so, however; a few bars before coming back to the tonic a crescendo begins, and upon a full close the fugue starts again as vigorously as ever, finishing at length with a magnificent coda, heralded by the voices alone repeating "Gloria in excelsis."

The "Credo" (E major) shows even greater felicity of design than its predecessor. As a rule this part of a mass consists of several movements, each distinct in itself. Rossini's "Credo" is also in several movements, but each is closely associated with the rest, and the act of faith is kept well before the mind by a frequent repetition in full chorus of the word "Credo." Nothing could be better as a matter of construction or effect. As far as "Consubstantialem Patri" passages of a dignified character are given to soli and chorus, with repetitions in various keys. A short double canon on the octave follows, after which the story of the Incarnation is grandly told, the long silence at its close, broken only by fitful chords from the orchestra, being one of the master's most impressive devices. In the air for soprano, "Crucifixus" (A flat major), a profound sensation is produced by means the most legitimate, while the choral outburst (on an enharmonic change to the dominant of E major) announcing the Resurrection is admirably effective. Thence to the fugue, "Et vitam," we meet with little save repetitions. Though not equal to its predecessor, this fugue shows some excellent points. The second theme, a complete ascending diatonic scale, has all the stately gravity of early Italian church music, and well tempers the freedom of certain episodic passages. The coda is harmonized with considerable grandeur, and the entire fugue strengthens the impression left by its greater companion. Like the "Gloria," the "Credo" ends with a repetition of its opening words, "Credo in unum Deum." For the offertory Rossini has supplied an organ movement of extreme beauty, well suited to the instrument, and ingeniously harmonized after a scholastic fashion. The "Sanctus," coming after a brief prelude, and given to voices alone, displays all its composer's charm of manner. Especially striking is the contrast between the vigorous unison delivery of "Hosanna in excelsis" by the soli, and the smoothly flowing pianissimo phrases in which the chorus responds "Benedictus." The movement, though short, is likely to become a public favorite. In the "O Salutaris," an air for contralto (E major), there are two widely different subjects, the first smooth and melodious, if not specially beautiful, the second (on the words "Bella prement hostilia," &c.) declamatory, and accompanied by harmonies which pass abruptly from key to key. There is power of a certain kind in this and its contrasts are effective; nevertheless, we doubt the policy of incorporating it with the Mass. The step had not Rossini's sanction, and has brought an increase of the dramatic rather than of the religious element. In his "Agnus Dei," a contralto solo with chorus (E minor), Rossini gives himself full liberty of action. The result is charming. No music could express a more overmastering passion, and the intense feeling of the solo would be almost painful but for the unaccompanied choral phrases which now and then break in with a prayer for peace. This Mass, so full of contrast, has none more effective than that between the agonizing "Miserere" of the former and the calm "Dona nobis" of the latter. We here recognize a stroke of genius. Working up to the coda by a series of bold progressions, Rossini then makes a transition to the tonic major and ends with a triumphant burst of harmony.

An adequate notice of the Mass without aid from music type, is impossible, but enough has been said to convey an idea of its character. We have nothing to add save a repetition of the statement with which we set out, that, exceptions notwithstanding, the work is a masterpiece.

Bellini.

Bellini: sa Vie, ses Œuvres. Par Arthur Pougin. (Hachette & Co.)

There was not much to be told concerning Bellini as a man, beyond the facts that he was of a loving and expansive nature, one singularly clear of the bad passions and jealousies which have embittered the lives of so many artists. Although vain as a woman not deeply instructed, he was not altogether without intelligence, as his letters prove. He lived in the lap of pleasure and died of premature exhaustion—his death, in 1835, causing a sorrow only exceeded by that felt in every corner of musical Europe when that greater artist and more complete man, Mendelssohn, was prematurely taken away. These things are fairly set forth by M. Pougin with justifiable admiration, and with a reserve no less justifiable. This book, and the pamphlet by Signor Cicconetti, published at Prato some years ago, contain as much biographical matter as could probably be now collected respecting him.

M. Pougin, as we have more than once had occasion to acknowledge, is an upright and not ungracious musical critic. He has fewer predilections, not to say prejudices, less exaggeration in his praise and blame, than many of the French confraternity. He seems reasonably careful in research. His style is neither inflated nor meagrely bald. His book, in short, as a readable and succinct contribution to the library of musical literature, cannot fail to instruct readers who may have heard "Norma" and "La Sonnambula" again and again, without having troubled themselves to consider what are the elements and qualities of universal and permanent popularity which those two operas contain. In some of his judgments M. Pougin may be considered extreme. He remarks on Bellini's want of constructive resource, forgetting, it may be, that Meyerbeer, the idol of Paris (justifiably, as having been so long the mainstay of its Grand Opera), is liable to precisely the same reproach. Like Bellini, the composer of "Les Huguenots" made his greatest effects by morsels of declamation and brief melodic phrases. Yet there is no movement in Meyerbeer's operas nobler in conception or more steadily carried out than the finale to the first act of "La Sonnambula," than the dark scene in the Druids' sacred wood which opens the opera of "Norma," than the daybreak prelude to "I Puritani," or than the quartet, "A te, O cara," in the same opera. And if Bellini is to be accused of being childish and timid in his instrumentation, can Meyerbeer be acquitted of being bizarre? Either extreme implies a confession of weakness or empiricism. Bellini could be sedate and stately when treating his orchestra, as in the introduction to "Norma" aforesaid; whereas Meyerbeer could be vulgar and thin, as his mixture of piccolo, bassoon and drum in the "Pif Pa" song in "Les Huguenots" oddly attests. The really great masters of dramatic orchestral effect—such as Gluck (whose picturesque use of his limited forces cannot be overpraised), Mozart (vide the inimitable Turkish color given to his "Entführung"), Spontini, Cherubini (who, with all his genius, labored under an incapacity of understanding that proportion without tediousness is an indispensable element of stage effect), and Signor Rossini—these really great masters, it may be repeated, used the colors of the musical palette, if richly, without extravagance or forced singularity. That which an opposite bad practice has arrived at—Meyerbeer having led the way—we have lived to see, in the operas of Herr Wagner. Bellini and Meyerbeer were both effect-composers (as those who write for the stage should be), but neither had that deep science (depth not excluding variety) which keeps the orchestra in its right place.

One characteristic of Bellini's genius has, we think, been overlooked by M. Pougin. It was distinctly Sicilian; akin to the genius of Melli and Patania and Gaggi, as displayed in the arts of poetry, painting and sculpture; akin to the exquisite softness and richness of the scenery. Seen after Palermo and Monreale, and the country around Partenico and Segeste, the surroundings of Naples even look less comparatively richly colored, and harsher in their contours. Something of softness must possibly accompany this profusion of lovely tints. Even the Monte Pellegrino is not stern, commanding as are its outlines. Half the way up, the plane-trees are swathed with roses and trumpet-flowers. The cypresses even have not the dismal green of our cemetery tree; and the skies which hang over this delicious corner of the South have a luxury of color, soft and yet bright, which distances either poet or painter's art to represent in the exquisite fulness of its harmony.

But in Bellini's music, delicious as is its tone, there cannot but be felt a morbidessa trenching on effeminacy. A honeyed sweetness, not always clear of languor, is imparted to it by his perpetual use of the appoggiatura. This characteristic will be expressly felt on comparing his cantilenas with those of Rossini, the vigor of which will make themselves doubly felt by the contrast. There is nothing in Bellini's operas so fresh (to name only one out of a hundred examples) as the opening scenes of "La Donna del Lago"; nothing so fearfully tragic as the last act of "Otello"; nothing so awful as the apparition scene in "Semiramide"; nothing so stirring as the martial movements in "Guillaume Tell." Then, further to illustrate the brilliant and versatile superiority of the Pesarese master, we may point to the exquisite grace and gaiety of the elder man's comedy. In this lighter vein, Bellini seems to have been entirely deficient. There is not a bar of merry music by him. Even the final rondo in "La Sonnambula" (his best cabaletta) is more intense than joyous. Yet, be the statute of limitations ever so wide, ever so stringent, there can be no doubt that Bellini's two best operas, "Norma" and "La Sonnambula," have a hold on the Italian stage which none of Rossini's tragic or sentimental musical dramas have retained. This may be because Rossini trusted too much to his music, and cared too little for his story. "La Gazza Ladra" is his only serious opera in which the interest of the principal characters is sustained. Gorgeous as is "Semiramide," the action and passion languish after the first act; whereas in "La Sonnambula" and "Norma," they rise as the drama draws to its close. So long as Italian Opera shall last, an actress will always desire to present herself as Amina, or as the impassioned priestess of the Druid wood.

Both characters, it may be recollected, were "created" (as our French neighbors have it) by Pasta; both have been successively sought by Malibran, by Mme. Grisi, who, however, resigned the part of Amina to the exquisite Persiani; by Mlle. Lind, by Mme. Viardot, and by Miss Adelaide Kemble.

While offering disconnected notes in place of a formal review of M. Pougin's book, we cannot but rectify the character of Pasta given by him. He has overstated her natural qualities in crediting her with an extensive and beautiful voice; whereas the organ with which she wrought such marvels was obstinate, limited in compass by nature: a husky mezzo-soprano, extended upwards and downwards by her indomitable resolution to command a voice, and in its very best days liable to be out of tune. There is no overstating the power and the passion which animated all her "creations." And she lived in a great epoch. Herr successor, whom many persons have preferred to Pasta because of her personal beauty and the superior quality and force of her voice, Mme. Grisi, who so long "reigned over us" in England, only "created" one part for herself during her career of a quarter of a century—that of Elvira, in Bellini's "I Puritani." Her best inspirations, her attitudes even, were merely so many copies of the inspirations wrought by study into the most perfect presentment of Rossini's Assyrian Queen, of Donizetti's Anna Bolena, of Bellini's Amina and Norma, that the stage has ever seen.—Athenæum.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 5.—On Saturday evening Mr. Thomas gave us his 5th and last Symphony Soirée with the assistance of the Mendelssohn Union and Mr. Otto Singer (pianist):

Festival Overture.....	Volkmann.
114th Psalm. Chorus and Orchestra.....	Mendelssohn.
Fantasia, Piano and Orchestra.....	Singer.
(Mr. Otto Singer).
Symphonic Poem "Prometheus".....	Liszt.
6th Symphony, (Pastorale).....	Beethoven.

The opening Overture is strong and full of purpose, possessing many of the marked characteristics of the advanced German school. The Mendelssohn Psalm lost much of its effect from the fact that its execution greatly lacked finish and completeness; the tenors howled and seemed unable to tone down their superabundant energies. Further, there seemed to be too much orchestra for the voices. I was glad to observe that the Choral Society staid only during the performance of the work, and then decorously left the stage; usually the vocalists remain until the end of the programme, and are neither useful nor ornamental.

Mr. Singer's Fantasia pleased me greatly. Constructed in a free style and well instrumented, it impressed the audience very favorably. The opening theme and the episodic melodies introduced afterward are firm and shapely, and many passages are extremely neat and attractive. Mr. Singer—in the piano part—displayed much dexterity of finger, a firm and precise touch, and a good command of the instrument. He seemed deficient only in delicacy of sentiment and feeling.

"Prometheus" really has something like coherence and persistency of design, and the instrumentation is of course good. Liszt's weak point is always the uncouth harmonic transitions, which disfigure nearly all his symphonic works.

Mr. Thomas's efficient orchestra has never displayed its capabilities to better advantage than in the Pastoral Symphony.

The audience was a large and seriously attentive one, and I trust that Mr. Thomas has met, this season, with sufficient pecuniary encouragement to induce him in the season of 1867-70 to give us another series of these delightful entertainments. He has brought out many new works of interest and ability which, but for his untiring energy, we should probably not have heard, and he has visibly elevated the standard of musical taste among us.

Mr. T's 19th Sunday Concert presented this among other attractions:

Symphony No. 1, D (1776).....	Emmanuel Bach.
Fantasia, Midsummer Night's Dream.....	Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Rienzi".....	Wagner.
Ave Maria.....	(Bach). Gounod.
(Soprano, violin, piano, organ, orchestra).
Nachtgesang.....	Vogt.

The soloists were Miss Josey Hoffé (soprano) and Mr. Frank Gilder (pianist). The former did not succeed very well in the exquisite Ave Maria, which requires a voice of far greater purity than hers; in her other solo she was more pleasing. Mr. Gilder played a Polonaise by Weber in very good style, although the performance was too mechanical. In Mason's "Silver Spring" he displayed a beautifully clean touch, together with a very even manipulation. For an encore he played Gottschalk's well worn "Banjo," which has never yet been really played by anybody but the author himself.

The Emanuel Bach Symphony is a quaint little thing, with no pause between either two of the three movements. Singularly, the Largo is in E flat, although the other movements are in D. The Fantasia on the "Midsummer Night's Dream" is too much of a hodge-podge for my taste, for I thoroughly disapprove of mixing up the Nocturne, Clown's Dance, Wedding March, Overture, &c., into one heterogeneous mass.

APRIL 12.—On Wednesday evening Miss Henrietta Markstein, who made her first appearance last November, gave a second concert in Steinway Hall. She was assisted in a very miscellaneous programme by Mr. Von Inten (pianist), Mr. Kopta (violin), Mr. Hill (tenor), and Mme. Lanari (soprano). Miss Markstein has much force and considerable mechanical dexterity, but her playing entirely lacks elegance, and that well-bred quietude of manner which is characteristic of a thorough artist; she plays with her elbows and shoulders, and her convulsive movements are anything but satisfactory to the beholder. She selected (most injudiciously) as one of her solos, Mayer's Fantasia on Masaniello, which has several times been played by Mr. Mills. The hall was occupied by a widely scattered audience, and the pecuniary result of the concert could scarcely have been gratifying to the pianiste. The assisting artists acquitted themselves creditably.

At Irving Hall on the same evening, Mlle. Filomeno, the South American pianist and violinist, delighted a large audience with her excellent pianism and much less excellent violin playing. Mlle. F. has a beautiful touch, much rapidity of finger, and plays with a dash and verve which recall Gottschalk. Her performance of the "Banjo" was brilliant and effective. As a violinist she is less satisfactory, for her tone is thin and sometimes scrappy. She was assisted by artists of more or less vocal reputation, and the programme was quite an enjoyable one.

On Saturday evening we had our fifth Philharmonic Concert, with Richard Hoffman and Mme. Gazzaniga as soloists. This was the programme:

"Die Ideale," Symphonic Poem.....Liszt.
Arie, "Ah moi fils," (Prophete).....Meyerbeer.
Concerto, D minor, op. 40.....Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Faust".....Wagner.
Salve Maria.....Rimsky.
1st Symphony, in C.....Beethoven.

Liszt's "Poem" and Wagner's "Faust" constituted a pretty strong dose for one evening, although the latter has many fine and attractive points. As for the "poem" (which was cruelly placed at the commencement of the programme), it is simply and utterly absurd; had it been named "chaos" the nomenclature would have been accurate. As for Beethoven's earliest Symphony, its freshness and melodious phrases were positively charming after all the Wagner and Liszt brass.

Mme. Gazzaniga sang with that power and force for which she is distinguished; her artistic performance of the Salve Maria secured a decided encore.

Mr. Hoffman's performance of the always beautiful Concerto was simply delightful, his touch is so beautifully delicate, his manipulation so unerringly even and accurate, and he is so true in every detail to the intention of the composer; these excellencies combine to form a most artistic and enjoyable whole. The delighted audience insisted upon a recall, and Mr. Hoffman gracefully responded with Chopin's exquisite Nocturne in F-sharp minor. This latter was entitled "a simple, unpretending little melody" by the astute Herald critic in yesterday's issue. How encouragingly patronizing!

The 6th and last concert will occur on Saturday evening, May 8th. The programme will include "Manfred" with music by Schumann, (choruses and declamations—the latter by Edwin Booth—thrown in); Gluck's Overture to Iphigenia, and Hiller's 2d Concert Overture.

On Saturday evening Mme. Bertha Johansen gave a very interesting Soirée Musicale at Steinway's Small Hall, assisted by Theo. Thomas, F. von Inten and others. Among the attractive features of the programme were a Rondo by Schubert, for piano and violin, and a Sonata by Raff, for the same instruments. These were admirably played by Messrs. Von Inten and Thomas. Mme. Johansen sang several songs by Schumann and Reinecke, and also in a beautiful quintet by Schubert, for female voices.

At Mr. Thomas's 20th Sunday Concert, the last but two of this enjoyable series, some of the attractions were:

Overture to "Romeo and Juliet".....Schubert.
Overture to "Eurydice".....Mendelssohn.
Triumphant.....Schumann.
Ballet, "Reine de Saba".....Gounod.

Mlle. Hoffé again appeared, as also Mr. August Arnold (pianist), who played, as one of his solos, Beethoven's pianoforte Sonata in C-sharp minor, op. 27, which has been called, for some occult reason, the "Moonlight Sonata."

PARIS, MARCH 29.—The death of Hector Berlioz, which has occurred since my last letter, has of course been noticed in your Journal. Of his true position as a composer I cannot speak; indeed that is a question upon which Doctors disagree. His works, neglected in his own country, have their admirers in Germany. In reading the various notices of his life, which have appeared in the Parisian Journals, I have been struck by the extraordinary manner in which his claims to fame as a critic are treated, being either quietly ignored, or, at the best, merely touched upon; and yet it is in this respect that his very name is a tower of strength, as any one who reads what he has written may well know. His works, models of fine writing, keen wit and good sense, filled with learning and penetrated by the finest critical insight, are denied to the English reader, simply because of the shameful fact that a translation would not sell for enough money to pay for the paper and ink used in writing it. The laborer is worthy of his hire [or at least of something considerably higher than he would get] and so "Les Soirées de l'Orchestre" and other books of the kind will remain untranslated until some one undertakes the work from a pure love of art and usefulness, as a lady has done in the case of Liszt's Chopin.

According to the usual custom a "concert spirituel" was given at the Conservatoire, on the evening of March 26 (Vendredi Saint). This was the programme:

Symphonic Pastorale.....Beethoven.
Inflammatus du Stabat.....Rossini.
Overture de la Grotte de Fingal.....Mendelssohn.
Pater Noster.....Meyerbeer.
Air de Judas Machabée.....Handel.
Symphonie en si bémol.....Haydn.

It is customary to play at this concert either the Eroica or the Pastoral Symphony. I will not try to say how well the latter was rendered this time; however far my words might go, they would be very sure of falling short of the mark. No wonder that it is difficult to obtain admission to these concerts; and no wonder that an abonnement once obtained is kept religiously in the family as a kind of heir-loom.

Haydn's B-flat Symphony, with the sense of rest and content which his music always brings, was a fitting termination for such a programme; and Mendelssohn's rich and vivid tone-picture was shown in the best of lights. Mlle. Nilsson was the soloist, and in Handel's air gained for herself an encore and two recalls. In this she fully deserved the compliment, but her rendering of Rossini's Inflammatus was to me unsatisfactory. It was indeed the perfection of art, but the fire and passion, so necessary there, were lacking. Meyerbeer's Pater Noster was admirably sung by a double chorus without accompaniment.

At the 6th Popular Concert we had Beethoven's C-minor Symphony. The programme of the 7th was as follows:

Overture d'Oberon.....Weber.
Fantaisie sur Otello, pour violon.....Ernst.
Exécutée par M. Vilhelmy.
Ave Maria.....Cherubini.
Chanté par Mlle. Battu. Le solo de cor anglais par M. Castagnet.
Marche funèbre de la Symphonie héroïque.....Beethoven.
L'Enfance du Christ (2e partie).....H. Berlioz.
Overture. Chœur des bergers. Repas de la Sainte-Famille.
Le solo par M. Bosquin.
Air pour violon.....Bach.
Exécuté par M. Vilhelmy.
Hymne.....Haydn.
Exécuté par tous les instruments à cordes.
Stabat Mater.....Rossini.
Air par M. Maury. Air par Mlle. Wertheimer. Duo par Mlle. Battu et Wertheimer. Pro peccatis par M. Bonnefée. Inflammatus par Mlle. Battu.

Rossini's "Messe" continues in favor at the Theatre Italien. Judging from one hearing, it seems to me a very beautiful and noble work, but, as an account of its prominent traits has been already published in your Journal, I will spare your readers any infliction in the way of description.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 24, 1869.

Music at Home.

The close of the great season, with the last Symphony Concert and the Easter Oratorios, has been followed by a short after-summer, of a very agreeable character, consisting mainly of the three Orchestral Concerts of Mr. LANG, and the four Piano Matinées of Mr. LEONHARD. Of these there yet remains for our enjoyment only one of the latter. To the list must be added several benefit concerts, pupil concerts of the Conservatories, and hours of Organ music.

Mr. LANG's very successful experiment is over for the present. Mercantile Hall has been crowded each time, and with the best kind of audience. His programmes were as follows:

Tuesday, April 6.

Overture to "Prometheus".....Beethoven.
Symphony, No. 3, in E flat major.....Mozart.
Serenade and Allegro in B minor, for Pianoforte, with orchestral accompaniment.....Mendelssohn.
Miss Alice Dutton.
Symphony No. 4, in A major (Italian).....Mendelssohn.

Tuesday, April 13.

Symphony No. 8, in F major.....Beethoven.
Overture, "The Fair Melusina".....Mendelssohn.
Pianoforte Concerto, No. 4, in G major.....Beethoven.
Mr. Hugo Leonhard.
Overture to "The Nibelungs".....Sternedale Bennett.

Tuesday, April 20.

Symphony No. 6, in F major, (Pastoral).....Beethoven.
Overture to "The Hebrides".....Mendelssohn.
Violin Concerto in D major.....Beethoven.
Mr. Bernhard Listemann.
Symphony No. 7, in G major.....Haydn.

The only drawback to the full enjoyment of these orchestral performances was in the character of the hall, which neither has a musical and cheerful aspect, nor very good acoustic qualities. To all but the remotest listeners the sounds were hard and dry, the fortissimos more striking than inspiring; the tympani, for instance, in the storm part of the Pastoral Symphony, dealt something more like blows than sounds upon our tympanum. Doubtless it would all have sounded well in a larger room; for, saving now and then a slip of some wind instrument (which every ear is quick in such a place to challenge), the various compositions were carefully read and nicely rendered. Mr. Lang is rapidly making himself at home in his new function as Conductor, and he does wisely to take a small and modest house at first,—a picked orchestra of a few more than thirty instruments (six first violins); capable and faithful with a few, he may yet be ruler over many.

He did well, too, to choose just those standard Symphonies and Overtures which are well-known, tried favorites, and which lose comparatively little with so small an orchestra. With the exception of the "Italian" and "Pastoral" Symphonies, and the Mendelssohn "Serenade and Allegro gioioso," all the pieces had been heard in the larger Symphony Concerts this past season. Nobody could ask for better. Mr. Lang showed a clear insight into the character and structure of each work, and handled his forces as if the meanings and beauties were all palpable to his own mind, even if the medium through which he conveyed them were not always quite so quickly sympathetic as a zealous interpreter could wish. But on the whole there was comparatively little to complain of. It is time, too, to have new conductors growing up; for so unexampled is the spread of interest in classical orchestral music in this whole community, not only of Boston, but the larger towns for many miles away, that the business of conductorship must soon give full employment to as many as shall show the true ability. Division of labor comes in every sphere that widens.

The solo pieces, with orchestra, were of the best and finely executed. Mr. LEONHARD's playing of the "divine" Concerto (in G) of Beethoven brought it home to every listener more palpably and with more exquisite appreciation than ever; the piano-forte at least did not suffer from the contracted space. Mr. LISTEMANN put his usual fire into the Violin Concerto (first movement), of which his execution was masterly; and Miss DUTTON, as a classical pianist, gains in favor by each effort.—Mr. Lang has made many thankful for this fine little after-season of symphonic life and sunshine.

MR. LEONHARD'S Matinées take, more nearly than anything else, the place held in the calendar of what may be called the inner circle of music-lovers here by the concerts of Mr. Dresel, which are so much missed during his protracted stay in Germany. Three of the four (on successive Thursday afternoons, at Chickering's Rooms) are already past; two of them before we go to press, with programmes very choice, as follows:

April 8th.

Allegro and Gavotte, from "Suite Anglaise," D. min. Bach.
Adagio, A minor, op. 90, No. 2, ..... Beethoven.
Lieder Cyclus, "An die ferne Geliebte," ..... Beethoven.
Sonata, F major, op. 10, No. 2, ..... Beethoven.
Scherzo, op. 54, E major, ..... Chopin.
"Er ist's," op. 27, No. 2, Song, ..... Franz.
"Wenn der Frühling," op. 42, No. 6, Song, ..... Franz.
Kinderszenen, Scenes from Childhood, op. 15, Schumann.
Nocturne, op. 62, No. 1, ..... Chopin.
Valse, E minor, posthumous, ..... Chopin.

April 15th.

Sarabande and Burlesca, A minor, ..... Bach.
Sonata, E minor, op. 90, No. 2, ..... Beethoven.
Polonaise, E flat minor, op. 26, No. 2, ..... Chopin.
Maiden, by R. Franz, transcribed, ..... Liszt.
Trio, E flat major, op. 100, ..... Schubert.
Novelette, F major, ..... Schumann.
Scherzino, B flat major, from op. 28, ..... Schumann.

Mr. Leonhard was truly the interpreter in his rendering of all this variety of fine piano works; not less so in the order of their presentation, for each came fitly after and before another; bouquets arranged with tact, and each flower whole and perfect. The little pieces from the Suites of Bach, quaintly graceful, honest, hearty music, were played with evenness and clearness, and with such tender care to all the points of phrasing, light and shade, and flow of parts, as to overcome any prepossession against Bach as being merely dry and learned. It was all fresh and full of life, temperate and wholesome,—good for the listener, to make him listen sanely and with keen appreciation to what followed. And what better after Bach than Mozart (first programme)! That Adagio was a piece to stir one deeply as well as to win with beauty; it was something out of the common, even with Mozart.

After Mozart, Beethoven. And first, for greater contrast, that most deep and tender and poetic of his love songs, that cycle of successive moods of feeling in little fugal strains which, with their wonderful accompaniment, half whisper, half conceal, and so in the most expressive way suggest so much. It is a rare treat to hear the Liederkreis well sung and well accompanied. We know no singer for it here but Mr. KREISSMANN, who did it admirably, and Mr. Leonhard's accompaniment was as delicate and close to the music and the soul thereof as one could wish to hear. The Sonata, after it, is one of the earlier and lighter ones of Beethoven, rarely if ever before heard in public here, but full of charm. It is in the middle movement (the first, in F, is sunshine), that the stranger and deeper mood of Beethoven reveals itself. This Allegretto is a Scherzo in F minor, with a Trio in D flat major, a succession of mysterious chords, like cloud shadows stealing over the landscape; it is one of the most remarkable pages in all the thirty-one Sonatas. The Presto finale, again, is gay and careless enough for Haydn.

The second part, wholly of Chopin, Franz and Schumann, was a fine afterpiece to the three older classics. We all know how well Chopin fares in the hands of Mr. Leonhard, and that, of all the singers, Kreissmann is the one for Robert Franz. "Er ist's!" is one of the most original and happy of his little songs, which, we think, had not before found its way into the concert room. Schumann's series of little Kinderszenen never seemed to us so charming, and each one so characteristic and true to its title, as they did that afternoon. They were followed with unflagging interest, and more than one was most unwillingly dismissed without a repetition.

Of the second concert the great feature was, of course, the Schubert Trio, which, often as it has been heard in that room, still grows in interest and approves itself one of the great Trios. Messrs. EICHBERG and A. SUCK played it with Mr. Leonhard, and never did it go off more gloriously. The E-minor Sonata (op. 90) of Beethoven was very admirably played. How fine the contrast between its two movements, the passionate and fitful Vivace, and the broad, tranquil, even flow of the Andante in E major, with its lovely variations and its exquisite returns! Liszt's transcription of the Franz song delighted everybody. Chopin and Schumann were significantly represented.

MR. A. P. PECK'S Annual Concert, April 16th, filled the Music Hall, presenting as it did a great variety of attractions, besides the concert-giver's valid title to the general good will. We were sorry to miss in the programme one interesting novelty which had been announced: the Serenade by Mozart for reed instruments, horns, &c.; but the omission was unavoidable, the musicians being held to their theatre engagements. Nor did Mr. J. F. PRUMS, the new violinist, play the Mendelssohn Concerto set down for him (probably for the same reason, it requiring orchestral accompaniment). What he did play, two Fantasias, one by himself, showed him to be a master of his instrument. Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, always at home in the Rossini melody, sang Non più mesta in her best voice and style, and a Romanza by Mattei. Miss KELLOGG was evidently ill, and though she executed Ah non giunge finely, there was no joy in look or voice. She also sang Mozart's "Deh vieni." A new soprano, Mrs. BROCKWAY, made her debut in a carefully elaborated, rather than an easy rendering of the florid "Come per me sereno" of Bellini. Her voice is sweet and pleasant. Miss ALICE DUTTON, whose simple, modest costume was in refreshing contrast with the prevailing fashion, played from memory, at the piano that very difficult Hungarian Rhapsody by Liszt, with which Miss Topp makes such effect; and certainly her rendering was sure and good, albeit with less strength and brilliancy.

SIG. FERRANTI is the same piece of hearty nature that he was. His buffo is genuine and inimitable, and his baritone voice has lost none of its richness. His very appearance gladdened the whole crowd, and his singing of the Postiglione, but still more of "Femine, femine!" was irresistibly funny. Signor LOTTI, with his German face and light, sweet German tenor, sang a Romanza by Verdi and a German song: "Mein Engel," tastefully, as always. The concert was opened by Mr. THAYER on the great Organ, and closed with "Zitti, zitti," by Miss Phillips (in place of Miss Kellogg), and Signors Lotti and Ferranti.

Other Concert reviews must lie over.

MUSICAL PITCH.—The agitation of this long mooted question is revived with a new energy. Especially in England, where the great Oratorio tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves, has for some months persistently refused to sing at the unnaturally high pitch which ruled in all the concerts. It is agreed on all hands that the pitch has risen about a whole tone since the time of Bach and Handel,—else where did the former find the voices for his sustained high parts? It is agreed that it is now too high for the comfort or the safety of most singing voices. It is the singers' grievance, and the complaint cannot be silenced, must be met. The causes of the continual, as it would seem, fatal, straining up are not so well agreed upon. Probably they will all finally resolve themselves into one and the same moral cause,—the same that explains the accelerated tempo of to-day,—the more feverish pulse of human life collectively, the increased craving for excitement, the striving for effect, the passion for exaggeration, for intensity in all things, the sensationalism, the eager competition, the mad rush to the footlights, which galvanizes our would be all alive humanity, bringing all mental, moral temperance into sad disrepute. It is for effect, that he may shine, that each new Paganini screws up his strings, and singers wear their voices out in the ambition to produce startling high tones. Publics seek a sensation, rather than sincere, pure, whole-some music; to this prurient appetite singers and players minister; and the instrument makers minister in turn to them, straining the pitch up higher and higher.

But the evil has grown intolerable. Earnest efforts have been made to find the remedy. A few years since there was an Imperial Commission raised in Paris, composed of the highest musical authorities, who after long and learned discussions, taking of evidence, reports, &c., finally agreed upon a new pitch, nearly half a tone lower than that then and still prevailing, (a compromise between strict scientific requirements and the practical difficulties in the way of reform), and this pitch, by Imperial decree, was established throughout France as the "Normal Diapason." It has since been slowly, but surely, winning its way among the theatres and orchestras of Germany, though not without resistance. A Convention to consider the same subject was soon after held in England, the evidence, and argument all tending the same way, but without practical result. Now, thanks to the manly stand of Sims Reeves, the theme is agitated on almost every page of every musical paper for the last two months; nearly all agreeing that the pitch should be lowered, the question being how much, many pleading for just half a tone, as that would make it such an easy thing to alter all the Organs.

Here in Boston we have already a certain foothold gained in favor of conformity with the French pitch; the Great Organ of the Music Hall is tuned to it. What can we do to bring us fully into line with the new movement? One more step has been taken; the Normal Diapason, by a wise vote of the Committee, has just been introduced into all our public schools. But the orchestral instruments, especially the reeds, &c., cannot be lengthened out to suit the organ, without deranging their scale, altering their intervals unequally; hence a chronic difficulty of pitch in all the oratorios. To procure new instruments, properly made for the purpose, would involve a greater expense than most of the musicians feel able to incur. It is therefore proposed to have a proper set of instruments made for them, and to procure the means, it is proposed to give a Concert, vocal and orchestral, on the afternoon of Thursday, May 13, under the joint auspices of the Handel and Haydn, the Harvard Musical and the Boston Music Hall Associations. The arrangements are in the hands of a Committee of three from each body, viz.: J. B. Upham, L. B. Barnes and Theo. Stover, for the Handel and Haydn; H. W. Pickering, J. S. Dwight and B. J. Lang, for the Harvard; Eben Dale, J. P. Putnam and S. L. Thorndike, for the Music Hall. The programme will probably include the "Hymn of Praise," a good Symphony and Overture, a Serenade by Mozart for the wind instruments in question, and one or two good vocal solos.—More in our next.

NEW YORK. The third and last of the "Historical Recitals," by Mme. Raymond Ritter and Mr. S. B. Mills, took place at Steinway Hall last Saturday afternoon. The selections were wholly from the Modern German School:

- 1 Air and Variations in G major.
Beethoven. Born 1770, died 1827.
- 2 Wonne der Wehmuth, ..... Beethoven.
- 3 Sonata appassionata, opus 57, ..... Beethoven.
- 4 Ellen's Song (words from the "Lady of the Lake").
Gretchen am Spinnrade, (from Goethe's "Faust"), ..... Schubert. Born 1797, died 1828.
- 5 "Des Abends," "Trauungswirren, and Endo vom Lied," from the "Fantasie-Stücke," op. 12, ..... Schumann. Born 1810, died 1856.
- 6 Reiselied, ..... Mendelssohn. Born 1809, died 1847.
- 7 The Warrior's Death. Song, ..... F. J. Ritter.
- 8 Moment Musical, Opus 94, No. 1 and No. 2.
Schubert.
- 9 Elsa's Ermahnung an Otruda, from "Lohengrin," ..... R. Wagner.
- 10 Angiolin del biondo crin, ..... Liszt.
- 9 Etude, C sharp minor, op. 25, No. 7, ..... Chopin.
- 10 Schoene Wiege meiner Leiden, Song from Opus 24, ..... Schumann.
- Er ist gekommen, ..... Franz.
- 11 Hungarian Gypsy Melodies, ..... Tausig.

Prefixed to the above programme were some instructive remarks upon the German Lied and the Sonata, for which we regret we have not room here.—The second Recital (April 3) offered specimens of three schools, covering a wide field, as follows:

THE OLD FRENCH SCHOOL.

- 1 "Le reveil-Matin".....Couperin. 1716.
- "La fleurie"....." "
- "La tendre Musette"....." "
- 2 Soyez fidèles, Air from the ballet "La Mascara".....Lully. 1660.
- 3 Le Tambourin.....Rameau. 1731.
- La Musette....." "
- 4 Rossignols amoureux, Air from the Opera "Hippolite and Aricie".....Rameau. 1733.
- 5 Gigue, in E min. and in E maj. Rameau. 1731.
- 6 Une fièvre brûlante, Romance from Richard Coeur de Lion.....Gretry. 1785.
- Le Rosier, Romance....J. J. Rousseau. 1762.

THE CLASSIC GERMAN SCHOOL.

- 7 Prelude and Fugue in D major, No. 5, from the "Well-tempered Clavier." J. S. Bach. 1722.
- 8 Es ist vollbracht, Air from the "Johannes Passion".....J. S. Bach. 1720-30.
- Verdi prati, Air from "Alcina".....Handel. 1735.
- 9 Prelude, Fugue and Capriccio, from the Suite in D minor.....Handel. 1720.
- 10 O del mio dolce amor, from "Paride ed Elena".....Gluck. 1762.
- An Chloë. Song.....Mozart. 1788.
- 11 Sonate in B flat major.....Mozart. 1779.

FOLK SONGS, AND PIANO-FORTE COMPOSITIONS
FOUNDED ON THAT FORM.

Liszt's celebrated "Rhapsodies" on Hungarian and Gipsy popular melodies, or Folk songs, are among the most effective and imaginative compositions he has written, and abound with the brilliant difficulties of modern pianoforte technique.

- 12 Quando ti vedo.....Roman Serenade.
- Se amor mai.....Italian barcarole.
- Gramachree.....Irish Melody.
- 13 Nocturne in D flat, op. 27, and Mazurka, op. 6, No. 2.....Chopin.
- 14 Why dost thou Weep?...Hottentot Song.
- Margoton va-t à l'ailan....French Dance Song.
- La Colasa.....Spanish Popular Song.
- 15 Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12.....Liszt.

1 François Couperin, born at Paris, 1668, died 1733. He was called "Le Grand," from his having been considered as the most distinguished of a musical family, that sustained its reputation for more than two centuries. He was not only a learned theorist, but also a great organist—perhaps the finest that France ever produced—while his clavichord pieces are tender and graceful in character; these were indeed studied and regarded as models by the clavecinists of his day.

2 Jean Baptiste Lully was born at Florence, 1633, died 1687. He was a composer of genius, but rude and eccentric in character; this is not strange, as he rose from a very low class, to become the favorite of and Court composer to Louis Quatorze. His operas and ballets kept the stage for a hundred years after his death; and, in a certain degree, he is regarded as the founder of French tragic opera.

4 Jean Philippe Rameau, born at Dijon, 1683, died 1764, was one of the greatest dramatic composers of the eighteenth century. He was also celebrated as a didactic author; wrote treatises and dissertations on music; besides composing 36 operas, some ballets, and many harpsichord pieces. "Hippolite and Aricie" was his first opera, although written after he had attained his fiftieth year.

5 This old fashioned dance form (the gigue, or jig) was not always written for dancers; it was adapted to vocal or instrumental pieces of brisk and elegant character.

6 Gretry was born at Liege, 1751, died 1813. He brought the form of French Opera Comique to perfection; and, between 1765 and 1803, composed more than fifty operas, of which, "Richard Coeur de Lion" is the most celebrated. This simple, yet vigorous romance (Une fièvre) is the song sung by the troubadour Blondel, under the grating of King Richard's prison. Blondel (or Blondeaux) des Nesles was no inconsiderable musician and poet; about a score of his songs, in manuscript, exist in the French Imperial Library.

Jean Jacques Rousseau, born at Geneva, 1782, died 1728, supported himself for several years in Paris as a music teacher and copyist; and his writings on music first paved the way to his subsequent extraordinary success as an author. He wrote much for the theatre, and many romances; the above romance (Le Rosier) is one of the few to which he did not also write the words.

10 The Chevalier Gluck was born in the Palatinato, 1714, died 1787. He was the reformer of the opera of his time. A singular mistake has been made by a European publishing house, in regard to the above air from "Paride ed Elena;" this has been lately reprinted, as by Stradella, and with sacred words! and Mrs. Sartoris (Adelaide Kemble, the singer), in her novel, "A Week at a French Country House," has fallen into the same error, and alludes to the air as one of Stradella's.

12 These Italian Folk songs were taken down by Carl Banck from the singing of the peasantry, about 30 years ago. The impassioned beauty of the old Irish melody, "Gramachree," has made it a favorite subject for poets; Moore, Sheridan, Robert Gilfillan, Ogle, and hosts of others, have written words to this lovely theme.

14 The Hottentot melody is unaltered from the original, and arranged by Mme. Ritter; the words are verified from a prose translation of an African cradle song.

These unique concerts have attracted attention even in Germany. In a recent number of the Leipzig Musical Gazette, a leading journal in European musical matters, a learned editor, Dr. Chrysander (author of the life of Handel, &c.,) alludes to them in a long and flattering article, from which we extract the following:

"We have read these programmes and the remarks attached to them with real enjoyment. They display tact, insight and knowledge of the rich material employed; they are not put together without critical taste, as are those of the London recitals, and some others. We recommend their plan as an example to all our conductors and concert-givers in Germany." Dr. Chrysander then alludes to the concert recently given by Mr. F. L. Ritter, in which that gentleman's compositions were performed ("Othello Overture," "First Symphony," "Forty-sixth Psalm," "Hafis Songs," &c.), and concludes in these terms: "It appears to us that Mr. Ritter must be possessed of extraordinary talent, and that this, as well as his knowledge and happy union of diverse capabilities will assure to him a highly distinguished future career."

MUSIC AMONG THE BLIND. In a letter dated Boston, April 12, "Stella" writes to the Worcester Palladium as follows:

At the Perkins Institute for the Blind, the study of music is pursued as faithfully as in the best music schools of the land. Not that all who leave its classes are proficient. Many are satisfied with a certain skill in performance, but a large number are studying the best works, and carrying on their advanced studies with the true artist's zeal. The institution is favored in having for its instructor in music a man so gifted and earnest as Mr. Campbell, who, although blind himself, has in an unusual degree the power of inspiring his pupils with not a little of his own devotedness to art. With his musical gifts he combines so much practical sense and enterprise, that he is likely to succeed in his determination to establish a Conservatory of Music for the Blind, one that shall bring them from all other States and institutions of a similar character!

Naturally enough this plan seems to approach fulfillment now that the Asylum—at South Boston—is likely to undergo some important changes. It is proposed to divide the pupils into families; erect suitable boarding houses for them near by, and convert the present building into an Institute, educational and industrial. A portion of the funds for the purpose are to be raised by the efforts of the pupils themselves; and, for this reason, some of the music classes are giving concerts in the principal towns of the States. Mr. Campbell has arranged a popular programme of vocal and instrumental music, interspersed with reading and recitations by the Blind. The sensation of these concerts is the land, to which a few young lady performers have lately been added.

We wish that Mr. Campbell could be induced to give in Worcester one of his choice chamber concerts, in order to show how well his pupils interpret the music of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin and Schumann. We think their performances would occasion the utmost surprise, especially when it is remembered that every note of music must be committed to memory before performance is possible. We heard one of his pupils play, the other evening, the Andante from Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. It was something never to be forgotten! Wholly rapt in the music, the young man seemed stirred by the spirit of the master whose sublime harmonies he interpreted so well; and, in the gathering darkness of twilight—which was yet day to him, the music seemed to come from another world, as he played with all that sentiment and expression which comes in drawing from the treasures of Memory.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- The Passing Bell. Sacred Song. 2. F to c. Claribel. 30
A very pretty and pathetic story of the last hours of a dying child.
- The Shepherd's lay. 3. D to c. Mendelssohn. 30
A charming serenade.
- The News-boy. Song and Chorus. 2. C to f. Boardman. 35
Quite a taking subject, and has a good chorus.
- Eucree. Song and Chorus. Coote. 35
The words are by E. Webb, who also wrote "Tommy Dodd," and "Beautiful Bells." A genial, pleasant song, with a fine melody.
- Bow down thine ear. Quartet. 3. Ab to c. Behrens. 40
A fine opening anthem or quartet for choirs.
- The Lonely Hearth. 2. G to c. Fernald. 30
A touching little ballad, with sweet music.
- List to the music of my Song. 6. Ab to d. Adam. 40
A splendid concert bravura song. With a high soprano voice it is very effective.
- Love, the Pilgrim. 3. F to g. Blumenthal. 30
Very pleasingly written, and has an excellent "moral."
- On a Velocipede. Veazie. 35
When a song is on a velocipede, it is sure to go. Very amusing.
- May Song. (Mayenlied). 3. G to f. Mendelssohn. 25
A beautiful tribute to the flower season.
- Another May Song. (Anderes Mayenlied). 4. G minor to g. Mendelssohn. 40
Quite another thing from the preceding; a sort of witches' song, describing a visit to the Brockenberg. Wild and strange music.
- Retrospection. Romance. 4. G minor to g. Mendelssohn. 25 Quite pensive in character. Like the others, shows the hand of the great master in its composition.
- Good Morning. (Guten Morgen!) 3. F to f. Abt. 30
A cheerful musical "good morning" to the flowers.

Instrumental.

- Beautiful Bells. Trans. 4. Ab. Russell. 50
A very pleasing arrangement of a popular air.
- Souvenir des Varieties. Waltz. 3. W. Knight. 60
Contains quite a number of popular airs, and is well calculated to please both dancers and lovers of music.
- Notturmo for Piano. 5. Db. Silas. 75
Perhaps a little fuller and richer in harmony than the average of nocturnes. Good melody.
- Genevieve Quadrille. 4 hds. 3. Strauss. 75
Contains some of the best airs of the opera. Brilliant.
- Fairy Chorus. For beginners. Ingraham. 30
Fairy Pearl Schottisch. 2. G. 30
Fairies' Chain Polka. 2. C. 30
Children should not complain of being made to practice, when such pleasing melodies are made ready for them.
- Castagnette Waltz. 3. C. Coote. 60
Very pretty.
- Barbe-bleue Quadrille. 4 hds. 3. Strauss. 75
A brilliant collection of favorite airs.
- Invitation au Galop. 4. Eb. Bendel. 75
A very graceful melody, and will probably please those who admire Weber's "Invitation."

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Gervinus on Handel and Shakespeare.

BY FÉRDINAND HILLER.

These phenomenal effects of music are frequently disputed by men of clear intellect, who feel it a necessity to account for everything. If they once possess the foundation of words, which, in musical drama, by well defined individuality, situation, and so on, are even more significant than usual, they feel secure. The relation of the melody to the words is made the principal object of their consideration; they deduce, in the first place, from the agreement which they discover between the words and the melody the enjoyment procured them by the music, and, having once obtained a firm foundation, carry over into the music whatever feelings are excited thereby in their own mind. This is the course pursued by Gervinus. He laughs, with justice, at all the capricious and frequently contradictory explanations and interpretations put forth of Beethoven's Symphonies—and yet what meaning does he himself not imagine in the airs of Handel!

Words are connected with tone in the most various ways. From the simplest recitative, set in tones that are half spoken, to a chorus by Bach, or an operatic finale, what a series is there of different combinations! But it is only in recitative, whether it is presented independently, or merely interrupts a regular vocal piece by an exclamation, that the text can affect with the same force as the music. Immediately music appears in its full power, it leaves language, otherwise so omnipotent, far behind. The proof, unfortunately, we are almost tempted to say, is only too near at hand. If well set, the worst poem can scarcely diminish our delight in the music; but wearisome music cannot even prop up the greatest poetical masterpiece. What trifling interest is excited by the text of an oratorio when read! We can scarcely understand how it could supply a composer of genius with the materials for music which fills ear, heart, and soul during hours together. Nay, more; in the majority of cases, it is impossible for the hearer to grasp the words and the melody simultaneously. The conventional sounds of which a spoken sentence consists must be uttered in tolerably rapid succession, in order that, being held together by the memory, they may attain to intelligibility in the mind. Music, however, seizes the hearer with the first tone, and carries him onward with itself, without affording him the time, or even the possibility, of going over again what he has already heard. If, therefore, the words are not sung in the tempo of spoken language, we can scarcely get at them. It is this fact, far more than the indistinct pronunciation of so many singers, which has given rise to the custom of reading the text—a surrogate in which we invoke the aid of the eye for what is intended for the ear, and which is employed only in the case of music, to which, after the sense of the words has been quietly mastered, our twofold attention is directed.

But words when combined with melody are not merely inferior to the latter in the effect produced; they have to limit and restrict their entire sphere, in order to render the union possible, besides being exposed to many a little bit of ill usage from the music. Such, for instance, is the repetition—of itself perfectly useless—of separate words and sentences, a repetition frequently indispensable, especially in the most important passages, though not so often as it actually occurs. In the same way it is of vital necessity for the development of the musical thought that the tones should dwell upon words which by their signification do not merit this stress (though accent which is antagonistic to the sense is not to be pardoned in a composer). I will give an illustrious example. The most celebrated air in the Messiah commences with the threefold repetition of the words: "Ich weiss dass mein Erlöser lebt, und dass Er am letzten Tage auf der Erde erscheinen wird."† The melismata which are more spun out than any others in the noble strain occur upon the words, "Tage" and "Erde." Who cares? Every one is filled with the loftiness of the melody, with its intensity and dignity, with its blessed spirit of confidence, and with the broad flow with which it rolls onwards.

It is not by following in the track of the "accent of the emotions," as conveyed in the words given to him, that the musician can succeed in musical creation—the course he has to pursue is an essentially different course. The words, if he would produce aught worth anything, must, as it were, affect him electrically, their purport must produce in him a musical picture which, for him at least, shall be homogeneous. To realize this clearly and fully he sets in action all his intellectual powers, all his artistic resources. How the musical thought grasps the words; half guided by, and half employing them for its own ends, is something that can no more be quite clearly explained than any other act of intellectual creation. The great difference, however, existing between this musical conception of music and its literary conception, is that in vocal music, as well as any other, we do not recognize anything as a genuine piece of music unless it proves itself such even when stripped of the words. Its essential purport must lie in the value, in the beauty of the musical thoughts, in the way in which they are turned to account, and in which they mutually permeate each other. It is true that there are magnificent specimens of recitative, and there are, also, recitative-like songs, which possess great value, and do not fail to produce their effect, although they sprang immediately from the words. But even these, however admirably declaimed, must be capable of being joined to other words, without suffering any very great injury musically—in the contrary case, there is not much in them.

Is this tantamount to asserting that all we praise in a piece of music, when we declare it, in relation to the text, to be expressive, characteristic, picturesque, dramatic, &c., is of no importance? Of a truth, no! The task of making certain personages, in certain situations, sing certain words in such a manner that everyone shall feel convinced that they could not, and ought not, to sing in any other, is one of the highest tasks assigned to music. But the clearness, force, and variety of musical invention ought here to be taken as our guide much rather than what is called truthfulness of expression.—for, with respect to the latter, people often yield to the greatest delusions.

Numerous examples of this are to be found in Gervinus's book. Before proceeding, however, to discuss them, I will say a word or two concerning instrumental music. In corroboration of his views as to want of purport in instrumental music, Gervinus quotes a number of opinions, more or less contradictory, and sometimes very preposterous, collecting from all kinds of periodicals and books, for he is wonderfully at home in musical literature. But what is this to prove? We should soon agree on the nature of instrumental music, if we were once agreed on the nature of music generally. Music is always music—there is good and bad, empty and expressive, profound and frivolous, whether it be sung or whether it be played. It is not a harmonic body which poetry first endows with a soul—it is all soul, and assumes the words as a body by which feeble eyes may recognize it. The assertion advanced by some æstheticizing court-musician or other that Beethoven intended by the finale of the Ninth Symphony to convey that only words and song free music, is also quoted. Why did Beethoven not say as much? He sings, "Friends, not these tones; let us strike up others more agreeable and more cheerful," why not? Let us have recourse to the words of the poet? This capricious fiction of Beethoven's denying himself should be once for all discarded. It has the less sense, from the fact that after the Ninth Symphony Beethoven wrote his last Quartets. That he entertained an idea of a tenth symphony as well as of a grand overture is not merely proved by his note-books; I heard him say so with his own lips, when I saw him lying on his last bed of sickness.

Gervinus is afraid that instrumental music, especially in Germany, fosters giddiness of feeling. May I ask if certain love songs, which play so great a part in the world of young girls, and of Male Vocal Associations, offer better fare? That more mischief can be produced by bad texts, than by musical compositions, no matter of what kind, is, however, a fact admitted by Gervinus himself. If now, on the one hand, it cannot be, and is not, denied that a highly poetical subject is capable of guiding music to the highest things, apart from the interest consequent upon its connection with the poetry, it cannot, on the other hand, be denied that vocal music possesses nothing which, looking at it as a pure and perfect work of art, is to be compared with the masterpieces of instrumental music. In this, music lives entirely according to its own laws! In the other case, it has to make many sacrifices for the poetry, while it is not at liberty to maintain its entire dignity, to display all its riches. The reproach addressed by Gervinus to "Spielmusik" ("playing-music") of existing only for a few, is at once refuted by everyday experience; but if this were not the case, it would prove nothing. How many of the most splendid productions of human fancy and art are accessible to only a few! The receipts from a public exhibition of Michael Angelo's Prophets and Sybils would scarcely be very large. Is Goethe's Iphigenie a popular work? But the Sonatas and Symphonies of our great masters have entranced thousands and thousands, even though the æsthetic key to them may not yet have been found. Men have revived and invigorated themselves, ever since they have existed, with a draught of fresh water, without dreaming that the latter consisted of hydrogen and oxygen gas. We hardly know how to explain even life itself, and yet we find it sometimes a very pleasant thing.

The best and the worst part of the book which we are now considering, and which contains such a superabundance of matter, is the author's love for Handel. It is almost touching to see how he has investigated the works of this master in every possible way; it is sometimes diverting to hear what he deduces from, and what he attributes to, him; but it is depressing to mark the contempt with which he treats those composers who, in the opinion of the entire musical world, are equal, or superior, to Handel. Like the mother of a prima donna, he is not merely extravagant in his praise of him whose champion he is, but he omits no opportunity of attacking others possessing equal rights, and dealing them a sometimes rather insidious blow. Nothing is too trivial for him to rake up, if it can only serve to glorify Handel and weaken his rivals. The natural result is, that he excites people to oppose and to attack his hero, who always had regarded the latter with reverence, and unwillingly noticed his weaknesses, as, for instance, the writer of these lines.

In the section "Music, the Language of the

† "I know that my Redeemer liveth." The writer refers, of course, to the German text.—Translator.

Feelings," which displays an astounding power of analysis and style, this sharp-sighted writer runs, with genuine virtuosity, through the scales of our sensations and affections, their modifications, and their combinations. It is a strange fact! Great and almost intoxicating as is the store of the gradations of the feelings passed in review before us, we feel that it vanishes before the treasures that music contains within itself, and we can but seldom find the most delicately-calculated combinations of descriptive language completely equal to a piece of music. They are, at one and the same time, too sharp and too weak for it. Gervinus gives, however, as it were, to every kind and description of feeling an example, an illustrated picture out of Handel's works. We cannot reason with the commentator when he reads musically from an air what is contained verbally in it, though we may feel convinced that a song which expresses to him, in the clearest possible manner, quiet love, would, with other words, convey to him a notion of humble piety. But are there sufficient grounds for the comprehensive significance which Gervinus attributes to Handel's airs, when he asserts that it would be worse for music if we lost his airs than if we lost his choruses? How few will answer this question in the affirmative!

It is superfluous to speak of the genial power, vigor, and mastery, characterizing the creator of the Messiah. But his art has its blemishes, and of a truth, they are not small. They may be summed up in one word. Handel was a mannerist; a magnificent, stupendous genius, but yet a mannerist. Connected for the greater part of his life with Italian opera (which he did not give up, but which left him in the lurch), he had become so identified with its standing forms, with its concessions to virtuosity, with its demands for speediness of production, that, even at the epoch when he soared highest, he could not completely shake off the habits of so many years. His choral compositions, the seeds of which were sown in the fertile soil of his German studies, profited by the Italian vocal element. But the grand air with its broad first part, and with its short second part, and with its everlasting da capo, with its prelude, and its interlude, and its bravura embellishments always similar to each other, all this was something he could not, or would not, give up—the exceptions, which are certainly brilliant, proving the rule. And his great fertility, which was aided by these permanent forms, is to be explained also by the fact that he returns more than any very great composer to the same figures, rhythms, melismata, cadences, and so on. I was nearly adding, to the same frame of mind, to the same character, to the same style of writing in the separate movements, but I dread being unjust.—Handel went to his work with all the abundant store of a soul overflowing with music—it is evident that he did not stand much upon trifles, especially in his airs. If the words took a firm hold of him, he could, despite all existing models, be magnificent—if they left him cold, he would, at any rate, write something with a head and a tail to it. It is always rather a ticklish matter to ascribe too subtle intentions to a fiery mind of this description, as Gervinus does. But, on the other hand, genius sometimes intuitively creates things of which, so to say, it has itself not thought. Explanations and interpretations must not, however, be pushed so far as absolutely to be contrary to what really exists. Yet to this length do the extreme Handelites go, and where the manifest, though not intentional, untruth commences, a protest must be entered against it. In the opinion of these individuals, Handel made the personages of his dramas permanent musical characters, he described musically periods and countries—there exist innumerable examples to prove that he never thought of such a thing. Where shall we find a more inviting opportunity for an attempt at characteristic description than in the meeting of individuals of opposite natures? But, in their duets, Dalilah and Samson, Juno and the God of Sleep, the Philistine Harapha and Samson sing the same things—the composer is satisfied with expressing the situation generally, and with interweaving musically the different voices.

Semele manifests, according to Gervinus, her frivolous vanity by four bravura airs, but, in addition to these, she has three airs; which, as far as regards the sense of the words, might be sung by the most pious Jewish maidens. Herakles, which is supposed to approach most nearly to Greek tragedy, has polyphonic and partly fugued, choruses, which would be equally appropriate in Saul. Handel is one of the most subjective of all composers—he has his strains and his songs for devotion and heroism, for joy and lamentation, for flattery, and defiance, and love—but he is always the same great old master, whose individuality becomes unmistakably evident after the first few bars. He is, and always will be, greatest, most powerful, and most objective in his mighty choruses, and we may with certainty affirm that without these his oratorios would be quite as much forgotten as, despite certain splendid pieces, his operas have been and will continue to be.

In a contribution to the aesthetics of music, even though the author should assert that he has found everything in Handel, the other musical heroes of Germany would necessarily, one would think, be mentioned in a proper tone of appreciation. Not at all. Bach, who, in his solitary grandeur, displayed far higher artistic dignity than Handel, is not popular enough to please the Handel-worshippers—for a very little, they would drive him down from the musical Parnassus, to do nothing but play the organ and practice counterpoint. Of Gluck, whom Handel despised, they cannot, of course, from a mere feeling of reverence to the latter, think much. Yet Gluck raised opera to a height of which, before him, no one had an idea, and, beside his compositions of this kind, Handel's works for the stage make a very pitiful appearance. Of Mozart, Gervinus quotes a few airs—and speaks of his talent for elegiac music. For Figaro he has found, somewhere or other, the expression "music of intrigue" ("Intriguenmusik"), and employs it with great gusto. In this "music of intrigue," however, Mozart has presented the world with a work of such unexpected novelty, and such perfect beauty, as no composer either before or after him has equalled. Gervinus absolutely puts in print the monstrous question: How would Mozart, Gluck, Meyerbeer, and Wagner fare, if they were withdrawn from the stage, and presented, in the concert-room, in a dress-coat and yellow kid gloves? It is really not necessary to reply that there exists no costume in which Mozart has not been played and sung, and that Gluck still lives upon the stage, which is saying more than that he is effective in the concert-room. Meyerbeer and Wagner, however, will tell us that every work of art belongs to the place for which it was created.

The title of Gervinus's book, Händel und Shakespeare, is only partially justified in the last chapter. Gervinus places his two favorites side by side, contemplates them with the eye of the literary historian, of the biographer, of the poetical and musical critic, and finds similarities between them in their similarities and dissimilarities. On this point, I will not presume to give an opinion—but I think, with all submission, that, had it pleased Gervinus to select some other poet, say, Schiller, for instance, his keen perception would have been quite as successful in establishing parallels.

It is, however, a gratifying fact that, in this age of rifled cannon and of plundered—but I must not say all that I mean—there should be published books like this one by Gervinus, and that you should place at my disposal the columns of your paper, which are devoted to the pressing interests of the day, to descend upon it at such an unbecoming and extravagant length. Receive as my thanks the assurance that I have passed over in silence much more than I have uttered, without, on that account, making the least pretension to be considered "master of style."

* The original is: "in der Zeit der gezogenen Kanonen und ungezogenen." The play upon the words, "gezogenen" and "ungezogenen," is utterly impossible to render literally. Not to lose the joke altogether I have given it another turn—for which I trust I shall not incur the censure of the genial and accomplished author.—Translator.

The Lied and the Sonata.

The following instructive observations, to which we alluded in our last, are prefixed to the programme of the third "Historical Recital" of Mme. Ritter and Mr. Mills. They are plainly from the pen of Mr. Ritter.

THE GERMAN LIED.

Perhaps in no musical form do we find the individual, characteristic traits of nationality more distinctly pronounced than in the song. Melody, rhythm, harmonious treatment, tendency to the use of major or minor modes, every thing concurs to stamp the song as belonging eminently to this or that nation. Thus the modern German "Lied," so original and even peculiar in its melodious construction, so rich and characteristic in its rhythmic and harmonious treatment of the pianoforte accompaniment, occupies a unique place in the forms of modern musical culture.

German composers, until the latter part of the 18th century, published many compositions for the voice with an accompaniment for pianoforte, but being entirely under the influence of Italian music, their songs have no character whatever; they waver between the cut of the aria, of the canzonet and that of the song form. The effect produced is either heavy and dull, or empty and insignificant. It was not until the great masters, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, had unveiled the possibilities of modern German musical genius, and that the great poets Goethe and Schiller tempted composers with their immortal poems, that the German Lied received a higher poetical meaning. A modern writer says:

"Schubert raised the Lied to the height of a great work of art; before his time, melody alone was required of a song composer; he was the first to enter thoroughly into the meaning of the poem he intended to treat, and to hold the poet's intention as sacred. So true, so entirely original, so comprehensive was this great genius, that in the enormous number of songs he composed, we find almost every possible human emotion sketched in tone, with unrivalled beauty and power; and with what deep feeling!

"Beethoven gave his genius to song upon occasion; but these longing moods of mind which become tender little songs with others, he fashioned into great adagios; his songs needed the large territory of the complete orchestra.

"Mendelssohn, in the Lied, preferred poems of which the feeling kept within the bounds of pleasant gracefulness, to those in which the stormy waves of passion threatened danger to the fragile barque of song. He chose rather to break with the poet than to sin against lovely agreeability.

"Schumann, the greatest Lied composer since Schubert, is broad, impassioned, yet in the highest degree feminine in feeling,—romantic, oriental even in coloring, his wonderful imagination sometimes leads him beyond the strict outlines of legal forms; and yet a lover of this greatly gifted master can but rejoice in the luxuriant, lyrical and dramatic life that sometimes leads him to transgress the common boundaries."

The highest flower of an art like music—an ever progressive art, an art that has not yet attained its highest point of culmination, like painting and sculpture—is almost always the last flower. And as genuine originality always first develops itself from what has preceded it, so the Lied of Robert Franz undoubtedly sprang from that of Schubert and Schumann. As this intelligent, scholarly, gifted composer is fortunately yet living, and as there is no measure of length in art, we will avoid asking whether he has or has not equalled or surpassed those who went before him, but will be grateful that we have him also.

Many members of the school called, in the slang of the feuilleton, that of the "Music of the future," have essayed their powers in the Lied form. Liszt has written many songs, the majority of which are overstrained, harsh and impracticable for the singer; but a few among them are rare jewels of the purest water.

The short extract on the programme from Wagner's "Lohengrin," is given as an admirable specimen of what this composer can accomplish in a simple, melodious, pathetic vein—when he chooses.

THE SONATA.

The keyed instrument, with its different forms and names, such as Spinnet, Clavichord, Virginal, Harpsichord, Clavier, Cembalo, Clavecin, Fluegel, until it became in our days, the Pianoforte, has been since the beginning of the 16th century, when it first appeared in a tolerably perfect and useful shape, the favorite instrument of composers and amateurs; and since that time it has had no small influence on the development of musical art in general. The Pianoforte (we here use the term in its general sense) possesses a technique of its own, and consequently, muaic written for it must necessarily be adapted to this peculiar mechanism. In the literature of pianoforte music, from its beginning until our time, we find every form of composition assimilated to the peculiarities of this universal instrument; the Improvisation, Fantasia, Prelude, Toccata, Etude, with their loose forms; the distinct, rhythmical, measured forms of old and new dances, such as the Gavotte, Sarabande, Anglaise, Courante, Gigue, Allemande, Bourrée, Menuetto, Polonaise, Valse, Mazurka, etc.; melodies with variations: the complicated contrapuntal Fugue and Canon; the Suite of Bach and Handel; the Sonata of Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven, etc., etc. These constitute a store of musical treasures, which, while they show the different changes in form and taste, the growth and richness of musical minds, also enable us to follow the composer to his own individual poetical regions. Of all the forms of pianoforte music, none is so great, so noble and in its ideal contents so rich and deep as the Sonata; it is the point of culmination of all instrumental music. It becomes the Symphony when adapted to the manifold Orchestra. The Sonata is a composition in two, three and four movements, each different in Tempo, Rhythm, Key and Melodious character, which by means of contrast, variety, etc., gives to the hearer a picture of ideal inward human life.

About the end of the 16th century, the word Sonata was first employed to designate, generally, compositions intended to be played by instruments, while canzone was applied to those intended for the human voice. Then the forms of instrumental music were entirely copied from those of vocal music; and only towards the middle of the 17th century instrumental music began to create its own peculiar forms. The first Sonatas were composed for the violin and published in 1681 by Henry Biber, chapel-master at Salzburg. In 1683 the great violinist Corelli published 12 Sonatas for the Violin, Bass and Clavichord. The first Sonata for the Clavier, however, of significance in the development of this form was composed and published in 1696, by Kuhnau, the predecessor of J. S. Bach as cantor at the Leipzig Thomas School. Mattheson of Hamburg, the author of many works on the science of Music, published, in 1713, a Sonata "dedicated to the person who can play it the best." Domenico Scarlatti, 1683-1760, composed and published over 30 Sonatas, fresh, humorous, and elegant in form; this composer's Sonatas consist of one movement.

Durante, born 1693, published six Sonatas in two movements each; the first he calls studio, and the second discreto. Though many a composer wrote and published Sonatas during the first part of the 18th century, they have all been surpassed by the works of Ph. E. Bach, 1714-1788, the son of J. S. Bach. Ph. E. Bach may be rightly considered as the composer who gave its lasting form to our modern Sonata. Haydn and Mozart, so great, so original, perfected the Sonata form of Bach, while they acknowledged the merit of this master's works; they gave to every movement of the Sonata a deeper, ideal meaning. The charming Sonatas of Clementi must also be mentioned here. Beethoven brought the form of the Sonata to its highest perfection, as indeed every other form of instrumental music.

New Musical Books.

The Saturday Review gives us a glimpse, as follows, of several musical books, just published in Germany:

Ludwig Nohl's "Sketchbook" consists of various essays on music, giving a general survey of the present state of musical matters at Munich, now one of the European centres of the art, in virtue of the King of Bavaria's patronage and amateurship. As all the world knows, the royal taste is the reverse of orthodox, which may or may not be a deplorable circumstance in itself, but has at all events the advantage of securing new ideas a fair chance for existence. Few innovators in art or any other department of human activity have propounded their views under such favorable circumstances as Herr Wagner. If not an entire convert to Wagner's theories, Nohl is a decided admirer of his practice. His elaborate essay on the composer's last work, "The Mastersingers," is the most interesting part of his volume, the rather as it will probably be a very long time before this opera is performed out of Germany.

"Reminiscences of Mendelssohn," by the celebrated actor Devrient, form an acceptable supplement to the volumes of correspondence published by the family, but go only a very little way towards supplying the desideratum of a complete biography. The period of Devrient's chief intimacy with Mendelssohn was that of Mendelssohn's youth, when he was between thirteen and twenty-one, and consequently that when information respecting him is of least importance. Much that naturally appears delightful in the biographer's recollection seems trivial in his narrative; we are, however, indebted to him for some really interesting glimpses of the interior of the Mendelssohn household, and of the method pursued with Felix's education. Some casual sketches of other notabilities are graphic; Zelter's ruggedness is well portrayed, and so is the languid conceit which Heine affected in society. There is an amusing picture of Varnhagen—his wife's Boswell—hovering at a respectful distance around that intellectual queen of Berlin society, and eagerly inquiring after any remark of hers which had failed to reach him. After Mendelssohn's departure from Berlin, his intercourse with Devrient was of necessity only epistolary, and his few letters, though interesting, cannot be compared with those addressed to his own family. There is no stronger symptom of the goodness of Mendelssohn's heart than the inspiration which always came over him when his powers were invoked for the entertainment of his own circle. After several years Mendelssohn returned to Berlin at the invitation of Frederick William IV., who expected the regeneration of Prussian music at his hands. With an instinctive perception of the situation, Mendelssohn wished to abandon this ill-starred project from the first, and it was chiefly in deference to Devrient's advice that he persisted in the undertaking which eventually occasioned him so much chagrin. His resignation again interrupted his personal relations with his biographer. It should be added that the irritable as well as the amiable side of Mendelssohn's nature is brought out in this sketch, but that the portrait gains thereby more in vividness, than it loses in attractiveness.

Wasielewski, the meritorious biographer of Schumann, has produced another work which will be highly appreciated by musicians. The first part contains a history of violins and violin makers, the second and more extensive is devoted to composers and performers on the instrument. Violinists have in general been the most erratic of the musical fraternity, and the romantic incidents of their lives will be found such as to repay others besides strictly musical readers for perusing Wasielewski's biography.

Albert Hahn's edition of Mozart's "Requiem" comprises a commentary, a comparison of variations between the standard edition and the original manuscript, a new German translation, and a very disparaging criticism of the old one, which certainly appears a conspicuous exception to the usual fidelity and spirit of versions in this language.

"Musical Character-Portraits," by Otto Gumprecht, are a series of essays on Schubert, Weber, Mendelssohn, Rossini, Auber, and Meyerbeer. They are very pleasant reading, and the criticism is genial and liberal, but seems to embody the floating mass of popular opinion with little pretension to originality.

A new edition of Wasielewski's "Life of Schumann" is enriched with some letters not previously published. The work in its present form is hardly adapted for the American public, but now that Schumann's music is beginning to be known among us, we apprehend that an abridgment of it might be attempted with success. It is a far more interesting book than Von Hellborn's "Life of Schubert," which has been translated twice over. Schubert's existence was so retired, and his intimacies were of so commonplace a nature, that his biography hardly discloses a trace of the opulence of fancy and feeling which he must certainly have possessed. Schumann was himself the most reserved of men, but his circle of acquaintance was wide, his biography has been undertaken while his memory is still fresh, an extensive correspondence has been preserved, many incidents in his life were peculiarly adapted to elicit traits of character, and from all these circumstances combined we obtain a vivid and tolerably complete portrait. As a psychological study, his unostentatious figure is more interesting than the fascinating personality of Mendelssohn, or the adventurous career of Weber. There is not in the whole range of biography an instance of an artist's life more purely and simply consecrated to art.

Herr C. B. Bitter has supplemented his valuable biography of Sebastian Bach by an account of that great musician's hardly less famous son Emanuel, and the brothers of the latter. The work is partly biographical, partly musical, but technical details preponderate, and it is not likely to be much referred to except by musical readers. The penury of biographical details is the sufficient apology for this method of treatment. Emanuel Bach's life was tranquil and uneventful; the nature of the compositions to which he devoted himself precluded his becoming a conspicuous public character like Gluck, or a popular idol like Weber or Rossini; and although his contemporaries rendered the fullest homage to his genius, they have preserved hardly any particulars of his life. His reputation has considerably declined since his death, and Herr Bitter appears to a certain extent in the character of a vindicator and apologist. At the same time he does not spare what he regards as the shortcomings of his hero, whose great service, according to him, is to have adapted his father's style of composition to the technical improvements effected in his own days. The elder brother, Friedemann Bach, adhered obstinately to the manner of his father, whose genius he was unable to rival. He thus fell behind the world in every sense, and died in distress, partly occasioned by his own impracticable temper and dissipated habits. Johann Christian, the younger brother, followed an opposite course. Greedy of gain and careless of renown, he devoted his fine talents to the gratification of the frivolous taste of his day, and has been requited by the total oblivion of posterity. The wide diffusion and long persistence of musical talent in the race of Bach is a most curious phenomenon, and justifies the elaborate research which Herr Bitter has bestowed upon the family genealogy.

Music Abroad.

London.

PASSION WEEK ORATORIOS.—The Messiah was performed in London every night during Passion-week, Saturday excepted. On Monday it was given at Exeter Hall by the National Choral Society, under Mr. G. W. Martin's direction. The soloists were Miss Arabella Smythe, Miss Palmer, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Lander. Mr. Reeves' appearance in the hall for the first time this season was heartily welcomed by a crowded audience. He sang as grandly as ever, and made the customary profound impression in the "Passion" music and "Thou shalt dash them." The audience would have had the latter again, but Mr. Reeves was true to his laudable principle and declined. Pitch half a tone lower.

On Tuesday Mr. Barnby gave the "Sacred Oratorio" in St. James's Hall, with Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Annie Sinclair, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Winn, and Mr. Lewis Thomas as principals. Pitch "Diapason normal."

On Wednesday the Sacred Harmonic Society gave the work in Exeter Hall, with Mme. Sherrington, Mme. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Vernon Rigny, and Signor Foli as soloists. Mr. Costa being absent from England, the oratorio was well sustained by his locum tenens, M. Sainton.

On Thursday Exeter Hall was again thrown open to a Messiah audience, the performers being the choir of the Tonic Sol-fa Association, conducted by Mr. T. Gardner, with Mme. Sherrington, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. Nelson Varley, and Signor Foli as chief singers.

On Friday performances took place at the Royal Amphitheatre, Holborn, the artists announced being Miss Rose Hersee, Miss Palmer, Mr. Larwill, Mr. Maybrick, and Herr Formes, whose farewell performance it was stated to be. We understand, however, that the great German basso did not appear. Mr. C. J. Hargitt conducted, and Mr. Carrodus led the orchestra.—At the Standard Theatre selections from the Messiah, Stabat Mater, and Judas Maccabeus took place. Among those who took part were Mme. Bodda Pyne, Mme. Rufersdorff, Mme. Patoy-Whytock, Mme. Zuliani, Mr. G. Patey, and Mr. Wilbye Cooper. The band was a large one, and Herr Meyer Lutz was conductor.—At the Britannia a sacred performance was given, consisting of the Messiah. Mr. Kingsbury was the conductor, and Mme. Liebhart, Miss Julia Derby, Mr. Vernon Rigny, and Mr. Thomas were the principal singers. The band was composed of well-known musicians.—Selections from Elijah, The Messiah, and Stabat Mater were given at the New East London, in which Mme. Florence Lancia, Miss Zorlini, Elliott Giler, and Mr. A. Cook took part.—On Friday also the Stabat Mater of Rossini was given in St. James's Hall, under the direction of Mr. Jennings, who had for principals Mmes. Banks, Cole, Franklein, and Wynne, Messrs. Carl Stepan, Mason, and George Perren.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The Opera-season commenced on Tuesday night with Bellini's Norma, which, though very nearly forty years old, is still one of the most popular of lyric tragedies.

All the world, or, at least, all the musical world, knows that Mr. Gye and Mr. Mapleson have gone into partnership; and it might have been anticipated that the opening night would be used as an occasion for exhibiting, at any rate to a certain extent, the united strength of the two companies. This, however, was not the case.

The chief parts of the opera were thus distributed:

Norma, Mlle. Tietjens; Adalgisa, Mlle. Sinico; Pollio, Signor Mongini; Orovoso, Signor Foli. That since Mme. Grisi has left the stage Mlle. Tietjens, though a German, is now the only absolutely acceptable Norma can hardly be denied. Her voice appeared very much fatigued, but her performance generally exhibited those qualities for which it has long been favorably noted.

On Thursday night, there was a very effective performance of Rigoletto, with Mme. Vanzini, Signor Mongini, Mr. Santley, Mlle. Scalchi, and Signor Foli in the principal characters.—Mus. World, Apr. 3.

Fidelio, on Saturday night, drew an audience which, to judge by the look of the house, outnumbered the audiences brought by Norma and Rigoletto put together. Signor Arditi was once more at the head of the orchestra, and the execution of the overture (the magnificent Leonora No. 3) was so fine that the audience called for it again, with such unmistakable enthusiasm that, long as it is, it had to be repeated from the first note of the introduction to the end of the allegro. The entire performance, however, instrumental and vocal, was of the very best, the value of the newly-organized chorus being convincingly demonstrated in the wonderful episode of the temporarily enfranchised prisoners (which, by the way, did not get "a hand" of applause), and the prodigious finale of the second act, nothing less grand and inspiring than which could possibly have prevented the unequalled scene of the dungeon, immediately preceding it, from being other than an anti-climax, seeing that the dramatic interest culminates with the duel between Florestan and Leonora-Fidelio—at once his deliverer and faithful wife. Mlle. Tietjens, having completely recovered from her indisposition, gave one of her noblest representations of Fidelio, her performance of which sublime character, however, is too well known to make it necessary that we should dwell in detail upon any part of it. Enough that the lady to whom for years we are exclusively indebted for occasional representations of Beethoven's one dramatic work (to say nothing of Cherubini's Medea, Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauride, and other masterpieces), has rarely done more to prove that, while she is in possession of her exceptional means, Fidelio must still, of necessity, form part of the operatic repertory. The Florestan of the evening was Signor Bulterini (one of Mr. Mapleson's most recent importations), a gentleman who owns a powerful tenor voice, which by husbanding a little more carefully he might use to much better purpose. He sang too loudly from first to last, and thus missed an opportunity of impressing the audience with Florestan's impassioned soliloquy in the dungeon scene. Otherwise he was correct enough and had fairly acquainted himself with the music. A more satisfactory Don Pizarro than Mr. Santley, as we have had frequent occasions of declaring, is not now to be named. No one since the late Staudigl in his prime has sung the music so well, and even Staudigl in his prime did not sing it better. In the small but by no means unimportant character of Marcellina Mlle. Sinico was, as she never fails to be, perfect; and in Mr. Charles Lyall she enjoyed the co-operation of a Jacquin, who not only knows the music thoroughly, but gives significance to the part by acting alike unobtrusive and sensible. Signor Foli, as times go, is perhaps as good a Rocco as could be chosen, and Signor Campi is more than respectable as the Minister, who does not appear until the last finale. Besides the overture, the exquisite quartet in the first scene (Mlle. Tietjens and Sinico, Signor Foli, and Mr. Lyall) was encored and repeated, while after the great scene of the dungeon—the quartet, the deliverance of Florestan by the intervention of Leonora with a loaded pistol, and the rapturous duet between the devoted pair, once more united—Mlle. Tietjens, Signor Bulterini, Signor Foli, and Mr. Santley had to appear before the lamps to be newly and warmly applauded. The opera was listened to throughout with an interest that could not be misunderstood. It was wise on the part of the management to produce it thus early, inasmuch as when the wandering stars who are the chief attractions of the "fashionable" season have arrived, Beethoven and his Fidelio must perforce be laid aside.

The opera on Monday was Il Trovatore. What about Il Trovatore? Thus much and no more:—Mlle. Tietjens played Leonora, Mlle. Scalchi played Azucena, Signor Mongini played Manrico, Signor Foli played Ferrando, and Mr. Santley played Count di Luna; Mr. Santley was compelled to repeat "Il balen;" Signor Mongini was compelled to repeat "Ah si, ben mio;" Mlle. Tietjens, Signor Mongini, and the chorus, and the orchestra, were compelled to repeat the "Miserere;" there was a full house, and there was a great deal of applause. Voilà tout. Those who want any more about Il Trovatore may refer to divers precious volumes of the Musical World, wherein they will find enough and to spare.

On Tuesday Mlle. Ilma de Murska made her first appearance for the season as Linda, in Linda di Chamouni. Her reception was highly flattering, and deservedly so, for she is singing even better than when she was last among us. Signor Naudin (his first appearance) was Carlo; Signor Ciampi (his also), the Marchese; Signor Bagagiolo (his), the Prefetto; Mlle. Scalchi, Pierotto; and Mr. Santley, Antonio.—Times, April 7.

On Thursday evening the "Huquenots" was given with a very strong cast, as it included the three prime donne at present in London. The exacting demands on Mlle. Tietjens's voice in this opera showed more strongly than ever how much she needs repose, as at times her fatigue was painfully apparent, notably so in the duet with Marcel in the third act, or the second as it was made last evening. Clever as Mlle. de Murska is in executing such music as that allotted to Marguerite di Valois, we prefer Mlle. Sinico's bright metallic voice in this character. Of course her singing lent an importance to the part, which forced a recognition from a very apathetic audience, who never appear to recognize how beautiful is the music written for the Queen. The music allotted to Urban being too low for Mlle. Vanzini's voice, was raised, a very questionable proceeding. In the air, "Nobil Donna," Mlle. Vanzini was very successful, but in the interpolated cavatina, "No non giannai scommetto," her singing left much to be desired. Signor Mongini was in magnificent voice, and, as Raoul, showed clearly that he has succeeded in checking his exuberant style. At times, of course, a tenore robusto is absolutely necessary in this opera, and here of course this artist has no living rival, but we were much gratified to find the great progress he has made in the delivery of the passages requiring more expression than strength. Mr. Santley has exchanged his part of Nevers for that of San Bris, by which the former is left in the hands of Sig. Tagliacoe, who, though a conscientious artist, has not now the power to sing exactly the notes set down for him by the composer. De Nevers has not much to do, but Mr. Santley has made the part peculiarly his own, and therefore any other artist is heard at a disadvantage. Signor Bagagiolo's voice is not sufficiently powerful for the music of Marcel, but nevertheless he did his best, and that successfully. The choruses were given with much precision, and with the exception of the grand chorus of the "Benediction des Poignards," faultlessly sung. In the earlier part of this chorus there was a want of decision which was apparent to all. The Guards band also at the end of the second act were rather at fault in the opening of the instrumental portion of the bridal chorus. Taken however as a whole, the performance was satisfactory.

"Linda" is to be repeated to-morrow, the "Huquenots" on Monday, "Fidelio" on Tuesday, and we are promised "Il Flauto Magico" on Thursday.—Orchestra, April 9.

The MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS were concluded for the season by an entertainment that was advertised to be for the "Director's benefit." The three principal pianists—Mme. Arabella Goddard, Mme. Schumann and Mr. Halle—all took part in it, playing together Bach's Concerto in D minor, with quintet accompaniment. Herr Joachim (who played superbly), Signor Piatti, Master Arthur Le Jeune and Miss Edith Wynne, all appeared, and the programme was made up of masterpieces. The list of works performed during the past season, the eleventh, shows how wide is the field explored in these valuable concerts. Beethoven has been most frequently performed, next in order comes Mendelssohn, and then Mozart; while Bach, by reason of his green old age, and Schubert, for his fresh youthfulness, follow at a dead heat. Boccherini, Cernibini, Corelli, Dussek, Handel, Haydn, Hummel, Marcello, Molique, Porpora, Schumann, Tartini, Weber and Wölfl, have all been represented. As if to atone for the absence of Spohr from this goodly catalogue, Herr Joachim brought forward at the last concert, not included in the list, two movements by the great violin composer. The increasing popularity of these concerts is the most hopeful sign of the times for English music. We cannot praise too highly the instrumental portions, but we should like to see more variety in the vocal music. Not a word can be said against Schubert's songs, for which the Director shows a laudable partiality. But Schubert wrote some 900; why do we not hear more than about nine! It is true that the vocal music is only intended as a relief to the instrumental. But as the audience is composed to a great extent of the same individuals at every concert, it is a questionable relief to always hear the same song. It is a reproach to singers that their repertory is so much more limited than that of players. A few years ago, a lady, who used constantly to appear at the Monday Popular Concerts, was in the habit of always begging her hearers to "Name the glad day," and in the season that has just closed another lady has been asking as perseveringly, "Ah! why do we love?"—Athenaeum, March 27.

The PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, which has given its concerts at the Hanover Square Rooms since the year 1833, gave its first concert of the present season on Wednesday evening at St. James's Hall. The reason for the change in the locale cannot be given in better words than in those of the historical and analytical programme written by Mr. G. A. Macfarren for the society. "The time has come when the oldest of the musical societies of London must no longer address its efforts to the gratification of any circle less than that of the whole round of music lovers in the city where its concerts are held. It has therefore once more changed its locality to meet that demand of the time which itself has prompted." On the other hand there are some who think that the removal of these entertainments from Hanover Square Rooms, the best in London for sonority, and, in our opinion, sufficiently large for the enjoyment of a refined and finished orchestral performance, is a perilous experiment. It is to be hoped that the pecuniary results may realize the sanguine expectations of the society, but that art will be a gainer by the efforts of an orchestral performance in St. James's Hall is questionable. "In the attempt to popularize art," said Holmes, the biographer of Mozart, there is "danger of vulgarizing it; for, in a large assembly of persons in London, attracted by rival star singers and soloists, the sensual will always prevail over the intellectual." At all the monster classical orchestral concerts given in Exeter Hall and at the Crystal Palace, before a mixed audience, there is less discrimination than wisdom in the applause, and we have more than once witnessed a very mediocre singer carry away the honors of the concert, in which a very creditable performance of a classical orchestral composition was comparatively unnoticed. Then, too, in a very large audience of various tastes, partisans of vocalists and soloists frequently persist in recalls and encores, and thus outrage the feelings of the cultivated amateur and the professional auditor. Let us hope that no such results may arise from the change that has taken place, in the removal of the society's concerts from Hanover Square to St. James's Hall. Indeed that the directors have shown their wisdom in the change would seem to be proved by the increase in the number of subscribers, and by the crowded and fashionable audience. Mr. G. W. Casins, the conductor, was warmly greeted on his entering the orchestra. The programme was rich and varied.

Symphony in G minor.....Wölfl.
Scena ed Aria. "Crudele! ah no più bene," "Non mi dir." (Il Don Giovanni).....Mozart.
Mlle. Anna Regan (her first appearance in England).
Concerto for Violin.....Beethoven.
Violin, Herr Joachim.
Scena e Cavatina. "Salve! dimora casta e pura" (Faust).
Gounod.
Mr. Vernon Rigby. Violin Obligato, Mr. V. Collins.
Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber.
Symphony in A minor (Scotch).....Mendelssohn.
Aria, "Pur dicesti, o bocca bella".....Lotti.
Mlle. Anna Regan.
Solos for Violin, a. Abundant.....Schumann.
b. Loure.....Seb. Bach.
All-gro in E.....
Violin, Herr Joachim.
Overture, "Lodoiska".....Cherubini.

Each movement of the symphony by Wölfl, a composer well known by pianoforte players, particularly for his celebrated sonata, the "Ne plus Ultra," is replete with melody, and beautifully rhythmical. We were particularly pleased with the minuet, which, however, seems to be taken from the canon of Haydn's Oxford Symphony, in E minor. The above symphony and the remainder of the orchestral pieces were carefully conducted by Mr. Casins. The band, with a few additional stringed instruments, is still too weak for St. James's Hall. The brass wind instruments, generally, are too powerful. The chiaroscuro of concert orchestral performances is of a more refined and delicate nature than that required in the performance of dramatic music in a large theatre, and this distinction so strictly observed on the continent, seems to have escaped the attention of our best conductors of London bands. Beethoven's concerto for violin was magnificently rendered by Herr Joachim. Of his performance of a concerto with which he made his debut in 1844 it is almost unnecessary now to remark that he played it in a splendid style; his cadenzas were admirably constructed and marvellously executed. The first part closed with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," given with immense spirit by the band. Mendelssohn's symphony in A minor (the Scotch) was the great feature of the second part. All its marvellous beauties were fully developed under Mr. Casins's careful guidance. A dreamy morceau by Schumann (the Abundant) and a Loure and Prelude in E by Bach were the pieces assigned to Herr Joachim in this part, and the concert closed with Cherubini's overture to "Lodoiska." The novelty of the concert was the lady vocalist. Her voice is a pure soprano, and though not powerful, it is pleasing in quality. Mlle. Regan, we presume, is a German lady; she has been well instructed, sings with feeling and taste, with a modest shake, and perfect intonation. Her singing of Mozart's aria, though deficient in dramatic expression, was a very conscientious interpretation of the author. In the simple aria of Lotti, accompanied by Mr. Cousins at the pianoforte, she was equally successful. Altogether this debutante made a favorable impression. Mr. Rigby is rising, deservedly, into public favor.—Orchestra, March 13.

Subjoined is the programme of the second concert:

Symphony, No. 2, in C.....Schumann.
Recit. e Aria, "Che farò senza Euridice".....Gluck.
Concerto in G minor.....Mendelssohn.
Recit. e Aria, "Mi tradi quell'alma ingrata".....Mozart.
Overture, "The Wedding of Canacho".....Mendelssohn.
Symphony, No. 8, in F.....Beethoven.
Song, "Marguerite".....Schubert.
Overture, "Zauberflöte".....Mozart.

Schumann's symphony (perhaps his best) was admirably played, and both more liked and more applauded than on the occasion of its first production by the Philharmonic Society, five years since. Mme. Schumann played Mendelssohn's concerto, on a Broadwood pianoforte, and was "recalled" at the conclusion of her very energetic performance. The early overture of Mendelssohn was not, by any means, so well played as the symphony; but its spirit and beauty shone out, nevertheless.

At the third concert, Herr Reinecke is to play Mozart's pianoforte concerto in D, and an overture from his pen, entitled König Manfred, will be given. The symphonies at this concert are to be Schubert's in B minor (unfinished), and Beethoven's in C minor.—Mus. World, April 10.

CRYSTAL PALACE. The finest of Schubert's Symphonies, the ninth, and Mozart's exquisite "Zauberflöte" Overture were both rendered with noteworthy perfection at last Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert. But the accompaniments to Mendelssohn's D minor Concerto were played with an amount of careless coarseness that reminded the hearer how difficult it is for a conductor to excel in more than one branch of his art. The man who directs to admiration the interpretation of a purely orchestral work rarely pays sufficient attention to the requirements of a singer or solo-player. The piano part of Mendelssohn's Concerto was confided to Mme. Arabella Goddard's unerring fingers. Wagner's unjust opinion of Mendelssohn, that "he was a man who, having nothing to say, said it well," applies more fitly to Mendelssohn's admirer Gade, whose overture, "Im Hochland," made no effect despite all the cleverness which has gone to its composition. The vocal music contributed to this concert by Mlle. Regan, whose bright voice gains on the ear, and by Mr. G. F. Jefferys, a basso, who has come out too soon, had no special interest. To day's programme includes the whole of Beethoven's "Prometheus" music. The advertisement states that it will be heard in its entirety "probably for the first time in England."—Athen, April 3.

LEIPZIG.—The programme of the twentieth and last Gewandhaus Concert consisted exclusively of works by Beethoven, namely, the "Kyrie," "Gloria," "Sanctus," and "Benedictus," from the Mass in C major, and the Ninth Symphony. The solo singers were Milles, Strauss, Borée, Herren Rebling and Ehrke.

KONIGSBERG.—According to annual custom, a performance of Grann's Tod Jesu was given by the Musical Society on Good Friday.

MANNHEIM.—Die Meistersinger was tolerably successful in its first production, but in consequence of the indignation created by Herr R. Wagner's pamphlet, entitled Ueber das Judentum in der Musik (On the Jewish Element in Music), the opera was violently hissed at the fourth performance. The majority of the local papers are exceedingly wroth against the champion of the Future.

ST. PETERSBURG.—Mme. Adelina Patti selected Don Pasquale for her benefit. Bouquets of incredible size were presented her in the course of the evening, bouquets as big round as tables, at each of which half a dozen persons might easily sit. In addition to these monster specimens of the florist's art, there was an absolute deluge of smaller nosegays, separate flowers, and wreaths, from the side boxes. The value of these floral tributes of homage at this time of the year could not be less than 4000 roubles! The fair artist's admirers offered her also a pair of ear-rings and a brooch, in the shape of a butterfly. Some say these objects are worth 40,000 roubles; others put them down at the more modest sum of 12,000. The correct amount lies probably somewhere between the two sums. Of course, Mme. Patti accepted these substantial tokens of her high popularity in this capital. But it appears that there are some ladies who are made of sterner stuff, and possess sufficient strength of mind to refuse a present of jewelry. Such a fair phenomenon is Mlle. Lawrowski. She was singing in Glinka's opera, Life for the Czar, when the conductor handed her first a bouquet and then a bracelet. The bouquet she took; the bracelet she declined. She said that it would be far better to "give it to the poor; as far as she herself was concerned, it went against her feelings to accept a present." If Mlle. Lawrowski thought to make capital out of this act of self-abnegation, she missed her mark, for the audience did not at all appear to appreciate it as deserving admiration; quite the contrary.

On the eve of her departure from St. Petersburg Mme. Patti signed an engagement to return there, from the 15th of November to the 15th of March, "for the consideration," it is said, of 200,000 francs.

WEIMAR.—Mme. Viardot has completed an opera, "Le Dernier des Sorciers," which has been orchestrated by Liszt, and which is to be played at Weimar on the approaching fete-day of the Grand Duke.

VIENNA.—It is now definitely settled that the magnificent new Opera-house will open on the 15th May, with Gluck's Armide. A new ballet, Sardanapal, is to be produced in the course of the season. The author, Herr Paul Taglioni, will come from Berlin to superintend the rehearsals.—Dr. Ferdinand Hiller has recently left, after being the object of all sorts of eversions. The Abbate Franz Liszt, on the other hand, has recently arrived. He intends stopping only a short time.

The LOWER-RHINE FESTIVAL, at Whitsuntide, is to be held this year at Düsseldorf. The programme announces for the first day, Handel's Joshua. Second day, Bach's Magnificat; "Spring" and "Autumn," from Haydn's Seasons; Mendelssohn's Lobgesang. The third day is the so-called Artists' Concert. The soloists of the first two days will be Frau Soltas of Cassel (soprano), Frau Joachim (alto), Herr Vogel of Munich (tenor), Scaria of Dresden (bass), and Joseph Joachim (violin).

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 26.—At Mr. Thomas's 21st Sunday Concert (April 18) Mme. Lanari and Herr Bussmeyer were the soloists, and the orchestral programme included Beethoven's Coriolanus Overture, and two little gems by Schumann and Vogt.

I find that your printers have made me say that Mr. Hoffman played Chopin's Nocturne in F sharp minor at the Philharmonic; this is a mistake, it should have read "F sharp major."

These Philharmonic people have again changed the programme for the next concert; for some reason the Hiller Overture has been withdrawn, and the "Oberon" substituted, while in addition to this we are to have Mendelssohn's A major (Italian) Symphony, which was played by the Society at one of its concerts last season.

Mr. Bergner—our admirable violoncellist—gave a most enjoyable concert on Tuesday evening at Irving Hall. He was assisted by Mr. Von Inten, S. B. Mills, Theo. Thomas, Otto Singer, Matska, Hess, Eller, and Miss Josey Hoffe. I quote the special attractions:

Piano Trio, D minor, op. 49.....Mendelssohn.
Von Inten, Thomas, Bergner.
Theme and Variations for Quartet op. 18.....Beethoven.
2 Romanzen, Oboe and Piano.....Schumann.
Messrs. Eller and Singer.
Ungarische Zigeunerweisen.....Tausig.
S. B. Mills.

The beautiful Trio, with the delightful Scherzo, was capitally played, as were also the Theme and Variations from one of Beethoven's early Quartets. The Romances for oboe and piano were thoroughly Schumann-like, and consequently enjoyable. Mr. Mills played Tausig's "Gipsy-music" in a style that was wonderful in its force and decision. He received a merited encore and responded thereto with Schumann's delicious "Des Abends" (from op. 12). Of Mr. Bergner's own playing there is but little to be said; his rare merits as an artist are so well known and appreciated that one hesitates to repeat stereotyped words of praise; suffice it to say, then, that his performance (both in his solos and in the Trio and Quartet) fully justified his well established reputation, and that he was greeted with much enthusiasm by a disgracefully small audience.

On Wednesday evening Mme. Parepa-Rosa made her re-appearance (after her long illness) in a miscellaneous concert at Steinway Hall; she was assisted by A. H. Pease (pianist), Carl Rosa, Mr. Nordblom (a new Swedish tenor), and Messrs. Ferranti and Colby. Mme. P. was warmly welcomed and sang excellently well, barring a slight tendency to sharpness in the upper notes. Mr. Nordblom made a favorable impression by his rendering of "Adelaide;" his voice is clear, pure, and strong, besides being well cultivated. The artists whom I have named constitute the "Parepa-Rosa Concert Troupe," which is very soon to start for the Western States on a tour of some five or six weeks.

On Thursday evening we had Haydn's "Creation" with Mme. Parepa, Messrs. Simpson and Thomas as soloists, and with the assistance of the Mendelssohn Union and Theo. Thomas's orchestra. The whole performance was under the direction of the latter gentleman. Mme. P. was in better voice than on the previous evening, but for some reason she excited very little enthusiasm and received (comparatively) little applause. As for Mr. J. R. Thomas, it would be better for himself and the public if he should discontinue singing in oratorios; his voice is not clear and sweet, and he is apt to draw alarmingly. Mr. Simpson did far better and needs only to pronounce his words in order to be a most acceptable artist.

On Thursday evening, May 6th, we are to have the "Messiah" given by the Harmonic Society under the direction of F. L. Ritter; the solos will be taken by Mme. Parepa, Miss C. V. Hutchings, Mr. Simpson, and Mr. Whitney (of your city).

On Saturday evening the Liederkreis Society gave a capital concert in Steinway Hall. I quote a portion of the programme:

Overture, "Jesonda".....Spohr.
"Le Trille du Diable," P. F. and V'n Sonata.....Tartini.
Messrs. Von Inten and Kopta.
"Walpurgisnacht".....Mendelssohn.

The soloists were Mr. Von Inten (piano), Mr. Kopta (violin), Mr. Steins basso, Mme. Frederici (mezzo); also there was an orchestra of 50, a male chorus of about seventy, and a female chorus of nearly the same number. The Walpurgisnacht, which was naturally the feature of the evening, was rendered in truly admirable style, although the solos might have been more carefully sung; the male chorus, however, was simply perfect.

Messrs. Von Inten and Kopta played Tartini's quaint Sonata capably and narrowly escaped an encore. Mr. Von Inten played as his solos a Chopin Nocturne in E flat, and ["there is but one step," &c., &c.] a Faust Caprice by Bussmeyer; this latter is simply idiotic, and Mr. Von Inten was most injudicious in coupling such trash with the exquisite Nocturne, which he played with great neatness and delicacy. Mme. Frederici sang Schubert's "Wanderer" and, being encored, Schumann's wonderful "Frühlingsnacht;" the accompaniment of the latter was simply butchered by the person to whom it was entrusted. I should recommend him to practice occasionally in reading.

I omitted to mention that on Wednesday evening Mr. Hugo Bussmeyer gave an "Historical Soirée Musicale" in Steinway's ware-rooms. He was assisted by Mr. Kopta, Mr. Von Inten, Mlle. Orloff, and Mme. Werner. There were Sonatas by Corelli, Scarlatti, and Tartini, and other morceaux by Mozart, Handel, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Wagner, Liszt, and Gounod. Mr. Bussemeyer played, among other things, Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" and a Jagdlied by Mendelssohn (Lieder ohne Worte, Bk. I, No. 3); the former he did tolerably, but the latter was inconceivably bad; he hammers and pounds the keys and uses the loud pedal "with perfect looseness."

Mr. Theo. Thomas's series of Sunday Concerts closed with the 22d, last evening. These were some of the good things:

Overture, "King Stephan".....Beethoven.
Scherzo, Reformation Symphony.....Mendelssohn.
Träumerei.....Schumann.
Turkish March.....Mozart.

Mlle. Josey Hoffe and Mr. Wenzel Kopta were the soloists. F.

NEW YORK, MAY 3.—Rossini's extensively advertised and much lauded "Messe Solennelle" was produced for the first time on Thursday evening at the Academy of Music, was repeated on Friday evening, and at Steinway Hall on Sunday evening. The solos were taken by Miss Kellogg, Mme. Testa, Sigs. Boetti and Antonucci; the orchestra numbered about fifty, and the chorus forty-five (with only ten sopranos).

There is nothing solemn about the work with the exception of its name; written in a florid, highly colored style, it is essentially operatic, any thing but sacred. The finest number in it is the "O Salutaris," in which the harmonic changes in the orchestral accompaniment are extremely beautiful and quite fresh. This solo was sung in an exceedingly effective way by Mme. Testa, who has but little voice, but uses that little with great skill. She received a very decided encore [at the Friday evening's performance] and was the only artist who was so honored.

Miss Kellogg's voice is too slender for much except light operas; her singing of the "Crucifixus" (which she curiously pronounces cru-che-fixus) was but little above mediocrity and elicited very little applause. In the "Sanctus" she attempted to touch high C, and the result was a facial contortion and a positive screech, which was most unmusical.

The chorus singing was tolerably good, but the vocal force was entirely inadequate for the demands of the work, the size of the orchestra, and the dimensions of the building. As regards the instruments, the trombones and other brass were too blatant and obtrusive, and needed toning down, and the whole force—vocal, instrumental—seemed a little out of the control of Mr. Maretzek, who conducted the performance.

The "Mass" is to be given in Brooklyn on Thursday evening of this week, and again at the Academy as a matinee performance on Saturday.

At the last Philharmonic, on Saturday evening—Mr. Charles Jarvis, of Philadelphia, will be the pianist. F.

PARIS, APRIL 20.—The 14th and last of the Conservatoire concerts took place on the 18th inst., with the following programme:

Symphonie en si bémol.....Beethoven.
Ouvverture d'Oberon.....Weber.
Œdipe de Colone: double chœur.....Mendelssohn.
O perfido sparguiro.....Beethoven.
Psaume.....Marcello.
Hymne.....Haydn.

The soli were sung by Mme. Gueymard. I can give no account of the performance, as I was absent from Paris at the time. The season is coming to its close. Our charming Swedish song-bird, Christine Nilsson, will soon take flight for northern skies. Previous to her departure, however, she will sing at the Salle Herz for the benefit of the sufferers from a disaster in the province of Smoland.

The engagement of la Patti at the Theatre Italien terminated on the evening of Saturday the 17th. She sang in Rigoletto and, were there degrees of perfection, I might say that she seemed to surpass herself. In the third Act she was recalled again and again—not as the celebrated Prima Donna, the idol of Europe, but as the Gilda, whose song was more than Verdi's music, and whose voice revealed the divine depth of that magnificent passion, which might be—and is not.

To-day we have a supplementary performance of Linda, and then adieu to la Patti until next season. At the Grand Opera Faust still continues en scene. Yesterday at the Theatre Lyrique Wagner's Rienzi was represented for the 7th time. People do not know exactly what to think of this opera, so they give it the benefit of the doubt and call it "splendide." Rossini's "Messe Solennelle" is gaining golden opinions from critics and from the public. On the 30th inst. it will be performed at the Church of the Trinity and Mme. Alboni will sing the contralto soli.

During the winter we have had much good chamber music, and the seances of the "Quatuor Florentine" may be cited as among the best of their kind. The last took place April 12. Among the selections performed were Mozart's quatuor en ut (No. 6), Mendelssohn's in mi bémol, and a Serenade by Haydn.

Concert Review.—The Season Over.

What remains to complete the record is only gleaned after a long, rich harvest. The field was not empty; some of the best yield was left behind, worthy to be gathered up with care. For example:

MR. HUGO LEONHARD'S Piano-forte Matinées. A pleasanter task we could not wish than to recall the last two, which took place on the last two Thursdays of April, filling the Chickering Hall better than before. The first of these (third of the series, April 22) was after this programme:

Siciliano and Gavotte, B minor.....Bach.
Aria, "My Heart ever faithful,".....Bach.
Sonata, E flat major, op. 7.....Beethoven.
Capriccio, E major, op. 83, No. 2.....Mendelssohn.
Scherzo, C sharp minor, op. 30.....Chopin.
Song without words, A major, No. 48.....Mendelssohn.
Songs.....R. Franz.
Auf dem Meer, op. 11.....
"Wand' ich in dem Wald," op. 39.....
"Zwischen Weizen und Korn," op. 38.....
Andante from op. 17.....Schumann.
Schlummerlied.....O. Dresel.
Intermezzo from op. 28.....Schumann.
Etude, A flat major.....Chopin.

Mr. L. deserves especial thanks for the wholesome and yet exquisite beginnings of his concerts,—each time with a couple of the quaint little movements from the Suites and Partitas of Sebastian Bach. He plays them honestly and lets them show their poetry. Nothing sounds so new and fresh just now, for pampered appetite is glad to get back to sweet, unpretending truth. The interpreter was equally at home and happy in the Beethoven Sonata, one of the most perfect of the fresher period, with its eager, adventurous Allegro, consistently and vigorously developed, its grand, deeply meditative (largo in the sense of large) slow movement, its genial, sunshiny Minuet crossed by mysterious shadow in the Trio, and the gliding grace and beauty of its finale; in the brilliant Capriccio and naive Song without Words (last of the posthumous set) by Mendelssohn; the fiery, impassioned Scherzo and charming Etude of Chopin; in the Schumann pieces, and that Slumber Song, which was a feeling reminder of the absent:—only his grouping of these things was better than we have made here in this awkward sentence. Equally happy, too, in accompanying the songs which Mrs. BARRY sang so well. Indeed she was in uncommonly good voice, and though Bach's "Frohlocke mein Herz" had to be set down from its bright key for her, it was given with great spirit. Her tones were large and thrilling in that wild first part of the Franz song "On the sea:" the dream of lying buried under snow on a dreary heath; and sweet and full of comfort in the second part, where the dream is chased away by the stars shining down with "their sweet eyes." Beautifully suited to her was the second song of the group, the quaint, tender "When I wander in the wood at night;" but less so the arch and airy "Wo geht's Liebchen?" of Goethe, though she sang it well.

Here is the fourth and last programme:

Air and Gavotte.....Bach.
Lieder Cyclus, ("An die ferne Geliebte").....Beethoven.
Sonata, A minor, op. 47.....Beethoven.
Andante Spianato and Polonaise.....Chopin.
Dichterliebe.....Schumann.
Frühlingsnacht.....
Rondeau brillant, op. 70.....Schubert.
Andante and Finale, from Concerto in G. (By request). Beethoven.

The vocal pieces, on account of Mr. KREISSMANN'S illness, were omitted; it would have been interesting to hear Schumann's Liederkreis ("Dichterliebe") after that of Beethoven, who set the high example. The Sonata was of course the "Kreutzer," with violin, and it was admirably played by Mr. LISTMANN and Mr. Leonhard. The Schubert Rondo is also for the two instruments, and was a splendid contribution. By way of compensation for the omitted pieces, Mr. L. treated us again to that impressive Noveltte by Schumann. We need not tell how finely he played the two movements of the Beethoven Concerto, with which he has so well identified himself in the Symphony Concerts, nor how suggestively Mr. LANG sketched in the orchestral parts upon a second piano. One may realize a great picture even in an engraving.

MR. M. W. WHITNEY, the bass singer well known in our Oratorios, who returned a few weeks since from Europe, has certainly made the most of his short period of study in Milan and London. In the Complimentary Concert given to him in the Music Hall on Wednesday evening, April 21, a large audience listened with rare satisfaction to his greatly improved voice, as well as large and even delivery. His tones, always grand and manly, have grown more round and musical throughout their compass, especially in the upper range, and he does all with more artistic certainty and ease. We would fain have heard him in music of a more important character; but his selections: "Il Monaco," by Meyerbeer, and a spirited song by the London Randegger, served well to show his vocal qualities and execution. The common trick of basses, of making a point of a very low bass note, because exceptional, may be pardoned to the occasion.

The assistant artists rallied round him with a good will apparently, and did their best. There was an average excellence throughout the performances. Miss PHILLIPS sang "L'Addio" by Mozart, and the light and florid "Son leggiero" of Donizetti, each in its way admirably. Miss GATES's rich soprano revelled freely and brilliantly enough in the clap-trap "ecstasies" of the Arditi Waltz. Miss GRANGER sang "O luce di quest'anima" honestly and well, with bird-like purity and fluency. The brothers WINCH contributed a duet: "I Pescatori;" Miss ALICE DUTTON, Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody," which she played even better than before, and on the "New Orchestral Grand" of Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co., which is certainly an instrument of great power and richness;

Mr. LISTEMANN, a couple of fantastic violin solos: one from a Paganini Concerto, the other a Scherzo (Rondo des lutins) by Bazzini. But the most remarkable thing in its perfection, and the most enjoyable, was the male part-singing of the "Chickering Club," who came out from their privacy in compliment to Mr. Whitney, who is a fellow member. Nothing so good of its kind has been heard in our concert rooms before. We must not forget Mr. WHITING's opening of the concert with a firm, clear rendering of Bach's Toccata in F, besides his own effective Concert Piece for the Organ.

MADAME NINA PIZZOTTI's Benefit Concert showed this young and earnest pianist to much better advantage than one or two public efforts which she made while out of health last year. This time she played Thalberg's L'Elisir fantasia and the Rondo Capriccioso of Mendelssohn in very good, effective style—besides something else for an encore. She is pleasing in appearance, unaffected, evidently well taught and zealous in the direction of good music. She also showed no little cleverness in the not too common art of accompanying the voice. The singers, new to us, were Mrs. WITTINGTON and Mr. CHARLES HOWARD, who opened and closed the concert with a Duet: "La ci daren," and Donizetti's "L'Addio." The lady, with a bright little voice trained to considerable execution, sang rather out of tune in her first solo, "Angels' Serenade," but was more successful in two characteristic pieces: "Le Secret" (Geheimes), by Schubert, and a sort of Mazourka melody by Chopin. Mr. HOWARD, who has a baritone rich and sweet in some tones, dry and hard in others, sang "Stigelli's" "Tear" and an air by Balfe: "Let all obey" in an intelligent and manly way. The Mouth Harmonica performances of Professor WAL-LACH are curious, to say the least, and full of pretty effects, which he manages with great skill. The March from Spontini's "Fernando Cortez" he had arranged for the little instrument so as to give the impression of a full band, approaching and receding, and, by alternating with a second little set of reeds, he gave a new tone coloring to the Trio portion of the March. In mountain echoes, Jodels, &c., like his "Styrienne," the instrument seems most in its element.—A goodly audience staid to the end of the concert well pleased.

Mr. EUGENE THAYER is giving some excellent programmes of Organ Music in his "Organ Recitals" at Hollis Street Church, on alternate Saturdays at 4½ P.M. We have not yet been able to hear them, but they are worthy to be recorded. Here is the first (of April 10):

Toccata in F.....	Bach.
Aria: "With verdure clad".....	Haydn.
Choral Variations.....	Bach.
a. Ich ruf' zu Dir.....
b. Gottes Sohn ist kommen.....
Adagio and Allegro from 2d Sonata.....	Mendelssohn.
Spring Song.....	Robert Franz.
Variations in A flat.....	Thiele.

The vocal pieces were sung by Miss ETTA L. WOODMAN, a pupil of the Boston Conservatory. The second programme we have mislaid. The third (for this afternoon) is as follows (Miss GATES, of St. Paul's Church, and Mr. E. C. FISHER, pupil of the Boston Conservatory, assisting):

Fantasia and Fugue in G minor.....	Bach.
Vorspiel: An Wasserflüssen Babylons.....	Bach.
Aria: Jerusalem, thou that killest.....	Mendelssohn.
Fugue in G minor, No. 2.....	Bach.
Vorspiel: Liebet Jesu.....	Bach.
Abschied.....	Schumann.
Variations in A, Op. 47.....	Hesse.

The two Conservatories have closed their terms with interesting pupil concerts in the Music Hall. In that of the NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY, April 17, not the least noteworthy feature was the violin-playing, under the direction of the older Suck, showing careful and efficient teaching, as well as promising capacity in the pupils. A sturdy lad played with much aplomb and true intonation a simple Sonata of Haydn, a delicate and modest looking young girl of color winning equal credit in the piano part. A Trio by Dancal was well played by three violins on each part, one of the violins by a colored girl again, the others by young men. These are good fruits for a school of music.

There were also some fair specimens of piano playing, particularly the Marcia Funebre of Chopin and the Scherzo from the Reformation Symphony, Mr. PETERSILBA presiding; singing, both of solo and chorus; organ music, &c.,—leaving on the whole a good impression.

The BOSTON CONSERVATORY had its concert on the 23d ult. We were able to hear only the last four pieces, but that little good, of a programme creditable in itself:

Organ. Prelude in G major.....	Bach.
Chorus for Female voices.....	Abt.
Trio in C minor, Violin, Piano and 'Cello.....	Beethoven.
Organ. Pastorale in G major.....	Mendelssohn.
Aria: "Voi che sapete".....	Mozart.
Overture: "Egmont," 4 hands.....	Beethoven.
Romance, from "Don Sebastian".....	Donizetti.
Sonata in F minor.....	Beethoven.
Tenor Song: "Good night, beloved".....	Balfe.
Organ. Variations, Op. 47.....	Hesse.
Song: "The Skylark".....	Hatton.
Easter Hymn for Female Chorus.....	Abt.
Organ. Chromatic Fantasia.....	Thiele.

Two Concerts, so far as yet announced, are all we have in prospect—until the Deluge!

1. MADAME PAREPA-ROSA, in whose recovery from her severe illness all musical souls rejoice, and who will be chiefly occupied with English Opera next season, is announced for her "last grand concert," in the Boston Music Hall, next Monday evening, May 10. CARL ROSA of course will let us hear his violin. The other assistants are Mme. DE PONTE, from La Scala; Mr. J. NORDBLOM, a young Swedish tenor, of whom report speaks well; FERRANTI, the genial buffo; Mr. ALFRED PEASE, pianist; and Mr. G. W. COLBY, accompanist.

2. The "NORMAL DIAPASON" Concert—to call it so for short—of which we made mention in our last, is of necessity postponed to Thursday the 20th, at 3½ P.M. Its object, it will be remembered is, to raise the means for furnishing our Symphony and Oratorio Orchestras with suitable wind instruments, tuned to the lower or French pitch, which is already that of the Great Organ, making it impossible for orchestras at the prevailing pitch, so distressfully high for singing voices, to play in perfect tune with it. Such instruments (flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons especially) will have to be made expressly for the purpose, and at a cost too great to be required of the musicians who will be expected to conform to the new pitch.

The arrangements are in the hands of a Joint Committee representing the Handel and Haydn Society, the Harvard Musical Association, and the Boston Music Hall Association. The first part will be essentially a Symphony Concert, beginning with Beethoven's fresh and happy Symphony, No. 8, one of the shortest of the tribe; followed by an Aria (probably of Mozart) by Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS; then (if found practicable) a concerted piece employing the very instruments in question, which have got to be reformed,—perhaps a movement from a Serenade by Mozart; and then Cherubini's noble Overture to "The Water-Carrier." The Orchestra will be that of the Symphony Concerts in full force, Mr. ZERRAHN conducting. The Handel and Haydn Society with their grand chorus, furnish the second part: Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," Cantata, with the introductory Symphony; the solos by Miss HOUSTON, Miss PHILLIPS and Mr. W. J. WINCH, who, as well as the conductor, volunteer their services.—Every friend of singers, at all sensitive to the wrong done to that delicate organ, the voice, by the continual straining up of concert pitch, should rally to the protection of the sufferer and attend this concert.

ROME.—Miss Brewster, in her letters to the Philadelphia Bulletin, writes:

It is said that the Pope is about to give cause for domestic scandal to the stiff occupants of the pontifical antechambers. There is an old custom that no preceding Pope has ever infringed upon, that imposes upon him never to be present at a public amusement. The oratorio of the Creation, by Haydn, has been sung at the Campidoglio during Lent with much success. The Pope expressed a desire to hear it, and the surrounding prelates said, "It can be executed here at the Vatican for your Holiness."

"Not at all," replied his Holiness gayly; "we will go ourselves to the Capitol to hear it."

And in spite of all the consecrated rubrics of court etiquette, the Musical Academy will repeat the oratorio, expressly for his Holiness, in the grand hall of the Capitol, and in his presence, next Tuesday evening.

Thomaschek's Eclogues.

An old friend translates and sends us the following from Tomaschek's Autobiography:

1807. "An incomprehensible indifference to the Pianoforte Sonata and the Symphony for orchestra had for a long time been noticeable. Endless variations were made to indemnify the pianist for the Sonata, and overtures the orchestra for Symphonies. This incipient shallow taste of the time forced me to seek a refuge in poetic forms, to see whether some of them might not be transplanted in the field of tones, and thus the still too narrow circle of musical poetry be enlarged. My first essay was 6 Eclogues for the pianoforte, which were published as op. 35, by Kühnel in Leipzig. These tone poems, which very soon became popular, are in fact a sort of pastoral; they are, however, too different from the old pastorals in the melody, harmony and rhythm, to allow me to omit here a remark or two upon their meaning and especially upon their execution.

"I imagined a pastoral people, whose mode of life was indeed simple, but who were subjected to the ordinary vicissitudes of life just like all other men. Their emotions as awakened by the various events of life—these to express in tones was then the difficult task which I proposed to myself, and which, judging from the general sympathy in my work, I happily accomplished. That the composition of Eclogues is by no means easy, is proved by the many unsuccessful attempts made by others. These Eclogues demand a simple, but very tender and sympathetic style of playing, in order to transport the listener into that idyllic life; therefore, the easily discovered piquant passages, scattered here and there, must not be neglected; above all the tempos and directions to the performer, which are everywhere given with great exactness, must be observed with extreme care. Hence, it may be that through a careless execution that which is peculiar to this style of music is often utterly lost. I, at least, have never been so happy as to hear the Eclogues played by any one, except my own pupils, with due expression."

Tomaschek's further compositions in this form were:

- 1810. Book II. (op. 39) of the Eclogues.
Six Rhapsodies for the P.F., op. 40, in which the form of the Eclogues is retained.
- Six Rhapsodies, op. 41.
- 1813. Six Eclogues (op. 47) Book III.
- 1815. Six Eclogues (op. 51) " IV.
- 1818. Six Eclogues (op. 63).
- 1819. Six Eclogues (op. 65).

ROSSINI'S MASS (Messe Solennelle, or, as he called it, "petite Messe") will be published here in book form, octavo, by Messrs. Ditson & Co., about the first of June. They have already issued many of the more interesting numbers singly, as sheet music. So the many music lovers who can now study such a work from notes will be able to judge it for themselves, more satisfactorily than by reading criticisms. Meanwhile it has been thrice performed this past week in New York, twice at the Academy, once at Steinway Hall, under the auspices of Max Strakosch, with Max Maretzek for Conductor, and solo artists, chorus, &c., from the Italian Opera. Of course there were large and fashionable audiences. Here is the Tribune's article after the first performance, April 30.

The opinions expressed among the audience last night were of a singularly various character. From the select few nothing was heard but admiration; but the multitude, who had expected a sort of glorified "Stabat Mater," even more melodious and more dramatic than that most beautiful but most uneclesiastical work, came away bewildered, and apparently uncertain whether to be rapturous or disappointed. It is a Mass, not a Cantata, and it is decidedly a solemn Mass, breathing devotion and reverence and elevation of the soul, and irradiated by gleams of that peculiar glory which belongs to the highest kind of religious music, and to it alone. At the same time, we confess that we cannot fully share the ecstasies of the French critics. There are many commonplace passages in the composition to remind us that Rossini was only a man, after all, not an angel; and the most elaborate of the solo melodies indicate the decline of that prolific genius which so long entranced the world.

The Kyrie opens with great solemnity and impressive effect, the male chorus leading with a movement in a minor key. A treble melody is soon taken up by the female voices, and joined in by the whole chorus, beginning sotto voce, and rising to a splendid fortissimo. The admirable suspensions in this movement will be generally admired. The Christe eleison is a genuine old-fashioned canon, and then the Kyrie is repeated, but in a major key. The effect of the whole number is that of calm and solemn beauty. The Gloria is ushered in by a bold choral outburst, of a more joyous character, and this is followed by a quartet and chorus, the bass solo leading with a good piece of declamation on the Laudamus. A more charming number than this, however, is the Gratias agimus, which comes immediately after—a trio for contralto, tenor, and bass, in which the bass again has the lead. The melody is delightful, and the religious sentiment very plainly marked. The one tenor solo of the Mass is the Domine Deus. It presents in the first few bars, and in one or two subsequent portions, as well as in its general structure, a startling likeness to the Cujus animam of the "Stabat Mater," but it is vastly inferior to that popular air, and too long-drawn-out for a piece of such thin texture. Too long and too thin we may also say is the one bass solo, the Quoniam tu solus. Between these two meagre numbers occurs, however, one of the gems of the Gloria, the Qui tollis, a duet for soprano and contralto, with harp accompaniment. It lacks the sensuous melody of the famous duet in the Stabat, with which everybody is naturally impelled to compare it; but it is pathetic and delicate. The conclusion of the Gloria is the grand fugue which has created such a profound impression wherever the Mass has been performed. It richly merits the praises that have been lavished upon it. Here we find the grandeur of the old scholastic musicians, the mighty roll of harmonies, the stately onward movement of chorus following chorus, and breaking through it all the sunshine of true Rossinian melody. The fugue is majestic but not sombre, grand yet cheerful, one in design and compact in treatment, but varied in the most surprising and agreeable manner. An audience not much addicted, we should fancy, to fugues, heard it with almost universal delight.

The Credo is still more religious in its tone than the Gloria, and more homogeneous in treatment. It is nearly all chorus. The first few measures are especially beautiful. The chorus and quartet together carry on the story as far as the Crucifixus, the Incar-natus not being, as it usually is, a separate number. The Crucifixus is a delicious soprano solo, well suited to the solemnity of the words, and would probably have left a deeper impression last night had not some inconceivable donkey in the midst of it sent the singer a basket of flowers. We are delighted to say that he was well hissed for his pains, and the basket was ignominiously left at the feet of the chorus. The conclusion of the Credo is mainly a repetition of the first part as far as the Et vitam, where another fugue is introduced, not so grand as that of the Gloria, but well written and effective.

The Offertory is an organ solo, which we prefer not to criticize until we have heard it. The liberal directors of the Academy of Music not having supplied that establishment with an organ, much as such a thing is needed in every large opera-house, the organist was reduced last night to an instrument of the melodeon species, and the performance was consequently very ridiculous. It had better be omitted to-night.

The Sanctus is a chorus and quartet, without accompaniment, and secured last night one of the only two encores. This movement is destined to become one of the most popular portions of the Mass. The Salutaris, a contralto solo, we believe was not originally written as a part of this work, nor is its introduction an improvement. It is the only theatrical effect in the whole performance, and beautiful as it is by itself, we do not think it leaves an agreeable impression, though it was last night encored. The Agnus Dei, a contralto solo with chorus is a fitting conclusion to the work. It is pathetic and impassioned beyond description, ending with a grand choral outburst, in which divine hope seems to reach its triumph and heaven to open its gates to prayer.

In the manner of the performance there was a great deal to praise. The due effect of the Mass depends in great degree upon the chorus. This was well drilled and only once went much astray, which was in the fugue of the Credo. It numbered however only fifty voices. About two hundred are really needed, not only to give proper expression to the music, but to balance the orchestra, which comprised at least 50 pieces. This was none too many for the size of the house and the work they had to do, but the disproportion between instruments and voices was ridiculous. The principal solo part is the contralto. This was taken by Mme. Testa. If we say that she was hardly equal to it, we say only what everybody knows, for the part is one which the best artists in the world might be proud to fill. Last night, however, she agreeably surprised even those who knew her best, and in the concluding part of the Agnus Dei especially she was admirable. She sings conscientiously, intelligently, and with reverence for the music, and for this she deserves thanks. Miss Kellogg, on the contrary, seemed to be oppressed with the comparative insignificance of her position, and treated the music and the audience with impolite indifference. There is, to be sure, a depth in this composition which she cannot sound; she is safest in shallow waters; but she ought always to do her best, and she certainly failed to do that last night. Her voice was weak and languishing.

Rossini's Mass Travelling with Mr. Ullman.

The Weekly Review (New York) translates the following letter from the Leipzig Signale:

"I am just going to Milan. I have bought Rossini's 'Mass,' after I have heard it, for fifty thousand francs. I say fifty thousand francs. Believe me, it is the most brilliant and complete work which Rossini has written, much more beautiful and grand than his 'Stabat Mater.' I do not write this as a puff.

"I engaged four star singers, and give the Mass in the large cities of Italy with one hundred musicians and two hundred chorus; in the cities of medium size with sixty in the orchestra and sixty in the chorus; in the small cities with thirty men in the orchestra and sixty in the chorus. These sixty choristers are always travelling with me as a nucleus. I have four chanteurs-supplémentaires on hand in case one or the other star falls sick. I shall give twenty-six performances per month: six in the large, four in the medium-sized, and from one to two in the small cities. I have about seventy thousand francs expenses per month. But the business is grander and safer than that of the Patti concerts, for if Patti got sick I got a good thrashing. In France I lost in one week eighteen thousand francs through her illness. With the Mass and the four supplementary singers I cannot get stuck.

"I calculate my profit in Italy to be one hundred and eighty thousand francs, and I seldom make a mistake in my calculations. There are fifty-two cities with large theatres. I hope to give about one hundred and twenty performances with an average receipt of six thousand francs for each.

"Now I beg for the following favors:—

"First: You and others have announced that I go to Italy commissioned by Mr. Strakosch. I never go, and have never gone, anywhere on commission by anybody. I have bought the mass for fifty thousand francs, twenty-five thousand of which I have paid cash, and the other twenty-five thousand francs will be due January 1, 1870. But I am negotiating with Strakosch to associate with him for his business in Germany and Holland.

"Germany will consequently have the pleasure of seeing me next winter.

"Second: Since the first of January, and before I had concluded the Mass-business, I have parted with Carlotta. First: because the Patti business got to be ridiculous, and second, because it was not she who drew, but my colossal ensemble. Why, therefore, pay her sums for which I can have far new and better and more legitimate singers?

"Carlotta goes on her own hook to Germany, Austria and Moldau. She says she draws, and she does not need celebrities. She takes the pianist Ritter, the violinist Sarnato, and the baritone, Marochetti, and preserves my title, 'Patti Concerts'—which I could give, but she, as the singer, could not give—keeps my prizes and intends to be economical. I wish, therefore, to be clearly understood, that I have neither directly nor indirectly anything to do with these concerts. With best thanks,

"Your quite obedient,

"B. ULLMAN."

Paris, Feb. 20, 1869.

P. S.—I forgot to tell you that I sent yesterday the Mass to the Pope for its performance in Rome on the 11th of next April. The least I expect is to be canonized.

Wagner Versus Judaism in Music.

Berlin, April 25.

DEAR JOURNAL.—Perhaps you have seen and read "Das Judenthum in der Musik" (Judaism in music), lately published by Richard Wagner. At any rate the book has attracted much attention, not only for the boldness of its ultra views, but for the harshness and severity, nay, absolute meanness with which Wagner treats the Jews; and this not only in music, as the title of the book declares, but generally, in relation to society and the world.

How such a man as Richard Wagner, who has certainly won laurels many and great, could condescend to such a step of retaliation upon those who in his opinion have done so much to increase the tide of abuse heaped upon him and his music, is best explained in the hate and enmity which are only too apparently the under-current of the whole book. As the writer himself tells us, "Das Judenthum" was first published in 1850, by Franz Brendel, editor of the musical Zeitschrift in Leipzig, who assumed all responsibility for the same. Meanwhile it was rumored that Wagner was the writer. "I had no thought of denying it, in case I was challenged as the author of the article;" "but," as he says in another place, "I had published books on art, and written operas, which last I wished of all things to have performed." Having thus so much at stake, and not caring to be drawn into any personal conflict about a "question treated in so earnest and objective a manner," Wagner communicated his purpose to his honest friend Brendel, who "was courageous enough to let the storm vent its fury upon himself, instead of directing it against me," says Wagner, with delicious coolness. This was in 1850, and although circumstances pointed to him as the author, it was not till nineteen years had passed, and his friend Brendel had gone to his last rest, that Wagner declared himself the writer. In spite of the attempts at palliation, in spite of the oft repeated assertion that Jews as well as Gentiles have heaped him with abuse, no candid minded reader can sympathize with Richard Wagner's ignoble and small-minded statements, whatever may have been or may be his prejudice against the Jewish nation.

Before touching upon the position of the Jews in music and art in general, the writer first describes their influence in the domains of religion and politics. In regard to their religion the Jews have ceased to be enemies worthy of hate, thanks to those within the pale of the Christian religion, who have drawn the hate of the people upon themselves. It is rather in his relation to Society that the Jew stands alone by himself as Jew. From being the creditor of kings he has imperceptibly become the "King of Creditors," and his prayer for emancipation is, to say the least, naive, seeing how we are ourselves compelled to fight for our own emancipation from the Jew, who now rules and will continue to rule so long as money is power. Not only in the driving business of every-day life does the Jew hold the helm, but he has managed to get the public taste in art, particularly in music, between his busy fingers. This is the substance of Wagner's introduction. Finally, to free ourselves from this pressure of Judaism, we must prove our strength, not through any abstract definition, "but by learning to know exactly the nature of the involuntary feeling of aversion in us, which constantly manifests itself against that Jewish being." We must be able to recognize distinctly, "what it is in that nature that we hate, to expose it in its true light, and drive the demon from the field which he knows so well how to keep, under cover of a haze which we, generous philanthropists, throw over him, that the sight of him may be less repulsive."

Wagner begins his assault as follows: "The Jew, who it is well known, has a God entirely for himself, next attracts our attention by his outer appearance, which, whatever may be our nationality, always has something disagreeable and foreign to this nationality. This is the Jew's misfortune, the writer tells us, but he feels perfectly at home in it. Particularly noticeable is the Jew's pronunciation. Modern culture has not succeeded in breaking up this stubborn peculiarity of the Shemitic mode of pronunciation. This "hissing, shrill, buzzing, grunting sound of a Jew speaking, is to our ear entirely foreign and disagreeable. An arbitrary misuse and distortion of words and construction only remain to give this sound the character of an unbearable and confusing clatter." "This circumstance of itself, it must be borne in mind, is highly important in explaining the impression which a Jewish composition makes upon us," adds Wagner. That he should make the exterior of the Jew a standard of mental ability is unjust; and this attempt to prejudice the reader at the outset by so contemptible a piece of logic, is only a forerunner of the whole pamphlet and its argument. This disagreeable exterior is inconceivable in connection with representative art. If a Jew is to be represented, the model is always drawn from phantasy, the ugly features either toned down or left out entirely. Wagner says this of a Jew. The remark however is just as applicable to any other character. We never look for bare reality in representative art, but rather, reality idealized. As Wagner's object is the moral murder of the Jew, he makes his application an entirely one-sided and ungenerous one.

"Upon the stage we cannot possibly conceive of a representation by a Jew, of either modern or antique character, hero or lover, without involuntarily feeling how ridiculously unfit such a representation is." Not only has the Jew of our time succeeded in getting possession of the stage, but he has robbed the very poets of their creations and substituted those of his own conception. This gives us about the same impression we should have, "if in a painting of the crucifixion the Holy one were cut out, and a demagogue of a Jew stuck in (hineingesteckt)!" Wagner's contempt finds certainly some expression here, to say nothing more. But he seems to have forgotten that the very best players of Shakespeare, in Germany, were without exception Jews; namely: Dessoir, Dawison, Lehfeld. No, not even here does Wagner do the Jew justice. He is not satisfied with annihilating the Jew in music, which, we must not forget, is the main object of the book; he purposely avoids touching even one good point of the poor object of his malice, however true or evident it may be. He tells us, of whatever nation a Jew may be, he always speaks the language of that nation as if it were an acquired one, and not like a language he has spoken from infancy. The greatest genius cannot poetize in a foreign language, hence the Jews have no poet. Wagner thus disposes of Heine: "In Goethe's and Schiller's time we know of no Jewish poet. At the time when poetry had become a lie and our whole unpoetic life element could produce nothing like a true poet, then was it the office of a very gifted poetical Jew to expose these lies, this jesuitical hypocrisy," &c. "Also his renowned musical brother Jews he lashes unmercifully for their artistic pretensions. Hurried on by the implacable demon of gainsaying what seemed worth gainsaying, he was swept through all the delusions of modern self-deception up to the point where he in turn lied himself into a poet, and as a reward had his poetic lies set to music by our composers."

Having shown to his own apparent satisfaction how impossible it is for the Jew to speak correctly, Wagner makes an application of the same to song. "Here the pronunciation must be not only correct but cultivated. Song is the expression of feeling, of passion; and who could imagine a Jew singing with feeling or passion? Absurdity of absurdities! For a Jew to intensify his mode of speaking into song, in which he knows how to express himself only with a ridiculous pathos, but never moves us with any sympathetic emotion, is to make himself just unbearable." We should run from the spot, were it not that we might be chained there by the very absurdity of the thing, adds Wagner.

Having now shown how incapable the Jew is of proving himself an artist, either in his speech, or least of all his song, the writer says: "Notwithstanding this, the Jew has been able to make himself ruler of the public taste in the most widely diffused of all the modern arts, namely, music." It must be confessed, Wagner gives the Christian credit for no capacity whatever. Surely he must know it is but a short time the Jew has been his own master. Whom have the Jews to thank for their pitiful history, their centuries of suffering, the calamities of the middle ages? Whom but the Christians? At whose door lie the horrors of the Spanish Jews? At the door of those who called themselves Christians. England and Germany are not far behind. Indeed scarcely a century has gone by since Jews were burned at the stake here in Berlin, in the Neuer Markt. Even the great Frederic imposed heavy fines upon every Jew coming to Berlin, with the permission to rise in rank as high as old clothes vender. When we look back at the history of the Jews, and see how for thousands of years they have been trodden underfoot, made the slaves of the Christians, denied all rights of citizenship, treated worse than dogs, and then hear from Wagner that the Jew not only rules in art but rules all modern civilization,—and this has been effected within the last century—it cannot be denied he contradicts himself, and unwittingly gives the Jew credit for greater capacity than the Christian himself. If the Jew has made himself ruler of modern civilization in the last one hundred years, what will happen in the next century. A question of political economy which can well be a bitter pill for Wagner's rumination! The Jew can have neither style nor feeling. "The inner emotion, the real passion finds its peculiar language in the moment when, struggling for meaning, it gives itself expression. The Jew, whose character in this respect we have already noticed, has no real passion, least of all a passion which leads him to an expression in art. Hence, what so corresponds to the Jew's eminence in making art must of necessity have the property of coldness, indifference, even to very triviality and absurdity." "The real poet, in whatever branch of art, always wins his inspiration from a truthful and loving view of unrestrained life, that life which we can find only among the common people! Where can the Jew find this people? The Jew has never had an art, and hence never a life that could supply talent for fine art."

Wagner not only denies the modern Jew poetic feeling, but tells us he never had any. Let him read again the book of Job and the Psalms. Where in the whole range of literature can be found poetry more highly ideal and elevating? Does the Sermon on the Mount, in the 5th chapter of Matthew, fail in poetry of the soul? Does not the whole poetry of the Christian religion emanate from a Jew? Is not the Bible the greatest poetical work of history? Was it not written by Jews? And yet Wagner tells us the Jew's history contains no poetry. It is too much to presume that Richard Wagner, who calls himself a Christian in contradistinction to a Jew, doesn't even know the history of his own religion, which naturally includes that of the Jew. He purposely lets prejudice blind him. After centuries have gone by in striving to smother what noble germs there were in the Jews, the writer says, "There are no noble germs in them."

Having demolished all their pretensions to emotion, poetic feeling, and art in general, Wagner now comes to his main point: "The Jew in musical composition." Here, he tells us, the Jew has done nothing and can do nothing but imitate. Even this imitation is at the most superficial. His whole life is superficial and without depth; hence "his compositions are heterogeneous, cold, indifferent, unnatural, distorted, so that they often give us the same impression as the recitation of a poem of Goethe in the Jewish jargon. Just as in this jargon the words and constructions go tumbling over each other in amazing confusion, just so does the Jewish composer tumble together all the different forms and styles of all masters and periods. We find the peculiarities of form of all the schools heaped up in the liveliest chaos. As the object in these productions is merely that something shall be said, but not about the subjects, which would repay the trouble of talking, so this clatter can be made to excite the ear only by a change every moment in the mode of expression, which is to charm anew the attention."

To make this clearer to the reader Wagner makes use of an example which is to combine all he has said. How can we make this clearer, the writer says, than by taking the works of "a musician of Jewish descent, who was endowed by nature with a musical gift, as few musicians before him. Everything which presented itself for consideration in investigating our antipathy to the Jewish nature, all our aversion to this nature in itself and in its relation to us, all its incapability, standing upon another basis from ourselves, but wishing to have intercourse with us on this basis, wishing even to develop further the vain images of his fancy, all these rise to a complete tragical conflict in the nature, the life and works of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. This person has shown that a Jew can have the richest abundance of specific musical talent, can possess the finest and most liberal education, as well as the finest sense of honor, without being able to move us, no not even once, with that deep heart and soul stirring emotion which we expect of the art, and which we know it to be capable of; an emotion we have felt times without number, when a hero of our art—so to speak—has opened his mouth to talk to us."

If Wagner had chosen Meyerbeer instead of Mendelssohn, on whom to vent his enmity, he might have said with some truth: "he has not been able to move us, no, not even once," with a heart-stirring emotion; but the writer of "Midsummernight's Dream," "Elijah," "St. Paul," can certainly claim a niche in the temple of public taste. Just as Mendelssohn was overrated during his lifetime, he is now underrated after his death. This is the case in Germany at least. I do not wish to write a panegyric on Mendelssohn, to call him a genius, nor anything higher than a composer of wonderful talent, but I do wish to defend him against this overwhelming assault by Wagner. After having wrought himself and the reader up to an excited pitch by enumerating all the bad points of the Jews as a race, raking into broad daylight all their disagreeable and repulsive qualities, he suddenly pounces upon Mendelssohn, whose great reputation he so envies, and tells us: here is the consummation of all this "coldness, indifference, triviality, absurdity." If Wagner would only treat the subject calmly and with candor, as we should expect from one composer towards another, he might show to better satisfaction, and with a nearer approach to truth, what the influence of the Jew in music is. But to work himself into a frenzy over the meanness of the Jew from thousands of years back up to the present time, and then let loose the vials of his hate upon the head of Mendelssohn, is evidence of a deeper purpose than merely exposing the position of the Jew in general in music. He could not have chosen worse than in charging Mendelssohn with want of style. Of all composers he at least is easily recognized. Of all composers he is oftenest quoted by critics as the model for young beginners. The "Songs without Words" not only refute this bold assumption of Wagner's, but make an era in music and belong to its history. All that is Jewish is despicable. Mendelssohn's music is Jewish and therefore despicable, is the logic of the writer. Why a long argument for the sake of such a reductio ad absurdum? Why not say in so many words: "I detest the Jew and all he has done, and therefore detest his music, and will not find any good in it?" This is the spirit of the entire pamphlet. How can we expect to get at the truth of the matter by such a process?

The few remaining pages are devoted to telling the reader how Mendelssohn stole his oratorio style from Bach. That here, where the feeling had to come from a deeper source than mere sentimentality, Mendelssohn's "musical productive power ceased." "The dissolution and capriciousness of our musical style, though perhaps not introduced by him, have yet been raised through Mendelssohn's means to the highest point of unmeaning and empty purport." The best answer to this sweeping statement is this composer's immense popularity. We do not claim him as an equal of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Handel; nor do we believe him to be a musical cipher because not their equal, and a Jew.

What Wagner says of Meyerbeer is too good to be lost. Having first relieved his mind by calling the reader's attention to the fact of his being "The Jewish composer of our day, renowned far and wide," he says, Meyerbeer's life has been wasted in catering to a paying but second-class public. "The opera-going public of to-day has since a long period back been gradually brought to give up entirely the demands to be made not only on a dramatic work of art, but in general on any work of good taste. These places of intercourse are filled mostly with that portion of our society whose sole reason for going is ennui. The disease of ennui, however, cannot be cured by any artistic enjoyment, for it cannot be designedly dissipated, but only deceived by another kind of ennui. It is the preparing of such a deception as this, that the noted opera composer has made his life mission in art. It is needless to point out more definitely the means he made use of to reach this desired object of his life. Enough that he understood completely how to deceive, as we see from the result he accomplished by imposing upon his wearied audience (seiner gelangweilten Zuhörerschaft) the jargon we have already characterized, as modern piquante expression of all that is trivial, and which had already been heard in all its natural absurdity." "This deceitful composer goes so far as to deceive himself, and this perhaps just as designedly as he deceives his wearied audience. We really believe that he would like to create a work of art, and yet is conscious at the same time that he cannot. To draw himself out of this painful conflict between the desire to do and the ability to do, he writes operas for Paris, and then finds an easy road to their performance elsewhere,—to-day the surest means of obtaining an artist reputation without being an artist." Thus, says Wagner, has Mendelssohn shown how meaningless music can be made; Meyerbeer, on the other hand, how empty and trivial the public taste. "So long as music, a distinct art, was a necessity of life, up to the time of Beethoven and Mozart, so long was a Jewish composer unknown."

Out of a pamphlet of fifty pages the reader naturally expects to find at least one good trait, one redeeming feature; at least one characteristic of the Jew and his relation to art, which Wagner need not place in so despicable a light. But no, he gathers together his remaining forces for a final effort, and gives us a closing dose, the very quintessence of his contempt for the poor Jew. Hear what he says: "Only when the inner death of the body is apparent, do the outer elements win the necessary strength to overpower it, but only to decompose it; then does the flesh of this body dissolve into a multiplicity of crawling worms. But who in glancing at it would regard the body as alive? The spirit is. The life has flown from this body to other relations, and this latter only is the life itself. Only in real life can we also find the spirit of the art again, and not in its worm-eaten corpse."

Thus closes a precious contribution to musical literature, a disgrace to the writer, and unworthy of one who follows the high calling of composer. Is it not shameful enough already that the very faults of which the Jews are accused are the direct offspring of Christian oppression? That, if they have had no art, it was because the Christian prevented it? The past history of the Jews Wagner, studiously, or out of ignorance, leaves untouched. If the latter, which is hardly possible, his argument is imperfect and so unjust. If the former, his argument is just as imperfect, infinitely more unjust, and shows a contemptible, weak-minded prejudice. It is a fact that the Jew has had an immense influence in music, but does it help the matter any to put it in a distorted light? If, as Wagner has it, this Judaism holds sway, the only road out of the difficulty is to overcome it in fair fight, not by an argument set on by hate and prejudice. If there are few or no "blond musicians" in Leipsic, as Wagner tells us, whose fault pray is it, the blond musician's or his oriental rival's? I do not believe, with Wagner, that public taste has fallen. Where was the audience forty years ago which appreciated Bach? It is not longer than thirty years that Beethoven has been so popular. The public taste, on the contrary, is improving every hour. Can it be that the public taste has fallen because it does not snap at every new operatic sweetmeat of Wagner? He even blames Robert Franz because he praised him once and then not again. The Jewish element is immense, but the Christian element far greater. Nevertheless we cannot expect to find the equilibrium by this constant sawing of individual prejudices; the two must come together and will come together, and each will find its level in the regular order of things. If the Jew is a discordant string, he must rise or fall to the pitch of the world's orchestra. Most of all, give every nation free scope for the exercise of its natural functions, and let not prejudice and oppression disturb the harmony of general progress!

Richard Wagner's "Judaism in Music."

Motto: "Der Jude wird verbrannt."—Lessing.

Richard Wagner, who, for some time past, has again been working at his own self-glorification, so indispensable to him, by the industrious production of pamphlets, has just published another pamphlet under the title of Das Judenthum in der Musik, Leipsic, J. J. Weber. The most abominable part of oration are the Jews, and all those are Jews who do not worship Herr Richard Wagner: this is about the leading thought of the pamphlet, which, though thin, is running over with venom. It is dedicated to Mme. Marie Muchanoff, nee Countess Nesselrode, and commences with the complaint "that every one of Wagner's artistic productions always meets, in the daily press, not only of Germany, but also of France and England, with a spirit of hostility exerted for his disparagement." The source of such wide-spreading enmity Wagner has discovered to be a general and regularly organized conspiracy of the Jews against him. We are told that, in consequence of an article ("Das Judenthum in der Musik"), which he published, in 1850, in the Leipziger Musikzeitung, all the enemies of swine's flesh have become his enemies also, and have ever since striven, in every possible manner, to be revenged upon him. According to his assertion, the article created an immense sensation, though, strange to say, not R. Wagner but "K. Freigedank" was the signature appended to it, and the editor, F. Brendel, never condescended to reveal the real author! It indeed requires all Wagner's self-complacency to believe that the entire world of art, and journalism, is still thinking of a pseudonymous article that appeared in the Leipziger Musikzeitung, nineteen years ago, and that every annoyance since suffered by him is nothing more nor less than the vengeance of the Jews on his feuilleton. I confess that it is only now, through Wagner's own pamphlet, that I knew anything of the article and of its illustrious parentage. The same is probably the case with the majority of my colleagues. But this is what Wagner will never believe; he is convinced, or at least, pretends that he is (for one really often hesitates considering him so limited in intelligence, as in his pamphlet, he represents himself to be), that all his opponents are merely the sworn instruments bent upon carrying out the behests of a Jewish association formed to be revenged upon him. Though, from these fabulous results, we ought to conclude that the article of "K. Freigedank" is as universally known as Meyerbeer's "Prophet March," which appeared soon afterwards, Wagner considers it advisable to reprint the said article, a resolution for which we feel sincerely grateful.

He commences by attacking the Jews generally. As his object is "the justification of his invincible repugnance to everything Jewish," he of course paints without any light. The outward appearance of the Jew is a "disagreeable whim of Nature," but, by the way, no misfortune for the Jew, because "he feels very comfortable under this misfortune." On the stage, it is impossible "to imagine any character, ancient or modern, represented by a Jew, without involuntarily feeling the absolutely laughable inappropriateness of such an impersonation." (I wonder whether Wagner's Christian mind would really revolt at achieving success through the talent of Bettelheim, Caillag, or Sontheim?)

The educated Jew is "the most heartless of men, and has relations only with those who need his money." (It is from such relations that Wagner appears to have derived all his knowledge of the educated Jew.) Finally the author enters upon the relations of the Jews to art. "What the educated Jew had to say, when he wished to indulge in artistic utterance, could of course be only that which was unimportant and trivial, since his whole impulse towards art was luxurious and unnecessary." According to Wagner, everything a Jew does, in the way of art, "must necessarily have inherent to it the quality of coldness, of indifference, even to triviality and ridiculousness." And what name does he mention immediately after this thesis? No less a one than that of Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, or as he, with feigned sensibility says: "Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, so soon taken from us." He asserts that Mendelssohn, despite his talent, could never succeed, not even in one solitary instance, in producing upon us the profound impression, moving both heart and soul, which we expect from art. I think that thousands of my readers will agree with me when I assure Herr Wagner that the simplest of Mendelssohn's songs (not to speak of his greatest creations) makes its way more surely to "the heart and soul" than ten operas à la Tristan und Isolde. The reader may easily imagine how loud and vehement Wagner's shouts are after Meyerbeer. Meyerbeer's art, Herr Wagner asserts, consisted only in "deceiving, a feat he accomplished by palming off upon his wearied audience the (Jewish) jargon, which we have already minutely characterized as the modern and piquant expression of all the trivialities which, in their naked stupidity, had been so often presented to them." For Wagner (who never "deceived" the public for quite forty years with operas like Les Huguenots) Meyerbeer is a "tragic-comic phenomenon, as, indeed, generally, that which leaves us cold, that which is laughable" constitutes "the distinguishing feature of Judaism." It would be only when music had fallen into a state of utter coma that Jews could enter into it. "It is not until the inward death of a body becomes manifest that the elements lying outside it gain the power of being their own masters, but merely to decompose the body; thus the flush of the latter is resolved into a seething manifold mass of worms." After Heine has been hissed off for his "poetic lies," and Börne applauded, because he worked at the "self-annihilation of Judaism," Wagner returns to the terrible results of his pseudonymous article of the year 1850. He tells us that, owing to the many years Felix Mendelssohn worked there, "Leipsic received the real musical Judaic baptism. Leipsic is exclusively the Jewish musical capital," etc. In this disgusting, low strain, that do honor to a fanatic mendicant friar, does the entire pamphlet continue. It is in the Jewish musical capital, therefore, that the conspiracy was then organized, "always to ignore Wagner as the author of the article," but, on the other hand, "by systematic calumny and persecution" to punish him in his literary and musical efforts. The first calumniator to come forward, in the Kölnische Zeitung, was, we are informed, Professor Bischoff, "a friend and admirer of Herr Ferdinand Hiller." (Strange to say, Hiller is not further ill-treated in the pamphlet, although he has published several admirable and crushing articles on Wagner's theories.) Then the Undersigned appeared with his "Libel" On the Musically-Beautiful. Against this denomination I must protest. My essay upon the Musically-Beautiful (the value of which Herr Wagner is, of course, at liberty to fix as he pleases) is a thoroughly serious theoretical investigation, a strictly scientific endeavor to test anew and to explain the fundamental notions of musical æsthetics. It has never been regarded as aught else, though the merits of Wagner, as well as those of other composers, are discussed therein. Had I desired to write a libel against Wagner I should have been able to find another and a more piquant title, in the style of his last pamphlet, as, for instance, Der Grössenwahn in der Musik. That, among the representatives of genuine musical beauty, I mentioned, after Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, the Jewish Mendelssohn, so excites Herr Wagner's bile that he is seduced into making the stupid assertion that merely to raise Mendelssohn in a "certain manner upon the throne, I placed a few specimens of Christian nobility, such as Robert Schumann, by his side." It is from the essay, On the Musically-Beautiful, that, we are told, the whole amount of subsequent misfortune resulted: "The author had attained universal respect, and made himself a position which gave him importance, when he, an æsthetician whom people wonderingly admired, now appeared as critic in the most widely read political paper, and declared my artistic efforts null and void." My "nimbus," he says, also, is the reason that, wherever newspapers are read in the world, one particular tone has become the rule in speaking of him, a tone which Mme. Muchanoff, nee Countess Nesselrode, has been so astonished to meet with everywhere. I must in return, inform Herr Wagner that he estimates far too highly the influence of my criticisms, and assigns me an amount of importance that I am very far from possessing. Mine is merely one voice amongst many voices, but, he it observed, voices which are independent and the exponents of sincere convictions. Why does not Herr Wagner name our most celebrated musical writer, Otto Jahn, whose criticisms on Tannhäuser and Lohengrin surpass, in crushing power, all I ever wrote about him? Why does he not name Speidel and Scheller of Vienna, who—though as little Jews as I am myself—have not treated him in a manner one iota more Christian-like than I have? Very recently, Herr Lübke, the art-historian, spoke with charming humor, in a similar strain of him, being naturally in Stuttgart immediately matriculated a Jew for so doing. Why does not Wagner remember that clever writer, Hinrichs, who, at first, advanced to meet him with warm sympathy, but the longer he wrote and the more carefully he studied Wagner's operas, became colder and colder, so that the "loyal Brendel" would not accept his last articles? But Wagner expressly complains of Adolphe Stahr, and Robert Franz, who, in the summer of 1850, once, "though exactly only once," espoused his cause! I, too, am reproached with the "almost enthusiastic partiality" which I at first felt for him, but which I now feel no longer. My worthy Herr Wagner, the same thing has happened to a great many others. I never denied the strong impression, nor have I ever been ashamed of it, which was produced upon me, when a young student in Dresden, by the dazzling performance of Tannhäuser. I sent a notice of it to the Wiener Musikzeitung, and, though rather lavish in its praise, that notice exhibited anything but blindness to the numerous weak points in the opera. That, at a period when the name of Richard Wagner was not known in Austria, I happened to be the first who spoke publicly in terms of warm admiration of Tannhäuser, is a fact that gives me satisfaction even now.* My mistake consisted merely in the sanguine belief that, in his subsequent operas, Wagner would raise and refine to clearer and clearer beauty those elements which are full of charm and purport in Tannhäuser, and that, at the same time, he would reject what was unmusical, unhealthy, and trivial, though cleverly disguised. The reverse has come to pass; every succeeding opera has become more unmelodious, more wearisome, more noisy and abstruse. Just in the same way, his pamphlet grows more passionate, more spiteful, and more mendacious at every page. The one lie, my pretended "Judaism," I will overlook, in consideration of the blind rage of a man, who, like the Rabbin in Heine's Disputation, always goes about with a small naked knife, in order murderously to hack harmless Christians who may pass him. The second lie does not concern me alone. Wagner asserts, the reader must know, that Theodor Vischer (whom he has the impertinence to dub "an amiable and perfectly blond German Ästhetiker"), confided to me the execution of the musical part of his Ästhetik, and deduces from this relation of ours to each other fresh conclusions in explanation of my "rapid celebrity," &c. As we must in justice assume that Herr Wagner has had in his hands at least once this Ästhetik of Vischer's since he so depreciates it, it cannot possibly have escaped his notice that the whole of the musical portion (with the exception of a few paragraphs written by Vischer himself), is due to Professor Karl Köstlin, of Tübingen, a man known as a thorough musician and philosopher, and not only no Jew, but actually a Protestant clergyman.

According to Wagner, it is impossible to estimate too highly the incalculable influence, still at work, of the pseudonymous Jew-Article of 1850; he assures us: "What Liszt, too, had to undergo, was attributable to this article!" The reader perceives that Wagner is becoming a perfect child. The "defection" of Joachim (whose truthful, artistic nature could no longer put up with the humbug of the Music of the Future), Wagner also explains as a consequence of the influence exerted by his Jewish shield of Medusa. In Paris and London, moreover, the same "organized conspiracy" existed against him (of course, people there had nothing more pressing to do than to read the Leipziger Musikzeitung of 1850). He accounts for the universal antipathy with which he met in London, "by the peculiar character of the English religion, which is based more upon the Old than upon the New Testament." After having thus waged war with the papers, Wagner, not abandoning his fixed idea for a single moment, proceeds to attack theatrical managers. "You already perceive," he says, apostrophizing Mme. Muchanoff, née Countess Nesselrode, "that, while my former operas made their way into all German theatres, each of my most recent works meets with a sluggish, nay, hostilely rejectful behavior in the self-same theatres; the fact is, my earlier works had forced their way upon the stage before the Jewish agitation, and their success could not be greatly affected." Such an explanation can emanate only from a person completely blinded by vanity, who never seeks in himself the cause of a failure, but always solely in the intrigues of others. Every theatrical manager who understands his business (leaving out of consideration the fact of his possessing any especial feeling for art) will be eager to produce novelties by a composer who has already written two or three operas which have successfully kept their places on the stage. In consequence of the unusual dearth of new German operas, a theatrical manager will even make many a sacrifice to secure such novelties. If, in spite of this, he does not venture on them, he must have come to the conviction that they do not hold out the promise of success, or, at least, not of such a success as will repay him for his trouble and expense. When warm advocates of Tannhäuser protest against music like that in Tristan und Isolde, the reason of their so doing exists wholly and solely in Tristan und Isolde itself; and when a theatrical manager asserts he can cast and get up Der fliegende Holländer and Lohengrin tolerably well, but could never manage Die Meistersinger or Die Nibelungen, here again the blame rests solely and wholly with Die Nibelungen and Die Meistersinger. It is not every theatre which, like the Royal Operahouse, Munich, can maintain an expensive clinical staff of accoucheurs simply for Richard Wagner. Wagner allows himself to be so carried away by his passion as to make the exceedingly impertinent assertion that he perceived, in his correspondence with the persons at the head of the Court Operahouses in Vienna and Berlin, "from the dodges employed by them, that it was not merely their wish not to be under the necessity of producing the Meistersinger, but, moreover, to hinder its being given at other theatres." As regards the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, I am in a position to assure Herr Wagner of the contrary. The management was only waiting for permission to make the most necessary cuts, and very rightly, for no sensible manager would ever inflict upon his public an opera of such preposterous and somniferous length. Wagner, however, takes some credit to himself for the fact "that he has now made certain stipulations never previously considered necessary for his permission to produce a new work." The "mingling of the Jewish element in our artistic affairs" appears in this case, therefore, to emanate from himself, I think.—After giving Fröbel (who has broken so many lances in his defence) a kick, as he goes by, Wagner suddenly stumbles over the name of Robert Schumann. Of course, something injurious must be said of him—but it is not so easy to do so. . . . All right! Wagner has hit upon it. "Compare," he says to Mme. Muchanoff, née Countess von Nesselrode, "the Robert Schumann of the first half of his productivity with the Robert Schumann of the second: there, plastic fashioning impulse; here, a subsiding into bombastic flatness." And what is the reason of this! Was not it, as we previously thought, Schumann's nervous illness and the overclouding of his mind, which soon met with so fearful a conclusion in his tragic end? Not a bit of it! Wagner assures us that the reason of the decline in Schumann's productive power must be sought in the influence exerted "by the mingling of the Jewish element." Up to this point the predominant feeling excited by the pamphlet is one of ridiculousness, but this feeling is now converted into absolute disgust. We shut the repulsive book, which will hardly gain its author many friends, or create many enemies for the Jews. As a guide to Wagner's character, it possesses only a psychological interest. In its unbounded self-adoration has attained a height, on which a man with his brains in healthy working order could never breathe. We are involuntarily compelled to think of R. Wagner's predecessor in the Old Testament,—King Nabuchodonazzar, who believed so long that he was a god, that he turned himself into a mere ordinary ox, eat hay, and was set to music by Verdi.

Musical Pitch.

To the Editor of the "Musical World," London.

Since writing my former letter, it has occurred to me that it might aid in the discussion of this question to give some definite information as to the varieties of pitch actually used at present in London. I have taken some trouble to ascertain this, by personal observations and calculations, and have embodied the results in the following table. The numbers are given for the C on the third space in the treble, in double vibrations per second; and to estimate the value of the variation, it must be recollected that, at this part of the scale, a difference of about thirty vibrations per second represents a semitone.

Some of these numbers differ from those usually given, for the following reason:—In comparing a pitch regulated by A, with one regulated by C, the temperament must be taken into account. For example, if an organ, or other keyed instrument, be tuned to the French standard A, the C on that instrument will be the tempered C (518) and not the true C (522). I have, therefore, in all cases where A is the standard note, given the vibrations for the tempered C.

We learn two important things from this table. In the first place the concert orchestral pitch is well defined and remarkably uniform in the different orchestras, so that we know exactly what we are dealing with. It has not risen in the last ten years, being, if anything, a shade lower. But it is still three-fourths of a semitone higher than the Philharmonic pitch maintained from 1813 to 1843.

Secondly, we find that singers, when untrammelled by orchestral accompaniments, have, by a sort of common consent, adopted a pitch about two-thirds of a semitone lower than that at present used in the orchestras, and which lower pitch, therefore, we may assume to be generally considered most suitable for vocal purposes in this country.

Thus we seem to have drifted insensibly into the establishment of two well defined pitches—one orchestral, the other vocal.

It is almost wasting words to argue for the lowering of the orchestral pitch. Independently of the anomaly of retaining two definitions of the same musical note, and of differing so materially from other nations with whom we are in constant musical communication, the orchestral pitch is much higher than any classical composer ever wrote for; it gives a false rendering of the music, and sometimes makes it impracticable; it strains the voice, disturbs the temper, and damages the performance of the singers; and it is inconvenient for many of the instruments, or for the players upon them.† No musical advantage has ever been proved to balance these evils; the objections to change are entirely personal or commercial ones, which we need not discuss here, further than to say it is a pity such reasons should be allowed to stand in the way of a measure that would be so advantageous in every musical point of view.

Neither is it necessary to insist on the desirability of having some one fixed standard. The idea that the pitch of musical notes should be incapable of correct definition, or that where many have to work together this pitch should be variable at anybody's pleasure, without any standard of comparison, is opposed to common sense. The only argument to the contrary ever used is the difficulty of getting the standard generally adhered to; but this is of no more force than it would be to argue against a standard of length, because all the yard measures in the country did not correspond. No one pretends that a standard of pitch should or could, in this country, be made compulsory; but the very existence of such a standard would have the effect of producing a constant tendency to uniformity, which would ultimately bring about all the beneficial results desired.

What then ought this standard to be? There are three to choose from, which I have put prominently in the table.

The Congress of British Musicians, who considered the subject in 1859, evinced a strong leaning towards the lowest of these; but as it was thought by many practical musicians that the time was not ripe for so great a change, the Congress recommended the German standard as a more moderate measure. If this recommendation had been adapted in the musical world, we should have heard nothing of the present agitation; and as, singularly enough, the German is exactly a mean between the two English pitches, if we wanted, even now, to strike a balance between them, the German would be the obvious standard to take.

But circumstances are now changed. The call for lowering is much louder than it was ten years ago, and singers would not now be satisfied with the relief of one-third of a semitone. And (although it certainly seems odd, in a musical question, to ignore the practice of the most musical part of the Continent, from which nearly all our music comes) we must take it, I think, that the general sense of the English musical world is in favor of a standard more nearly approaching that of our neighbors across the Channel.

The question lies, therefore, between the other two, the French and the natural standards. Now, it must be observed that when practical musicians advocate the "French pitch," they merely mean that or something near it. None of them would venture to say there was any appreciable advantage, in a musical point of view, in 435 vibrations per second over 430 or 440; they name the French standard simply because it is the one that comes most practically before them; but if it happened to be a fifth of a semitone sharper or flatter it would be just as acceptable. It ought to be known that the actual French number is entirely empirical; it has no sort of justification in a natural or philosophical point of view. It is singular that the French, who took so much trouble to derive their standards of measure and weight from a great natural and philosophical analogy, should have been so remiss in this instance; but so it is.

† I calculate that the difference between the orchestral and vocal pitch adds about 8 per cent. to the strain on stringed instruments, if the same-sized strings be used. In the pianoforte this extra strain on the framing amounts to no less than a ton and a quarter, thereby much increasing the cost, and diminishing the power of standing in tune.

* This Jewish chronological calculation is not applicable to Vienna. "Tannhäuser" was not given at the Imperial Operahouse before 1850, and "Lohengrin" not before 1853.

* This is intended to correspond with the German standard; but on comparing it with a "regulation" A fork of 435, brought from France, it comes out slightly sharp, as given in the table.

There does, however, exist a great philosophical and natural analogy which might serve to fix a standard of pitch worthy of a scientific nation; and which standard, moreover, is practically identical with the pitch the English musical world are now crying out for. The simple fundamental datum of one vibration per second gives the simplest note in music, C, at a pitch differing only by a practically inappreciable quantity from that of the vocal pitch already adopted in this country. The difference is in the right direction, one-fifth of a semitone lower. It could only be detected by good ears and with careful attention; it is only what is constantly introduced by equal temperament (the tempered C sharp on the natural scale coincides with the true C sharp on the French), and it is much less than the change induced by alteration, during a concert, by change of temperature. Wind instruments tuned to the natural pitch would be far above the French before an evening performance was over.

There is another argument in favor of the natural standard. Some years ago I was commissioned by the Government (through the Astronomer Royal) to report on the notes actually sounded by the great Westminster bells, and a set of careful experiments were tried by myself and Mr. J. H. Griesbach, to determine the number of vibrations. Referring to the calculations I then made, and introducing some slight corrections, I make the key-note of the chimes, F, given by Big Ben, to be about 170 double vibrations per second. This gives a C of 510, differing inappreciably from the natural standard.

So that by adopting this standard we should have the advantage of a huge Government tuning-fork, distributing the standard musical pitch within hearing of all London, every hour of the day!

By this measure, while we should adopt almost implicitly the judgment of practical musicians, we should escape the charge of servilely copying the empirical formula of our neighbors, and should put the matter on a truly philosophical and reasonable basis, worthy of the country of Newton and Herschel.

Crystal Palace Concerts. (London.)

The series of concerts for 1868-9, just come to an end, has fully maintained the reputation of the Crystal Palace. Since our notice of the excellent performance of Professor Bennett's Woman of Samaria many interesting things have been heard, some new to the audience, none unwelcome. At the 23rd concert, Schubert's great symphony in C (his "No. 9") was given for the most part just as well, and created just the same lively sensation as on previous occasions. Another feature was the second pianoforte concerto of Mendelssohn, played by Mme. Arabella Goddard as she invariably plays Mendelssohn's music—con amore. The first overture at this concert was Die Zauberflöte, about which it would be superfluous to say a word; the last was Herr Nick Gade's concert-overture The Highlands, which, like other efforts by the Danish composer, partakes more of the manner than of the spirit of his great prototype, Mendelssohn, and yet, compared with a certain orchestral prelude to Shakspeare's Tempest, the production of Herr Johannes Hager, brought forward earlier in the season, is regarded as mere workmanship, a masterpiece. At the 24th concert we had, once again, the overture and (three trivial numbers excepted) the whole of the incidental music furnished by Beethoven, in the year 1800, for Salvatore Viganò's "heroischen allegorischen Ballet" entitled Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus, which, although much of it has at the best a faint resemblance to the Beethoven whom musicians revere as the greatest of composers, must always be listened to with mingled curiosity and satisfaction. There was, moreover, a novelty at this concert, in the shape of a romance from Schubert's entirely unknown opera, Die Verschworenen (The Conspirators)—charming in itself and charmingly sung by Mlle. Regan. The other feature of the programme was Mendelssohn's violin concerto, executed like a genuine artist by Mr. Henry Holmes, an English violinist who shines equally as leader of quartets and performer of concertos, a composer of distinguished ability—a musician, indeed, of varied and remarkable acquirements. At the 25th concert, Mr. A. S. Sullivan's symphony No. 1 (in E minor), written expressly for the Crystal Palace, and first performed in 1866, was introduced a second time and heard with increased interest. Since this symphony was last performed, Mr. Sullivan has made curtailments in it which are decided improvements; and so attractive is the work intrinsically that, although the official prospectus had spoken of a new symphony (in D) from the same pen, "No. 2" (which we hope to get next season) being non-forthcoming, few complained of being invited to listen once more to "No. 1." Herr Manns took every pains with the performance, and the symphony of our young and promising composer was received with every mark of favor. At the same concert one of the later inspirations of Robert Schumann—the overture to a drama founded upon Goethe's Hermann and Dorothea, sixth and last of Schumann's "concert-overtures," and first of what are styled his "posthumous works," composed in 1851, not long before he died—was heard for the first time. This overture, we are reminded by the enthusiastic author of the analytical programmes, which tell us so much and in such glowing terms of Schumann and Schubert, "has only to be known to become a favorite with all who love refined sentiment, beautiful forms, and tender treatment." And yet another great authority—Herr Richard Wagner, in his singularly preposterous pamphlet called Judaism in Music—instructs us that the overture to Hermann and Dorothea belongs to a period when Schumann's "productivity," compared with the "plastic fashioning impulse" of an earlier time, had "subsided into bombastic fatness." We would rather not adjudicate in the matter. All we shall suggest is that while incorporating the tune of the "Marseillaise" into his overture, Schumann might have done something more than limit his experiment to bare quotation. Another noticeable experiment in the 25th concert—which began, by the way, with Cherubini's noble overture to Les deux Journées (a composition that speaks convincingly for itself)—was Mr. Hallé's performance of Beethoven's fourth pianoforte concerto (in G), with Beethoven's own "cadences." These "cadences" we cannot think worthy a place in a work of such perfect beauty, although Beethoven himself is the author of them.

The 26th concert (the last of the regular series) was rendered memorable by one of those performances of Beethoven's orchestral Colossus, the Symphony No. 9, with choruses, for which the Crystal Palace is famous. As of old, the three purely orchestral movements were wonderfully executed, although we confess that, according to our own estimate of their character, each of them was taken somewhat too fast for the effect intended by the composer. The vocal parts, both choral and solo quartet (Mlle. Regan, Miss Julia Elton, Messrs. G. Perron and L. Thomas) left much to desire. In anticipation of this drawback, a specious apology appeared in the programme, which, now that the agitation for lowering the musical pitch is going on, may be read with some interest:—

"In no composition would the alteration of the musical pitch be more welcome than in this. Indeed with all the ability and anxiety of chorus singers it is impossible to obtain a thoroughly satisfactory performance of the vocal movements. Many of the notes are out of reach. To those conductors who will not allow themselves to tamper with Beethoven's passages there is therefore no alternative but to put the 'Choral Symphony' by till the pitch is lowered."

Does Mr. Manns intend by this that unless the musical pitch is lowered the "Choral Symphony" will henceforth be withdrawn from the Crystal Palace programmes? And, if not, what? The interest of the 26th concert was greatly enhanced by the co-operation of a distinguished foreigner, Herr Carl Reinecke, director of the famous Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig, who as composer and performer has attained equally high eminence at home. It was therefore only proper that as Herr Reinecke had been invited to play he should be asked to play one of his own compositions. The work chosen by our esteemed visitor was the concerto in F sharp minor, performed at the Crystal Palace two years ago, with merited success, by Mr. Oscar Beringer, one of Herr Reinecke's cleverest pupils. This concerto, which could not fail to strike, even at a first hearing, as a production of uncommon merit, gains much by the opportunity of a second, and more especially as that second enabled us to judge of it by the light of the composer's own reading. Each of the three movements is constructed after the legitimate classical model, and each contains points worth attention, as showing that not only Herr Reinecke can think independently for himself, but that what he has to say deserves a hearing. The first allegro is broadly designed; the adagio evinces both fancy and delicate treatment; while the finale, an allegro con brio in the major key of F sharp (a key but rarely used and very difficult to play in, as musicians are aware) is spirited from end to end. Herr Reinecke's performance was that alike of a skilled and ready virtuoso and a thorough musician. His execution is brilliant and fluent, and his expression at once natural and unaffected. The concerto created a very marked impression. Herr Reinecke was applauded after each separate movement, and called back unanimously at the conclusion. There was, in addition to the concerto, a favorable specimen of Herr Reinecke's purely orchestral writing, in the shape of a prelude to the fifth act of his own opera, Der König Manfred—a melodious and expressive slow movement, which derives peculiar character from the sustained employment of the mutes on the string instruments. This, too, was already known to the Crystal Palace audience, who, however, were evidently pleased to hear it again, if we may judge by the hearty encore that compelled Mr. Manns to repeat it.

The concert on Saturday, "for the benefit" of Mr. Manns, the able and indefatigable conductor, was a fitting climax to a series of entertainments almost unexampled in variety of interest. The attendance was enormous. The concert began with Beethoven's Leonora overture, No. 3, and ended with Schumann's Manfred. Both of these original and remarkable compositions—the one as exciting and brilliant as the other is gloomy and monotonous, each as thoroughly characteristic of its author as anything either has given to the art—are familiar to the musical frequenters of the Crystal Palace. The symphony was Schubert's unfinished B minor, what is wanting to which is as much to be regretted as what is wanting to Mendelssohn's Loreley, inasmuch as, had it been completed, we cannot but think, judging by the two existing movements, that the symphony in B would have been Schubert's masterpiece. [?] This, too, for which, with so many other beautiful things from the same fertile source, we are indebted to the enterprise of the Crystal Palace directors and their untiring secretary, Mr. G. Grove, is well known to all who attend the concerts. We shall, therefore, merely add that symphony and overtures were alike played with the spirit and perfection of detail which we have been taught to expect as a matter of course from the Sydnham orchestra and its intelligent chief. The playing of the wind instruments in the symphony of Schubert could not possibly have been surpassed; while the difficult passages for the strings in the overture of Schumann (occasionally more difficult than effective), were scarcely less deserving notice. As for the Leonora, we verily believe that "wind" and "strings" could play it right off without book. There was no concerto, but the bright and vigorous Rondo Brillante in E flat, for pianoforte and orchestra, written by Mendelssohn, and dedicated to his friend Moscheles, as far back as 1834 (which the composer himself was the first to introduce to a London audience), was an admirable substitute. The pianist on Saturday being Mr. Charles Hallé, it may be easily credited that the execution of the principal part in the Rondo was irreproachable. It is long indeed since we have heard a more finished mechanical display. Later in the day Mr. Hallé gave two solos—Schubert's "Moment Musical" in F minor (encored), and the presto in C, No. 4, from Book 6 of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte, which, as Mendelssohn himself did not call it "Spinnerlied," should not be called "Spinnerlied" under any circumstances. In addition to the foregoing Mr. Manns brought forth the new ballet music composed by M. Gounod for the scene of the Walpurgis Night, which has been lately restored to Faust, both at the Theatre de la Monnaie, in Brussels, and the Paris Académie Impériale de Musique. The subject of the ballet is derived from the second part of Goethe's great poem; and the characters are Cleopatra, Helen, Aspasia, Laïs and Phryne (principals), Nubian slaves and Trojan maidens (subordinates). The music comprises seven pieces, which we may at once state without reserve are neither worthy of M. Gounod nor of a place in such an opera as his Faust. The vocal music at this concert was as varied, if not in all respects as good, as the instrumental. Among other things we had some Swedish quartets, sung in the Swedish language, by four Swedish singers—MM. Luttman, Köster, Ellberg, and Ryberg (their first appearance in England). Neither the quartets nor the singers call for any special remark.

In brief recapitulation we may add that during the series of concerts just expired no less than 20 symphonies have been given (six by Beethoven, two by Haydn (one, The Surprise, for the first time), three by Mendelssohn, two by Mozart, three by Schubert (one, No. 6, in C major, first time), two by Schumann (one, No. 4, in E flat, first time), one by Spohr No. 4, in C minor, first time), and one by Mr. Sullivan; six overtures by Weber, eight by Mendelssohn (one, the Wedding of Canacho, first time), one by Wagner, six by Beethoven, two by Mozart (not enough by several), three by Auber, three by Schumann (one Hermann and Dorothea, first time), two by Cherubini, two by Schubert (one, Italian overture in D, first time), one each by Macfarren, Berlioz, Herold, Hager, Gade, Hiller (concert overture No. 2, first time), Volkmann (in F, first time), and five by Rossini; marches by Wagner (Meistersinger, first time), Costa and Berlioz; ballet music by Beethoven, Rossini, and Gounod; concertos and other instrumental pieces by Beethoven (two), Sterndale Bennett, Mozart, Schumann, Weber, Mendelssohn (seven), and Reinecke; besides the Ode to St. Cecilia's Day (Handel), Mount of Olives (Beethoven), music to Loreley (Mendelssohn), music to Egmont (Beethoven), Woman of Samaria (Bennett), "Song of Miriam" (Schubert, first time), and a quantity of miscellaneous vocal pieces and instrumental solos (including organ music, &c.) unnecessary to mention in detail. The Saturday Concerts will be resumed in October. Meanwhile we are to have the usual summer music on Saturdays, in the Handel orchestra, commencing on May-day with a grand performance in honor of Rossini, organized by the Sacred Harmonic Society, and to be conducted by Sir Michael Costa. The programme on this occasion is to comprise the Stabat Mater, a grand finale from Le Siège de Corinthe, the overtures to Semiramide, La Gazza Ladra, and Guillaume Tell, &c., with a chorus and orchestra 3,000 in number.—Times.

NEW YORK, MAY 10.—The musical season has virtually ended with the 6th Philharmonic Concert, which occurred on Saturday evening. I append the programme:

Overture, "Iphigenia".....Gluck.
4th P.F. Concerto, G major.....Beethoven.
Mr. Jarvis (of Philadelphia).
Manfred. (1st time in America).....Schumann.
Declamations and Prologue by Edwin Booth.
Choruses by the Liederkreis Society.
Overture, "Oberon".....Von Weber.

[Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony had been performed at two rehearsals, and it was the general impression that it would be one of the attractions of the concert. It did not appear upon Saturday evening's programme].

The opening Overture, solid and firm, took us back to the old "square-toed," bowigged and bopowdered days when musical ideas were the main points, and orchestral effects were merely subordinate; we moderns "have changed all that," but scarcely for the better.

Beethoven's dreamy, romantic Concerto received full justice at the hands of Mr. Jarvis, who played the piano part with great smoothness and elegance, and with noteworthy attention to shading and phrasing. His crescendos were peculiarly excellent.

Schumann's "Manfred" was necessarily, by its magnitude, the feature of the evening, and was quite creditably done, considering that the rehearsals had been far too few for the preparation of such a work. The Overture has been played a few times in this country, but the incidental music has never before been heard by an American audience. The entire work bears the mark of Schumann's wonderful genius; for unity of design and felicitous adaptation of music to the text, it can scarcely be equalled. The text is of course adapted from Byron's fragmentary drama, and the soliloquies—with connecting prologue—were superbly recited by Edwin Booth. Every tone and inflection of his rich and musical voice could be distinctly heard in every part of the immense building. As to the music itself, the Overture is a complete tone picture of the craggy solitudes and mental desolation in which Manfred is found by the prologue. The incidental music is also most admirable, especially the little gem which separates the first from the second act, and more especially the exquisite and aerial bit which symbolizes the "apparition of the Witch of the Alps." There is also a magnificent chorus of "Infernal Spirits," which was well done by the Liederkreis. The whole work was most carefully conducted by Carl Bergmann, to whom too much praise cannot be accorded for his promptitude and care in every detail.

I should like to give a word of praise to the orchestra, but my regard for truth forbids me, for I have never known this efficient organization to play so poorly. In the Gluck Overture the violins were uncertain and shaky, and in the Concerto more so.

The concert closed with an orthodox Von Weber Overture, and thus ended the 20th season of the New York Philharmonic Society.

I regret to announce the death—on Sunday last—of C. B. Seymour, for many years the able and conscientious musical and dramatic critic of the N. Y. Times. The immediate cause of his decease was congestion of the brain, which followed immediately upon a severe attack of rheumatism, and proved fatal after an illness of only three or four days. As a critic, he was fearless, capable, and independent; as a man, genial, courteous and refined. His early death (at 40 years of age) has created a vacancy in the critical, musical, and journalistic world which it will be difficult to fill; while by an unusually large circle of personal friends he will be most sincerely mourned.

The Messiah, which had been originally advertised for Thursday evening, May 6, has been postponed to Friday evening, May 14.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

Concert Review.

Last week brought Mme. PAREPA-ROSA's concert, of which we had to deprive ourselves, but which by all accounts was a success, the great songstress being cordially welcomed back after her long illness, and showing that she had lost none of the power and splendor of her voice or skill, nor of the spirit with which she always enters into things.

MR. PARKER'S VOCAL CLUB of amateurs sang another exquisite programme on the evenings of May 1st and 8th. The severe bereavement which had befallen Mr. Parker deprived them of his presence; but the Club, having so carefully prepared the music (of which, by what might seem a providential significance, a principal feature was a requiem for a child), were moved to give the concert, making it an expression of their respect and tender sympathy for their leader. Mr. LANG kindly took his place for the occasion.

The selections were, first, a Prayer (Da nobis pacem) by Mendelssohn; then a singularly refined and beautiful Benedictus and Agnus Dei, for Quartet and Chorus, from the fourth Mass of Haydn;—the Duet of Soprani from Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm; and a Cantata: "Easter Morning," by Ferdinand Hiller, a novelty of considerable length and variety, and full of interest; it is for a Soprano Solo with male chorus.—Selections from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music followed, the fairy Overture and Scherzo being finely played with four hands by a lady amateur with Mr. Lang, and the choruses most delicately and sweetly sung. After a couple of part-songs ("Morning Prayer," Mendelssohn, and "Hunting Song," Schumann), came Schumann's "Requiem for Mignon." The subject, from Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister" (Book vii., Chap. 8), is one of the most beautiful that could be found for music. The imaginary scene is thus described:

[The Abbé called them, in the evening, to attend the exequies of Mignon. The company proceeded to the Hall of the Past; they found it magnificently ornamented and illuminated. The walls were hung with azure tapestry almost from ceiling to floor, so that nothing but the friezes and socles, above and below, were visible. On the four candelabras in the corners large wax lights were burning; smaller lights were in the four smaller candelabras placed by the sarcophagus in the middle. Near this stood four boys, dressed in azure, with silver; they had broad fans of ostrich-feathers, which they waved above a figure that was resting upon the sarcophagus. The company sat down; two invisible choruses began, in a soft, musical recitative to ask: "Whom bring ye us to the still dwelling?" The four boys replied, with lovely voices: "'Tis a tired playmate whom we bring you: let her rest in your still dwelling till the songs of her heavenly sisters once more awaken her."

In alternate strains of chorus and quartet of boys Schumann has with a true instinct caught the spirit and expression of the whole; the opening, so mournful yet resigned; then the awakening of hope: "Yet look at the strong wings; look at the light, clear robe! How glitters the golden band upon the head! Look at the beautiful, the noble repose!"—Then the sad answer of the Boys: "Ah! the wings do not raise her." Then the steadily rising strain of faith and exhortation: "Cast forward the eye of the spirit;" "Children, turn back into life!" "Hasten into life! In the pure garments of beauty may we meet you with heavenly looks and with the wreath of immortality!" We wish we could give all the words (Carlyle's translation), or describe the singular beauty of the music, with its mingled pathos and uplifting inspiration, or do justice to the admirable manner in which this and all the pieces were sung.

The Annual School Festival.

The Musical Exhibition of the Public Schools of Boston, on Wednesday of this week, was in some respects even more interesting and more satisfactory than usual. The exercises of the twelve hundred pupils from the High and Grammar Schools, in the afternoon, were of the same character as last year, purely musical, without the tedious superfluity of speeches, presentations, &c., which are wisely left to a separate occasion. But this week, for the first time, the Primary Schools were represented in a special exhibition in the morning. There was a choir of about one thousand little singers, under the direction of the admirable teacher, whose whole heart is in his work, and who seems to have a genius for it, having proved effectually that children at the tender age of from five to seven can be taught to sing, and even to read notes.—MR. LUTHER W. MASON.

It was simply and truly a children's concert. The music sung (of course in unison), the cheerful, wholesome words, the whole spirit of the scene and the arrangements, were childlike without being silly. The restless little beings all seemed happy in harmonious discipline, learning the love of order, enjoying the sense of progress, and tasting a new freedom in these carefully taught songs and rhythmic movements. In this sense the scene was charming, and the programme very fitly chosen.

First was played an Overture, to Zampa, by a small orchestra (many of our musicians being absent from the city); but it was not badly done, and the best of it was, to see how attentively the children listened. Three school songs, which followed, were from sound and earnest German composers who have been foremost in the humble, noble work of giving the resource of song to all the children: a "Song of Praise" by Nægeli (1773-1836); "The Child's Angel," by Glaser (1784-1829); and "Praise of Singing" by old John Adam Hiller, Cantor in the Thomasschule at Leipzig (1728-1804). These are pleasant, simple tunes, with nothing strained or namby-pamby about them; and the thousand little voices came out openly and promptly, in good tune, and with as musical a volume of sound as could be expected from such young organs. Of course, the quality of tone must be a little crude and blatant. But the effect, upon the whole, was charming; they really were united, heart and soul, making a cheerful and a tuneful noise, and happy in it.

Then came Physical Exercises by the whole little army of them, timed by the Orchestra, who played a pretty "Cuckoo Gallop," with slow introduction; and all moved as regularly and rhythmically as the choreographic manœuvres of the ballet on the stage; their little figures straightening up at once, with faces beaming; the hands going up by even stages and arching over their heads, like a thousand wreaths, and down again; then, as the dance rhythm set in, quicker and more strenuous play of hands and arms, each period wound up with clapping of the hands, the quick, simultaneous crack whereof was of course as amusing to the performers as the audience. Here was the philosophy and educational economy of the Kinder-garten system well illustrated.

The fourth and last part of the little concert was called a Recreation for the Children, and consisted of a merry Christmas-Eve Song: "Santa Claus is on the way;" Romberg's "Child Symphony," played by the orchestra, with reinforcement of joy instruments, cuckoos, trumpets, &c.;—pretty and droll enough, delighting the little folks, (though it would be better if it were possible to have such little instruments in tune); the steady violins, however, kept the outline in the several quaint movements. Finally a very pretty effect of semi-chorus, answered in full chorus. "What say all?" which perhaps made the pleasant impression of all the singing: it was after this fashion:

Semi-Chorus. What song doth the cricket sing?
What news doth the swallow bring?
What doth laughing childhood tell?
What calls out the marriage-bell?

Chorus. What say all? Love and mirth, in the air and in the earth,
Very, very soft and merry is the natural song of earth.

Naturally there was now and then a little unsteadiness among so many voices, with the wings so widely separated on the great stage, the orchestra being in the middle; but it was remarkable that such good time, for the most part, was kept, considering that they had never been upon that stage before, and sang without rehearsal there. The concert was just long enough—hardly an hour; all was pretty, innocent and cheerful, with no sentimentality, no nonsense, yet plenty to make one laugh and bring tears to old eyes at the same time.

The Exhibition of the High and Grammar Schools took place at four o'clock, and was conducted by JULIUS EICHBERG, teacher in the Girls' High and Normal School, with J. B. SHARLAND, teacher in the Grammar Schools, at the great Organ. The military precision with which the lines of well-dressed maidens, from many directions, filed so quietly into their seats upon the sloping sides and front of the great stage and the side galleries above, followed by the round-faced boys, who looked all alike in their grey dresses, like the seeds of a sunflower packed close in the centre,—was the first and not the least point of interest in the programme. Meanwhile the Organ played an animated, florid Voluntary. The Orchestra, now enlarged to about forty, by sending for musicians to New York, played the Overture to Oberon, and then the scholars, rising on the instant at the Conductor's sign, sang, in unison, Luther's Choral: "A sure stronghold our God is He," the organ supplying harmony. All that we said in praise of the choral singing last year could be repeated more emphatically now.

A more flowing and melodious chorus followed, sung in harmony: "Now the twilight softly stealing," by Mercadante:—this too by the whole twelve hundred, and with euphonious ensemble of tone and perfect evenness of movement. Next came a Glee: "So merrily over the ocean spray," by Brinley Richards, introduced by two short stanzas of solo, sung one by the Sopranos the other by the Altos of the Girls' High and Normal Schools. This was so pleasing that it had to be repeated. Still more interesting, and truly musical, was the Lullaby composed by Mr. Eichberg, in which the pupils of the High and Normal Schools, with their more refined, pure, even voices, sang the melody, while the "muted" voices of all the rest hummed a "sweet and low" accompaniment.

Not the least gratifying and instructive portion of the exhibition was what followed in the way of entr'acte: the vocal and physical exercises, technically known as "Vocal Gymnastics," under the direction of Mr. LEWIS B. MONROE, who has wrought such wonders in the schools, teaching the free, graceful, strengthening play of limbs and muscles, the expansion of the chest and art of breathing, and the production of pure tones both of the singing and the speaking voice,—in short the formation of wholesome habits whereby the sonorous organ, in acquiring beauty, strength and flexibility, does not wear out. From the first movements for acquiring an erect, well poised and free position of the body, through exercises of the head and arms for opening and strengthening the chest, to loud breathing from full lungs; then, as by degrees the breathing becomes humming, and finally out leaps a full, round, strong, sonorous tone, perfectly musical, upon a given pitch, which is long and well sustained, repeated with admirable crescendo and diminuendo, then through the scale intervals, to the giving out the common chord in perfectly blended harmony,—all was followed with breathless interest and wonder, several times breaking out into vehement applause. The simultaneous recital by hundreds of voices, like one voice, of sentences from the Bible, showed how well the ear and sense of rhythm had been trained, and what heed given to distinct and nice articulation. These exercises told the secret of the improved quality and power of tone, produced by the 1200 singing voices, year by year.

After the Orchestra had played the brilliant Overture to William Tell, the most important vocal selection of the day was sung, in four-part harmony, with orchestral accompaniment by the young ladies of the High and Normal School. This was Schubert's beautiful setting of the 23d Psalm: "The Lord is my Shepherd." As an artistic aspiration, it was the most ambitious thus far in the music of our schools, and it was in the right direction, for this music was written for such voices, and by a man of genius. The effort was in every way creditable to Mr. Eichberg and his pupils, and we shall hope to hear more such music. A Chorus: "Sweet Convent bells," by Benedict, with tintinnabulous accompaniment, and with alto solo by the older girls, was very sweetly sung. Then came two pieces, which gave great pleasure last year, and more this: Hatton's "Wood-Thrush," sung in responsive chorus of Grammar Schools and Normal School; and "Wake, gentle zephyr," in full chorus, by Rossini, rich and full and flowing. The exercises were concluded with "Old Hundred," the audience rising, and in a feeble, fragmentary manner joining in the strain.

The result was eminently satisfactory. There was no mistaking the improvement both in the general quality of voices and in the purity, precision and expression of the singing. What is chiefly wanting is more light and shade, less of that uniform forte or fortissimo. Surely each return of this festival of youth and song—how timely in this apple-blossom month of May!—gives more convincing proof of the efficient manner in which vocal music is taught in our public schools, and of its wholesome influence now, its admirable preparation of fresh "well-tempered" material for our artistic choirs and oratorio societies in future. The musical branch of our School Committee are earning a deep debt of gratitude.

FLORENCE, ITALY. We have the programme of the "Società Cherubini" (2nd Concert of the 8th year) for April 2, 1869;—that earnest classical society of amateurs, of which we have spoken several times before, under the intelligent direction of a lady, Madame LAUSBOT, and of which our friend Ball, the sculptor, and his no less musical lady, are members. Such programmes show that German music, and of the best, as well as that of the great old Italian masters, is not without its admirers and zealous cultivators in Italy. It is as follows:

Schumann. Andante et Variations pour deux Pianos. Op. 46. (Mme. Lausbot et M. Buonamici).
Prestorius. "Sorgi, Sorgi" Chœur a Capella.
Mendelssohn. Air de l'Oratorio St. Paul. (M. Solon).
Palestrina. "Pange Angelicus" Chœur a Capella.
Henselt. Andante du Grand Concert en fa min. Op. 16. M. Buonamici.
Schumann. "Les Bohémiens," Chœur avec accompagnement de Piano, Tambourin et Triangle.
Mozart. Duo, "Grüdel perché finora" des Noes de Figaro. (Mme. Redl et M. Solon).
Weber. Arietta du "Freischütz." (Mme Redl).
Spontini. Air de Ferdinand Cortez. (M. Solon).
Liszt. Paraphrase de Concert pour Piano sur "Le Songe d'une nuit d'été" de Mendelssohn. (M. Buonamici).
J. C. Bach. Motetto à double Chœur sans accompagnement, "Gloria, o Signor, ti lacerò."

The Motet: "Ich lasse dich nicht" (German), commonly known in English as "I wrestle and pray," is here for once ascribed to the right Bach, John Christoph, instead of Sebastian.

PLAYING WITHOUT NOTES. The London Musical World, copying and endorsing what it calls our "sensible" remarks upon this practice (apropos of Miss Topp's performance of the Schumann Concerto), adds:

To go farther—why should not the leader in a quartet, quintet, or other chamber composition, play his part from memory? This is never done; though, doubtless, Herr Joachim, who like Mendelssohn before him, plays his concertos invariably without book, could accomplish one feat just as easily as the other. Mme. Goddard, when Miss Arabella Goddard, used always to trust to memory in her public performances of pieces with which she was more or less familiar. On one occasion, however, at the rehearsal for a concert in the Hanover Square Rooms, she was about to begin the second concerto of Mendelssohn. The conductor was Molique. No sooner had she played the first few bars, than Molique, watchful as usual at his post, exclaimed—"Miss Goddard," where is the music?" "I have no music," was the reply. "Then do I not conduct"—retorted the great musician—"until you have found it." And as good as his word, Molique postponed the rehearsal of the concerto in favor of something else.

As a matter of plain justice, no artist who takes part in a concerted piece of music has a right to dispense with the printed notes, inasmuch, as, should memory fail him, he brings his associates equally into trouble, and the fault is as likely to be charged upon them as upon him. Exceptions may be made on behalf of a virtuoso who brings forward his own composition, and, again, of players (and there are many such) who, throughout their career have at the most four or five pieces in their heads and in their fingers. It was only the other day that an artist no less experienced and ready than Mr. Hallé made a slip in the first movement of Beethoven's G major concerto, which he has for years been in the habit of executing publicly without the notes before him. But who is infallible? The critic who would take umbrage at such a mere accident in the midst of so generally finished a performance as that of Mr. Hallé must be a churl at the best.

In all this argument we take no account of such exceptional phenomena as Joachim, Liszt, and two or three others. And yet we remember Joachim once played a wrong note, in the slow movement of Mendelssohn's E flat quartet (No. 3, Op. 44), being absorbed and having his eyes off the book, and at another concert coming in half a bar too soon in the scherzo of the same composer's D minor trio, for a similar reason. As for Liszt, we have heard him make more false notes than we can count; while on one occasion, with the cool effrontery of a self-satisfied man of genius, he absolutely undertook to read Mendelssohn's concerto in D minor a prima vista, at the Leipsic Gewandhaus Concerts, succeeding so well that the composer was observed abruptly to leave the room in the middle of the first movement. Herr Rubinstein almost invariably plays without book, and with what result we need scarcely remind anybody who has ears sufficiently acute to detect false notes from true.

Music in Philadelphia.

THE SEASON OF 1868 AND 1869.

In looking over the record of the music given in this city the past season, we feel that we have a right to claim for it a very creditable degree of prosperity and success.

We certainly need not be ashamed of the character of the music given. All that has been performed by our resident musicians is not only good, but first-class. In reward, the old societies are more firmly established in public favor, and exhibit a healthful degree of vigor, promising well for the future. Our Chamber music has been unusually good, and we have had the usual amount of "variations by the performer," and "Ah, mon fils" and "Robert, toi que j'aime" from visiting musicians. The Opera has been well attended, some of the weekly concerts crowded at every performance. The constant rehearsing together of the Orchestras has not been without its effect in a much more satisfactory method of performance, although there is certainly still a great work to do before they bring themselves up to the ideal of orchestral perfection.

One of the most important events of the season was the establishment of the "Philharmonic Society," comprising a membership of sixty nominally active members, under Wm. G. Dietrich, as conductor. The importance of this society is to be estimated, not by what they have done, but what they have in their power to do. Such a consolidation of the best talent in the city, animated by true artistic purpose, and making the highest development of their art their first object, regarding the promotion of their individual interests as subservient, although involved, cannot fail to exercise a controlling influence over the future of music and musicians in our city.

This season they have given twelve public rehearsals at Horticultural Hall, and four concerts at the Academy of Music. Their programmes have comprised the following symphonies:

Beethoven, No. 7, A major.
Mendelssohn, "Scotch" Symphony.
Beethoven's "Pastorale."
Mozart's No. 3, E flat major.

In addition, they have had several concertos performed by prominent artists.

FOR PIANO.

Chopin, op. 21, F minor.....C. H. Jarvis.
Beethoven, op. 78, F flat major.....Carl Wolfsohn.
Chopin, op. 11, E minor.....S. B. Mills.
Von Weber, op. 78, F major.....Alida Topp.

FOR VIOLIN.

Mendelssohn, op. 64, E minor.....Camilla Urso.

FOR VIOLONCELLO.

Goltermann, A minor.....R. Hennig.

In the last two concerts they have also had the assistance of the "Young Männerchor Society."

One of the principal successes of the season was achieved by the Orchestra of Messrs. Sentz and Hassler, who have always drawn full and very often crowded houses. They have given twenty-nine of their series of thirty concerts; the last is to be given May 8. These have all been marked by the production of first-class orchestral music, with a judicious selection of novelties and of solo performances. In all, they have given twelve different symphonies, performing:

Beethoven's No. 1, C major, four times.
Beethoven's No. 6, "Pastorale," twice.
Beethoven's No. 8, F major, twice.
Mozart's "Jupiter," three times.
Mozart's No. 5, D major, twice.
Mozart's No. 2, G minor, once.
Mozart's No. 3, E flat major, once.
Haydn's "Surprise," three times.
Haydn's No. 2, D major, twice.
Romberg's "Children's Symphony," twice.
Mendelssohn's "Reformation," three times.
Schubert's "Unfinished," four times.

The last concert is to be distinguished by the fifth performance of the "Unfinished Symphony."

The "Germania Orchestra," under the leadership of W. G. Dietrich, have confined themselves to their standard programmes, consisting of overtures—good if not new—movements from symphonies, operatic selections, waltzes and occasional solos, by members of the Orchestra. The season closed April 28, with a stronger programme, and, consequently, better house than usual, no small attraction being Beethoven's Concerto, in G, op. 58, for piano, played by Charles H. Jarvis. Their performances have been given this year at Horticultural Hall, Wednesday afternoons.

The Handel and Haydn Society have given their regular series of three concerts, performing Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Mozart's "Twelfth Mass," and Rossini's "Moses in Egypt."

The Mendelssohn Society, Jean Louis conductor, have also given three concerts, with good programmes of miscellaneous music.

We have not before us the single programmes of Mr. Jarvis's six concerts, given at Natatorium Hall, but, if we are not mistaken, he made but few alterations in the one published for the whole series. According to this he gave trios by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart and Schubert, a quartet and quintet by Schumann, duets for piano and violoncello by Beethoven and Mendelssohn, and one for piano and violin by Beethoven. Added to these were solos for piano, violin and violoncello from Beethoven, Chopin, Schumann, Liszt, Henselt, Hummel, Viotti, David, Spohr, Bach, Hauser, Schubert, Goltermann, Franchomme, Bazzini, Linder and Molique. Associated with Mr. Jarvis were the artists G. Gubelmann and R. Hennig.

The distinctive feature of Carl Wolfsohn's concerts was music from what is very inexpressively called the "Romantic school." He was admirably assisted in the production of his programmes by Edouard Colonne and Rudolph Hennig, performing trios by Beethoven, Burgiel, Mendelssohn, Schubert, and Schumann; duets for piano and violin by Beethoven, Schumann, Raff, and Rubinstein; for piano and violoncello by Beethoven and Mendelssohn; piano solos from Beethoven, Schubert, Liszt, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Schumann and Wolfsohn; for the violin, by Beriot, Viotti, Robenechts, and Vieuxtemps; for the violoncello, by Bazzini, Goltermann, Raff, Molique, Schumann, Wolfsohn, and Offenbach.

Series of concerts were also given by the West Philadelphia Choral Society, Carl Gaertner, Miss Jackson and the Conservatory of Music, as well as a number of miscellaneous ones by Mme. Parepa-Rosa, Miss Kellogg and Miss Topp, Ole Bull, Blind Tom, Mr. Kennedy, the Young Männerchor, Miss McCaffrey, Miss Markstein, the Misses Durang, Mme. Schimpf, Mr. Harkins, Mr. Hietz, Mr. Tiedemann, the Hess Children, and others.

In Opera we have had seven seasons: one of Max Maretzek's Italian and German troupe, one of the "Kellogg," two of English, three of French, the Fisk and the Grau troupes, each giving a season. Miss Susan Gilton has had her little performances, and several amateur companies have also had theirs.

In the following analysis of the music performed, several societies whose programmes seem to be lost to all historical uses are unrepresented. Nor do we give but one or two of the operas, as every one knows the good old repertoire, and it would occupy more space than we could spare:

MOZART.

Symphonies.. No. 2, G minor, once.
No. 3, K flat, twice.
No. 5, D major, twice.
The Jupiter, 3 times.

Les Diamants de la Couronne.
La Sirene.
Le Part du Diable.
Masanillo.
Zanetta.
La Lac des Fees.

ADAM.

A Queen for a Day.
Le Roi d'Yvetot.

MEYERBEER.

Struensee Overture.
Dinorah.

WALLACE.

Loreley Overture.

KALIWODA.

Concert Overture.
Op. 44.

In addition to these overtures was given that of Boieldieu to "La Dame Blanche," Flotow's Ruhezahl and Stradella, Mehul's Joseph, Halevy's "Le Val d'Audorre," Offenbach's "Orpheus aux Enfers," Spohr's Macbeth, Litolff's Rubespierre, Verdi's Sicilian Vespers, Bennett's Najaden, Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," Berlioz's Fraux Juges, Harold's Zampa, Hohnstock's "Fest," and many others.

As we before stated, this list does not do complete justice to the music given, but it does comprise the most important and really representative programmes of the season, and will furnish an idea of what our musicians have done this past season.—Philad. Morning Post, May 7.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Call her back, and kiss her. C. Minasi. 30
Very sweet semi-comic song, with good chorus.
There's nothing like a fresh'ning breeze. C to f. Randegger. 35
Fine, fresh, sea-breezy song for Bass or Alto. Sang with great success by Mr. W. Whitney.
Passing away into sunlight. 3. G to e. Smith. 30 Beautiful sentiment and pretty chorus.
Te'l rammentti. Dost thou remember. Duet. 3. Campana. 40
F to f. A very fine duet, with Italian and English words.
The Last Greeting. 4. Gb to g. E. Pitt. 30
Affecting tribute to the memory of Nelly Moore.
Where is my Nancy? Hunt. 35
Very good. Nancy was not at church where the bridegroom awaited her, which naturally suggested the above inquiry.
Am I remembered in Erin. 2. F to f. M. Govrly. 30
Words by D'Arcy M'Gee, and is a taking Irish song.
A day too late. 3. Bb to e. Hersee. 30
Very instructive to those who are too slow in love matters.
In thy Beauty. Mi Guarda. 4. Db to f. Gordigiani. 40
Expressive of deep emotion, and very melodious.
There's no one there. 2. F to e. Grand. 30
Answer to "Who's that tapping at the gate." Capital music, and pretty ballad.
Are the Children at Home. 3. Eb to e. Gabriel. 30 Beautiful. An old couple waiting and wishing to go home to the children who have "passed on before."
Ocean, thou Mighty Monster. 5. Eb to a or c. "Oberon." 75
Magnificent scene from Oberon, and, by substituting lower notes for two or three of the highest ones, it is not out of the reach of a common singer.
Why delay? 2. Eb to e. J. P. Knight. 30
A very earnest and very musical remonstrance with a young lady, who would not "name the happy day."
All among the Summer Roses. 2. G to g. Gabriel. 40
Pleasing ballad.
Yes, I'll meet thee, dearest. 2. D to a. Blamphin. 30
Very appropriate answer to "I'll meet thee in the lane."
I am waiting for you, Nell. Song and Chorus. Porter. 35
Nell was worth waiting for, and it was fortunate that such a good song could charm the moments of delay.

Instrumental.

- Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," (Hymn of Praise). 4. Paraphrased by Sydney Smith. 75
Magnificent music, and well arranged.
Royal Greek March. 2. C. Glover. 40
Simple and pretty. Something in the style of the "Spanish Retreat."
Farewell, we meet again. "Girlish Dreams." 3. Jungman. 30
Does he think of me? " 3. " 30
Sweet "Girlish Dreams," in fine taste.
Potpourri. "Lucrezia Borgia." Wds. 75

Edward Devrient's Recollections of Mendelssohn.

IV.

"THE SON AND STRANGER."

Meanwhile (during M.'s visit to England, summer of 1859) we (the Devrients) had taken lodgings in the garden building attached to the Mendelssohn house, next to the drawing room. Hensel, who had returned from Italy and married Fanny Mendelssohn that autumn, occupied the rooms beyond the drawing room. So Felix, to his great joy, when he came home in November, found us quite domesticated. He was still somewhat nervously affected, kept his chamber, and had to submit himself for some time longer to medical treatment.

He had now to set to work in earnest with the instrumentation of the operetta (Liederspiel, vau-deville) which he had brought with him; while Fanny took in hand the composition of a little festival play, written by Hensel, rehearsing the music with us at the piano. It gave us the greatest delight, and the genuine dramatic calling of the composer rang to me in every note.

The characters in the operetta were mainly cast among the members of the family: Fanny took that of the wife of the Mayor; Hensel was the Mayor; Rebecca, Lisbeth; and I, the pedlar Kauz. We were furthermore so fortunate as to gain the student Mantius, whose small but very beautiful tenor voice excelled in Berlin social parties, for the Hermann; he quietly saw his own account in it as a possible stepping stone to the theatre, and was therefore full of zeal. For the utterly unmusical Hensel, Felix had contrived the joke of setting his part in a Trio upon a single note, but we had all sorts of difficulty and of fun in giving him the pitch. As it was too early to turn the old people out of their saloon, in which the piece was to be represented, the theatrical rehearsals had to be made partly in Hensel's, partly in our rooms, upon the flat chamber floor; but it was carried through, with much bother of directorship for me, and with all the enjoyment and the laughter which amateur comedy brings with it, and in which Felix always went beyond us all. Stage-building, decoration and orchestral arrangement had to be ingeniously managed within narrow limits.

At last the full rehearsals on the stage, with orchestra, were successfully got through with, lighting and costumes provided for, and all seemed to go on swimmingly, when a sudden hindrance interposed: I was commanded to a concert at the Crown Prince's on the evening of our festival! These concerts usually began late and lasted through the supper; indeed right after supper the Crown Prince was in the habit of calling on me for German songs. This made it impossible for me to take part in the Liederspiel, and so the festival seemed likely to be defeated; and that too on the evening before, when everything was thoroughly prepared and all the guests invited.

Felix received this Job's post with consternation, and with a chagrin amounting almost to anger. Unaccustomed to seeing himself crossed in his undertakings, he entirely lost, in his perplexity, his usual consideration for the position of others. He wanted me to get myself released from the court concert, which he thought really was no part of my duty, &c., &c. In short, the performance of the operetta seemed to him for the time being the absolutely most important matter in the world. I tried to console him by suggesting, that I would make the attempt to induce the General-Intendent to let me off earlier than usual from the concert; and, if that were not practicable, that then, after the performance of Fanny's little play, they should delay the Operetta—perhaps till after supper—until I came back from the palace. That seemed to him an interruption and confusion of the whole festival, and his excitement grew upon him so that in the evening, in the family circle, he began to talk wildly, spoke English incessantly, till all about him were in a state of terror. The decided tone of the father finally arrested the wild stream of talk, they got him off to bed, and a twelve hours' sound sleep restored him to his normal condition.

On the 22nd of December the "Silver Wedding" was joyfully celebrated on the part of a great circle of friends; to be sure, the anxiety as to how the evening would pass off was a damper on the pleasure of the children; but in the end all turned out well. Count von Redern in a friendly manner furthered my desire and, actually upon his own responsibility, shortened my function in the court concert, so that I came home right after the little play, and the operetta could follow it immediately, according to the original design. It went correctly and with spirit, in the fresh, free humor of the day, until it came to Hensel's part in the Trio, where of course he did not hit the tone again, although it was breathed and whispered to him on all sides. For Felix that was perhaps the greatest pleasure of the evening; he had to bend down over the score to hide his laughter.

The performance made a great sensation in society, not only through the charm of the melodies, their thoughtful and sincere expression, but still more through the humor and the characteristic treatment of the persons and the situations, through the live dramatic progress of the action at the same time with the freshest musical beauty. This new proof of Felix's prominent dramatic talent struck people universally.

They urged him to allow a public performance of the operetta; his mother especially clung to the wish long and earnestly. Felix, out of filial piety in the first place, was quite averse to letting the work, which he had conceived purely for the family festival so sacred to him, become a prey to publicity. There was so much in the music which he had meant altogether personally. When I spoke of the beauty of the theme with which the Overture begins, he said: that was his act of homage, of reverence, with which he came before his parents and handed them his work. He did not wish the sincerity of this expression to go beyond the intimate circle. Then he had written the violoncello solo, in the song No. 3, for his brother; and the passage on one tone for his brother-in-law; the compass of voice, which he had given to the part of Kauz, was a bit of private raillery with me:—all this he was unwilling to have brought before a public who might misunderstand it. He dwelt particularly on the objection, that the composition was not at all adapted to the great space of a theatre, and that the orchestral parts especially, being only calculated for a parlor, would have to be entirely recast. To this I added, that the poem, in its loose connection, with its lack of much exciting interest, was not capable of enchaining a spoiled public. Moreover I held that it would be exceedingly unwise to follow up the failure of "Camaracho's Wedding" with this tender little work.

And so the Liederspiel was not performed again in Felix's lifetime; after his death it could not be prevented; and moreover I could lend a hand to it, to make the poem better adapted to the stage; and if Felix could do nothing more for his orchestra, we have not missed it.

Music in Austria.—Liszt's "St. Elizabeth."

(Correspondence of the London "Daily Telegraph.")

The last great event of the Vienna musical season for 1868-9 came off yesterday at the Imperial Redouten Saal, in the presence of such an audience as it would be difficult to gather together in any other European capital. Even London, with five times Vienna's population, would, I imagine, be put to sore straits were it called upon to assemble in a public concert-room between two and three thousand persons of both sexes, amongst whom scarcely a dozen outsiders, so far as music is concerned, are to be detected, and of whom more than two-thirds are professional musicians, composers, executants, or critics. The last rehearsal of the important work performed on this occasion by the "Society of the Friends of Music," which I attended, and to which the inner circle of our musical world was invited by special ticket, presented a spectacle at once remarkable and gladdening to the heart of a true philharmonic. Besides the powerful orchestra and chorus, in all some four hundred strong, there were at least seven hundred ladies and gentlemen distributed over the galleries and body of the hall when I entered it, eagerly waiting for the first wave of Herbeck's baton. I may safely assert that they were all, sans exception, sisters and brethren of the craft. Threading his way restlessly backwards and forwards in and out amongst the thronged benches, upon each of which he found some musical acquaintance anxious to press his hand, was to be seen a tall, spare figure, clad in priestly garments and bareheaded—the hero of the day, now a meek and pious servant of Holy Mother Church, once the wildest of enthusiasts in "life," the adored of princesses, countesses, and duchesses, with a head, they say, that would have matched Horne Took in the capacity for after-dinner victories. These long, nervous, eager fingers that used to sweep the keys with a tempest of chords, and wrest forth handfuls of harmonies from the vibrating strings, are now-a-days—at least, so says holy report—chiefly occupied in telling rosaries and turning over the leaves of Church breviaries; that wild, eccentric genius that was wont to sport with the gravest theories and to astound the world with surely the strangest freaks that ever tone-poet indulged in, has bowed itself humbly before a solemn and pedantic corporation, consenting to wear the fetters of a code, and to devote his pinioned powers to the illustration of one single conventional subject. Bondage, of whatever kind, is sure to tell fatally upon inspiration. I have heard the two grand masses which constitute the chief compositions of the Abbé Liszt since his assumption of holy orders, and must unwillingly confess them to be dull, labored, and arid productions, relieved but rarely by a flash of the old fire that used to sparkle from every feature and joint of the master's creations. Moreover, loss of liberty has beaten down the fierce spirit of the great Hungarian, and induced him to undergo the humiliation of plagiarism, or at least of imitation. He has shrouded the beauties of his fitful genius in the dark and gloomy mantle of Wagnerism—whole pages of his later works are mere paraphrases of Lohengrin, Tristan und Isolde, and the Flying Dutchman. No one could recognize the genial author of the "Transcriptions" in the mournful mysticist who penned the Hungarian Coronation Mass, or St. Elizabeth. There is little more of common between the Liszt of former days and the Reverend Father Francis than there is between Ariel and a hooded familiar of the Holy Inquisition. Where is all the airy lightness of manner, the dainty fretwork of ornamentation, delight of the ear and despair of the fingers, the magical modulations that glowed like an aurora borealis of sound over his exuberant effusions; where the elfish and yet touching fragments of melody that were ever strewn with no stinting hand over the wildest wastes of his musical dreamland? All vanished and gone—replaced by a system of enharmonic self-maceration, by a torture-chamber full of musical racks and thumb-screws, by a method of jolting, painful, and unnatural transitions that wound the senses and distress the reason of those to whom they are imparted. All color and tenderness, curve and suavity, fled forever; nothing remaining but the crooked, deformed skeleton of sound—the dainty flowers and burnished leaves quite withered up and dead, and the gnarled, sapless branches creaking grimly and inharmoniously. No longer the lighthearted "czikos" sporting on the broad green "Puszta," rejoicing in the birds, the blossoms, the fresh, free wind cooled by the Carpathian snows, but a rheumatic grave-digger, sorting a heap of decaying bones in a dismal churchyard, by the pale light of a lantern. Such are the impressions left upon even his fervent admirers by Liszt's recent compositions, of which, undoubtedly, St. Elizabeth is the most important in dimensions as well as design.

Die heilige Elizabeth, or St. Elizabeth, is neither an opera, an oratorio, nor a cantata, but a mixture of all three. It might, perhaps, be more fitly called a miracle set to music; for the point upon which the whole signification of its plot turns is the celebrated conversion by special Divine interposition of a pannier full of eatables and drinkables into a basketful of roses, in order to redeem Elizabeth's word, or, in fact to save her from being detected by her husband in a falsehood. The tradition is pretty enough, although the moral which it conveys is, to say the least of it, somewhat shady—e.g., "Be good, virtuous, charitable, and regular in your devotions; and some day, when it suits your purpose to tell a lie, heaven will step in with a miracle to get you out of your scrape by proving that you told the truth." Thus runs the story.

Elizabeth, daughter of King Andrew II. of Hungary, married Louis, Landgraf of Thüringen, and by him had two children. She was a very pious and amiable person, earnestly given to doing good by stealth, and the most eminent cottage visitant of her period. Her husband was a Prince of the good old middle-aged pattern, reasonably fond of his wife, more so of his flagon, and immoderately so of his hawks, hounds, and all other accessories of the chase. One day, as the Landgräfin was dragging a heavy hamper, filled with good things, from the Wartburg pantry, up the side of a hill near her castle, she was suddenly encountered by her husband, who happened to be following the roe in that direction, and who, having for some time entertained the suspicion that her frequent solitary excursions were made for no good purpose, asked her whither she was going and what she had got in the big basket that she vainly endeavored to conceal from him. Terrified lest he might disapprove her for disposing of his property in a furtive manner, she replied that she had been gathering roses by the way-side, and had strayed beyond the usual limits of her daily walk—moreover, that her basket contained the roses she had plucked, and nothing more. Upon this, the Landgraf reproved her for making such a fuss about a few trumpery flowers, and asked to see the roses. She fell at his feet, imploring pardon for the deception she had tried to practise upon him, and confessed that she had viands for a poor sick man in the basket, but had been afraid to confess her pious pillage of the larder. "See!" said she, lifting the white cloth she had cast over the comestibles; and lo! the basket was full of freshly-plucked roses, whilst, at the same moment, a small glory or auréole descended from the skies, and lighted on her brow. "Roses!"

exclaimed the Landgraf; "roses, after all! why, then, you must be a saint, and I must give up the fallacious joys of field-sports for some other recreation more suitable to the husband of so remarkable a personage!" No sooner said than done; in those days, from slaying partridges to slaughtering Paynims was an easy step, and one highly respectable to boot—so Lord Louis started forthwith for the Crusades, maugre the entreaties of his saintly lady, who was enabled, in virtue of her newly acquired powers, to foresee confidently that he would never return from the Holy Land. Nor did he; for some months after his departure came the news that the "turbaned Turk" had been too many for him, and that he had succumbed to the scimitar without having had time to make any testamentary dispositions whatever. The laws of succession must have been in a pretty state about that time, for, on learning the sad intelligence of her son's death, the old Landgräfin, Sophia, who, not being a pious person herself, and therefore wholly incapable of performing miracles, had always hated her daughter-in-law for her goodness and her "gift," incontinently turned St. Elizabeth and her two children out of the Wartburg, in as nasty a night—judging from Liszt's music, at least—as could have been selected for so cruel a proceeding by the hardest of hearts. The seneschal, a good-natured, weak-minded tool of the old lady, ventures to say a word or two in mitigation of the stern sentence, but is promptly sent to the rightabout with such vigor that he subsides into obedience, and thrusts Elizabeth out of the castle gates. She takes refuge in a lonely mountain hut, where she continues for some time to perform more miracles, and ultimately, her children having been taken away from her to be brought up in a manner befitting their birth, dies, lamented by all the poor of the neighborhood and a special choir of angels, detached from the celestial host for that purpose. Presently, Frederick II. of Hohenstaufen, Emperor of the German and Holy Roman Empire, sends for her body, which he, in the presence of all his lords and palatines, buries solemnly with great pomp and ceremony.

This story, clumsily and harshly told in halting verse by Otto Roquette, has Franz Liszt overlaid with the grimmest musical garments ever worn by simple legend. In the introductory episode, the betrothal of Elizabeth, he gives a song to a Hungarian magnate, who accompanies the youthful princess to her new home, and consigns her to the arms of her bridegroom—a song that might appropriately be christened "the stomach-ache of sound." This unfortunate magnate is made to utter sentiments of the most pleasing and congratulatory nature in strains that are even physically painful. Each complimentary phrase commences with a contortion and finishes in a groan, varied by a yell. Close upon the heels of this tortured melody, comes a chorus of children offering flowers and playthings to the baby bride. Were it not for the words, "Fröhliche Spiele, sannen wir uns, bringen Dir viele Blumen zum Strauss," &c., you would fancy you heard the vociferations of a band of imps at play with red-hot coals, sulphur marbles, miniature pitchforks, and other such devilish toys; whilst every now and then Cerberus barks with delight at their ghastly gambols.

The second part opens with a stirring hunting song, one of the best numbers in the whole Mystery. It is not particularly original or melodious, for that matter—but it is fresh, sylvan, and admirably scored for the orchestra—the voice playing quite a subordinate part (à la Wagner) to the instruments. French horns, ophicleids, and trombones, have here a brilliant opportunity of distinguishing themselves, and are so admirably sustained and thrown into relief by the strings that the effect of the ensemble is exceedingly agreeable to the ear. Then follows the meeting on the hillside, and the conversation between the suspicious husband and the charitable wife, culminating in the miracle. The whole of this episode reminds one vividly of the colloquy taking place between Knight Walter and Eva Pogner in the first act of the Meistersinger. Nothing can be more dry and labored, or less emotional, not to say natural. The Landgraf's astonishment upon discovering that the remains of his dinner have been changed into roses, is expressed in much the sort of musical phrase that might be uttered by a fâneur if he trod upon a toad, or by a bon vivant detecting a spider in his soup. A chorus, which happens to be at hand, why or how nobody knows, expatiates upon the miracle just achieved in a manner sufficiently unpleasant, one would think, thoroughly to disgust St. Elizabeth with her feat, and to make her vow that she would never do so any more, if such are the musical results accruing from her magical performances.

The third part, although defaced by sadly tedious recitatives, emanating from the Landgraf—turned Crusader—and his distressed consort, is undoubtedly the most powerful and striking composition of the whole work, by reason of a bright and passionate choral motivo with which it commences, concludes, and is flavored throughout. This motivo strongly resembles the phrase with which Mendelssohn opened his Lohengrin, to be used afterwards as the leading subject of the chorus, "All that have life and breath, praise ye the Lord!" and the trombones are employed for its introduction by Liszt, as they were by the great Felix in his symphony to the Hymn of Praise; but it is nobly worked out by the voices, and the orchestration is something so rich and complete as to be only comparable, for grandeur of conception and exquisite finish of detail, to poor Hector Berlioz's arrangement of the "Rakoczy" march, probably the finest development of a full orchestra's resources extant. The refrain, "Gott will es!" (God wills it) occurring at the end of every stanza, is put into soul-stirring notes, and vociferated with a devotional emphasis in the highest degree impressive. I cannot but think that Liszt has committed an error in aesthetics by not limiting the execution of this chorus to male voices. The men engaged in the Crusade would naturally be full of religious enthusiasm and warlike aspirations; but the women would be likely to be lamenting the departure on so perilous an adventure of their husbands, brothers, and lovers. To make women loudly exclaim a sentence like the following.

Es folge, was, wer sein Christenbrot is, to say the least of it, to perpetrate an anachronism.
Im heil'gen Krieg zu weh'n begehrt!

The following episode (No. 4), in which Elizabeth, the old Landgräfin, and the well-meaning but feeble seneschal, are engaged, is, without exception, the most dreary piece of business I have listened to, excelling far in hideousness Berlioz's music to Pierre, Wagner's street row in the Meistersinger, Brahms's Chamber Music, or any and every tone-abomination with which we have been afflicted during the last twenty years. True, the storm rages as though Hell were let loose outside the castle walls, and the Landgräfin's utterances are as full of venom as Medusa's; but not a single feature of beauty or grandeur redeems the utter ugliness of the whole part. The seneschal crows, the Countess screams, and St. Elizabeth whimpers like a beaten school-boy; while all the time there is the very devil to pay in the orchestra. It is a lengthy part, too—linked bitterness long drawn out. I pray that I may never be condemned to hear it again.

Number 5 describes the Euthanasia of St. Elizabeth, dying in her sordid hut, but surrounded by a grateful and worshipping crowd of the poor whose sufferings she has relieved. It contains one or two meritorious chorales, and a movement—supposed to be performed by angels—which is, unfortunately, irresistibly provocative of laughter, for it has evidently been taken from the four chords emitted by the double-mouth harmonica, a child's toy, generally arranged to produce, when blown, the full harmonies of the tonic and subdominant chords in two keys. This curious and naïve sequence of sounds has been adopted by the Abbé Liszt as the subject of his celestial movement; and his treatment of it consists in dragging it ad nauseam through all the keys of the gamut. Elizabeth's solos are replete with melancholy of the unhealthy sort, and fatigue the ear with incessant enharmonic transitions, too startling to be in the least gratifying. At length she dies, and while regretting her misfortunes, one cannot help feeling that it is for the best, as well for herself as for the audience, that she should be at rest and sing no more. This feeling has evidently been shared by the composer; for, in Number 6, devoted to her gorgeous interment, he introduces a funeral march far more jocund and cheerful than anything we have yet heard throughout the work, although the betrothal act should have suggested joyous strains. It may, perhaps, be said to be the most astounding feature of this extraordinary composition that the wedding music is perfectly suitable to a funeral, and that the "Dirge," "March," &c., illustrative of the burial ceremony would have made up a very tidy Epithalamium. Assuredly, Liszt must have felt heartily relieved when he had finally disposed of his heroine, and, unable to restrain the expression of his satisfaction, broke out in semi-lively measures—deadly lively, I ought, perhaps, to say.

As to the execution of the whole work—occupying nearly three hours!—by soloists, band, and chorus, I can only speak in terms of unreserved praise. Although but two rehearsals had taken place before the "grande répétition" to which I was invited, scarcely a hitch occurred during the whole performance: and Liszt confessed himself both surprised and delighted at the masterly rendering of his most difficult composition. Even to such a magnificent matériel, swayed by so accomplished a leader as Herbeck, St. Eliza- both presented a terrible enigma for solution; and what human intelligence, aided by the highest class of executive ability, could achieve was achieved by the "Society of Musikfreunde." But I feel convinced that, despite all this best of musical bodies, or any other in Europe, can effect in the way of thoughtful interpretation, Liszt's oratorio-cantata will remain to the majority of mankind what it was to Saturday and Sunday's audiences—a mystery, not worth the trouble of unravelling.

Vienna, April 5th.

A Jew Across Wagner.

To the Editor of the "Musical World" (London).

SIR,—Those German critics who have had sense enough to oppose the mischievous career of Herr R. Wagner, have committed, all along, one great error, viz., that of treating that egregious boaster and pretender with far too much lenity, and giving him far too much serious attention, whereas they ought to have known that he was in reality quite undeserving of any grave criticism and might be "very easily disposed of," as Sam Weller says—i.e., dismissed with a few words of derision. I will therefore endeavor not to fall into a similar mistake, although it is now less easy to be brief than it would have been before the evil had gathered strength.

Wagner's Tannhäuser has been hissed and derided by the Parisian public. A book or a picture, says Mr. Lewis (in that pretty novel of his, Ranthorpe) is said to be condemned or blamed, but a play or an opera is emphatically said to be "damned." Very true, and Tannhäuser has been most emphatically damned in Paris—i.e., by an audience fully and indisputably competent to judge of the merits of any operatic work. I feel myself justified in asserting that since the time when the Parisians enabled Gluck to triumph over Lulli, Rameau, and Piccini, they have never done the great cause of Art a more brilliant and lasting service than in "settling the hash" of Mr. Richard Wagner. To be sure, they did not stand upon overmuch ceremony in doing so, and Mr. Wagner may with some small show of justice exclaim:

"Perhaps it was right to dissemble your love,
But why did you kick me down stairs?"

—to which we would make bold to reply:—"Because, my dear sir, you deserved it, and moreover you know that as well as we do, which is the worst of your derelictions."

Wagner, Mr. Editor, is just as well aware as you or I that he is not only no musical genius, but not even a musical talent. I have the honor of knowing Mr. R. Wagner, and am therefore qualified to assert that he is not what is generally called "a musical man"—i.e., possessed of a fine ear and fine taste for music. His ear is imperfect; he could never succeed in learning to play even tolerably well upon any instrument. I therefore say that he is unmusical. His knowledge of harmony is extremely limited and defective, and he has little or no feeling for the charms of melody and musical rhythm. He is in fact an unmusical man—"the gods have not made him poetical," or musical either. The composer of "Jim Crow" has (or had) a more correct idea of melody than Herr Wagner. And yet Herr W. has a sort of inward persuasion that a distinct melody now and then is a sine qua non in an opera; therefore, being utterly incapable of imagining one himself, he took like many a man whose purse is empty to borrowing. I will here only mention one glaring instance of this, viz., the principal melodic theme of the March in Tannhäuser.

with which we need only compare the concluding stretto of Weber's overture to Der Freischütz to expose the barefaced theft:—

This is not the kind of musical thought which would be likely to occur to two men at the same time, and, as it happens, it occurred to Weber first! Take away this passage (which is repeatedly brought forward in the march) and there remains nothing but a most harmless arrangement of commonplaces, although the general style, construction, and instrumentation of the whole piece is grossly imitated from Spontini and Meyerbeer. As for the song (in the third act) about the evening star, it may not be out of place to observe that it has the peculiarity of being in no key at all; it is, I believe, intended to be in G major, but is in fact, from beginning to end, in G minor, B flat, and D flat major. The absurdity of such modulation in a little song is too obvious to need comment; equally so the poverty of the composer's fancy, who could produce no effect at all but by such extravagant means and unnatural harmonization.

But why enumerate all these striking beauties and excellences? It were pity of your good paper, Mr. Editor, to cover it with anything like detailed criticisms upon such a monstrous piece of imposture and imbecility as Tannhäuser. Let me only remark that this opera, which so delighted the refined Parisians, is beyond all comparison Wagner's best; his Rienzi is a perfect incubus, a noisy "blatant beast;" more by token, after the rehearsal of it at Dresden, the horn and trumpet players generally left the orchestra with bloody lips! His Flying Dutchman is just as abominable; some Italians, staying at Wiesbaden, went to hear it, and when the overture was ended I overheard one of them say to the others, "When will this confounded (maledetta) tuning of the instruments be over?" His Lohengrin has a certain passage in it where four trumpets have to play fortissimo the following delicious harmony:— which so painfully affected the ear and mind of a gentleman at Hamburg that when he left the theatre he was seized with a brain fever, and his life was long despaired of. Such is the genial and exhilarating effect of Herr Wagner's music, as it is facetiously termed in Germany.

And now, Sir, permit me to explain to your readers, as briefly as possible, how it came to pass that Herr Wagner attained a high degree of celebrity in his native country. The Germans invariably prefer the obscure and involved to the transparent and simple. Upon his ultimate knowledge of this fact Herr W. went to work, secure of success. He wrote countless articles in newspapers and magazines; he wrote pamphlets, and treatises, and "elucidations," and essays—all upon the inexhaustible and refreshing subject of his own music. This mode of attack was, of course, successful with the more gullible and ignorant portion of the public. But his main battery was concealed—Herr Wagner is brother-in-law to the wealthy and influential bookseller, Brockhaus of Leipzig, who is proprietor and publisher of eight newspapers, all of which were pressed into the service. Yet even this was not sufficient; Herr W. suddenly turned Republican (though living on the bounty and liberality of the late amiable King of Saxony), and was a prime mover in the tragical revolution at Dresden in May 1849. By this means (at once honorable and artistic!) he secured the friendship and favor of the entire revolutionary party in Germany, which, though compelled to hide its operations, is still flourishing and powerful. Then came, to adjust Herr Wagner's manoeuvres, the very natural and very ardent wish of the Germans to possess another great musical hero, the last of that race, which had given them so fair a claim to boast, having apparently (as far as the younger generation is concerned) died with Mendelssohn. They saw little could be made of poor Schumann, whose talent was very equivocal[?] and was soon clouded over altogether, and so they took to crowning Mr. Richard Wagner, upon whose head the laurel wreath sate about as well as a diadem would have suited Mr. Swiveller's "Marchioness" when she was "airing her eye at the keyhole."

Herr Wagner and his comrades hit upon a cleverish trick to aid their plans, viz., the invention of a new generic appellation, Zukunftsmusiker—i.e., Musicians of the Future! This was a capital "cry," and succeeded, for a time, beyond their expectations. It should be premised that Herr Wagner had already announced to the world (in his modest, self-enclosing pamphlets, &c.) that the operas of Mozart, Weber, Rossini, Auber, Meyerbeer, &c., were more "unsuccessful attempts," and that his (Mr. Wagner's) operas had opened a new and magnificent epoch of dramatic music. He was so obliging as to inform us that all rhythmical, flowing, and agreeable melody is not only superfluous but a thing of no value whatever, trivial and vulgar, fit for nothing but to tickle the ears of children and their nurses. Truly, Mr.

Editor, the Germans are a simple, credulous, most amiable people, most primitive and innocent of all suspicion; they positively received this atrocious piece of humbug with low bows and reverential observance, instead of saying as any other civilized nation would have said, "Good Mr. Wagner, good Mr. Renard, the grapes are sour!" Thus encouraged, he went on presenting his gullible compatriots with one piece of fustian and bombast after the other, till at last he reached his climax in the MS. opera, Tristan und Isolde, which Carl Banck, at Dresden, characterized in a very able article, as the final cessation of all music, and the domain of dissonance and tonal hideousness. This classical production was, however, incredible as it must appear, actually put in rehearsal at the Grand-Ducal Theatre at Carlsruhe; the result was that the entire operatic corps unanimously declared it unworthy of representation, and refused to sing or play it. Tristan und Isolde, was accordingly consigned to the lumber-room—to a select audience of spiders and blue-bottle flies, which, doubtless hum and buzz Wagnerian tunes (or would-be tunes) all day long.

Really, Sir, it is difficult to avoid a tone of railery when speaking of this soi-disant composer, who, for a quarter of a century, has carried on a system of intimidation which has no parallel in the annals of art. Yet the matter is no joke, but a most serious and deplorable evil. For even the total rout and defeat of Tannhäuser at Paris will scarcely silence the "New German School," as the Clique is now called, having been too mercilessly ridiculed on the score of their Zukunftsmusik. It is true that Herr Wagner will find it impossible to cajole the director of the Grand Opera into performing another of his monstrous productions, but in Germany the system of puffing has been pursued upon so gigantic a scale that the eyes of the deluded public are not to be opened all at once. When musicians and critics like J. C. Lobe (vide his Treatise on Composition) are bullied into concealing their real opinion of such stuff as Wagner's operas, and only dare to express it in a carefully veiled and guarded form, you may have some idea of the fearful extent to which the disease has spread. The adherents of Wagner, not content with "writing him up" in the most fulsome terms of panegyric, organized so strong and resolute a claque in every theatre where Tannhäuser, &c., were performed, that the true verdict of the audience was completely overpowered and could not be delivered. They went to still greater lengths—they abused, reviled, and personally insulted any who had the courage to speak against Herr Wagner and call his powers in question; take an instance: in 1856, a member of the Ducal orchestra, at Wiesbaden, made bold to express his contempt for Wagner's music, in the foyer of the theatre; Herr Noachim Baff, a sworn functionary of Wagner's (and Liszt's) overheard him, went up to him and called him a stupid blockhead, an ox, an ass, &c., &c., and termed the whole orchestra a set of ignoramuses and blunderers. Whereupon Herr Baff had the honor of receiving a hearty drubbing with an umbrella; the members of the chapelle threatened him with prosecution, and he was fain to sneak away from Wiesbaden like a ducked poodle. This is the sort of way in which Herr Wagner's operas have been forced upon the German public. Herr Franz Liszt also wrote some extravagant brochures in favor of Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, &c., of which he is now, I believe, sincerely ashamed[?]; but it suited Herr Liszt's own plans to cry up Wagner, for the renowned pianist has for some years past been laboring hard to convince the Germans that he is a great composer, and has let loose upon the world a number of Sinfonische Dichtungen, or symphonic poems, all of which would make an excellent programme for a musical festival in Bedlam or St. Luke's, but which, I am happy to say, have been scornfully rejected by the ungrateful German public—witness the late concerts of the Euterpe Society at Leipzig under the direction of Herr Bronsart, a sworn ally of Liszt's, as also a similar series of ignominious defeats at the concerts of Herr Taubert in Vienna. Herr von Bülow, Liszt's son-in-law, has in like manner favored the world with "transcriptions" from Wagner's operas, terrific to listen to. Wagner wrote an overture to Goethe's Faust, which has been performed all over Germany, and been damned all over Germany; yet, his admirers tell us, Herr Wagner is a mighty, a colossal genius, a perfect avalanche of talent! The truth is that he is a "misfortune" for Germany, and has already brought down the once proud and lofty musical fame of that country into the dirt. And the most painful reflection for the Germans is that such miserable pretenders as Wagner, Liszt, and a number of small fry of the same species, could only be produced, and arrive at any, even the slightest distinction, in a period of decadence of art in the country which brought them forth. I cannot but fully agree with Professor Mosevius of Breslau, who in his University lectures declared his conviction that the bright days of German music are gone forever, and that no great German composer can be hoped for in future. This is the fate of nations: Greece and Italy could once boast of possessing the greatest poets, painters, and sculptors, England the most illustrious dramatic poets;—where are they now?" "For, well-a-day! their date is fled."

But, to bring this letter to a conclusion (and I would it had been on a pleasanter subject), let me just add that Wagner prided himself wondrously upon his literary talent in having written the libretti of his operas. Here, too, his flank has been turned; the Parisians have given it as their opinion that the libretto of Tannhäuser is a failure only ten degrees less decided than the music. It is in fact an essentially weak, undramatic fable, little more than a narrative, and little less tedious and monotonous than the music. Still, a good composer, even one of mediocre talent, would have made something more tolerable of it. As to the performances here, I can only say that they were, as usual, excellent; the disgust of the musicians at having to play such poor stuff was indeed now and then apparent in a slight want of their accustomed energy and brilliant execution, but on the whole one could only feel unfeigned compassion for the executants, vocal and instrumental, and give them the highest praise for their patience and good humor under so wearisome and thankless a task. The curtailings and alterations made by Wagner in his score (after the opera has been performed in every theatre in Germany), with the vain hope of appeasing the angry Parisian public, offer a testimonium paupertatis such as never yet came to my knowledge, and is, I believe, unique. The universal judgment of Paris against the opera, and a repetition of it is impossible. Its damnation is a fait accompli. There is but one point on which I can accuse the French of a partial inconsistency—viz., in not having treated the operas of M. Halévy with a nearly equal severity; it is, however, true that the latter have a good deal more melody, though of a sort but little better than Wagner's; and we must, too, consider that Wagner's enormous arrogance and conceit had put the Parisians on their mettle and indisposed them to clemency. As for M. Berlioz, I imagine that even the qualified approbation he has bestowed upon Wagner is merely the result of a kind of fellow-feeling "which makes us wondrous kind." Had not M. Berlioz ventured to produce long symphonies, &c., in which the main faults and defects of Wagner are exemplified, being shapeless, idealess, involved, surcharged with noisy instrumentation, trying to express what the author has not the genius to express—Wagner would scarcely have had the hardihood to produce one of his operas at Paris. I grant that the music of M. Berlioz is superior to Herr Wagner's as far as there is a more and a less in what is essentially bad; but so portentous a mooncalf as the overture to Tannhäuser would never have ventured into daylight without the precedents of M. Berlioz's overtures to the Francs Juges and King Lear, nor would Herr Wagner have risked the performance of his entire opera had he not been emboldened by the lamentable success (though it was no great one) of M. Halévy's Juive, Les Mousquetaires, Guido et Ginèvre, and the like.—I am, Sir, a discountenancer of disordinate dissingenuousness—and

Sir Michael Costa.

(From the "Daily News.")

Our nearest neighbors over the water, whose language is the mint of European thought, have so clamorously and persistently assured the world that the English are "not a musical people," that such is now the almost universal fallacy, and we English ourselves are half disposed to acquiesce in it. Let us frankly own that there is at least a semblance of correctness in the assertion, but it would come with better grace from a nation more musical than the French. What are the facts of the case? In the whole range of musical history there is scarcely to be found an English composer of European reputation: our numerous anthems, and glee and madrigal, and ballad writers hold high rank among the illustrious obscure; but their names are unknown out of these islands, and are very seldom mentioned in the land of their birth. We have had many excellent native instrumentalists, and some few indigenous singers with splendid voices, but their reputation, like their style, has been insular. While forgetting the Royal Academy of Music, we must admit that there has been nothing to be called a great school of music whether vocal or instrumental in the United Kingdom. There are probably as many fine vocal organizations in these islands as anywhere in the world, but little or no serious and systematic cultivation of the art of singing; and with a few very striking exceptions our most popular public performers have exhibited a deplorable vulgarity of style, or more often an utter want of style. On the other hand, England since the accession of the House of Hanover (who have been to the art of music what the House of Stuart were to the art of painting), has really become the adopted country of some of the greatest musicians the world has ever known, and of the grandest musical performances which have marked the progress of the art towards perfection. In the sense of adoption, at any rate, England may be called a musical country since the days of Handel, the works of whose colossal genius are at this day as familiar as nursery ballads among us; while in France the Messiah, Israel in Egypt, Judas Macabæus, &c., are still almost unknown even to the majority of native musicians. Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven were accustomed to speak of the musical public of England with respect. It was but the other day that Mendelssohn was composing his masterpieces for England, and conducting them in person in London and Birmingham. All these immortal Germans of the last century and a half—and to name them is to name the Homer, the Dante, the Shakespeare, the Michael Angelo, and Raphael of Music—had a peculiar sympathy for England, if they did not look to England for what a Parisian would call the "consecration" of their genius. In France, also, if we except the illustrious Auber and his delightful predecessors who wrote for the Opera Comique, the composers of really European reputation have been foreigners. Gluck, Meyerbeer and Rossini have lived in Paris and written for the French public, and the French public have come to regard them as compatriots. What our neighbors have undoubtedly the merit of possessing and the right to call their own is a school of orchestral and vocal music. Thirty years ago there was no orchestra in Europe comparable to that of the French Conservatoire, and there is probably none superior to it now. In England we have made astonishing progress in musical taste and knowledge within the last quarter of a century. Mendelssohn discovered it with generous delight; Hector Berlioz remarked it with rapturous surprise. The large and increasing body of foreign musical professors and executants who have made England their second country, and have had no reason to complain of their choice, bear cheerful witness to the ample, if not always discerning, patronage which the honest British barbarian dispenses with the most unaffected indulgence. Poor Berlioz fancied himself in the seventh heaven when he listened to the children's voices at the Festival in St. Paul's. Yet this was an annual performance, and since then the Handel Festival, which was announced as an almost miraculous combination of disciplined musical forces, has settled down to the rank and dignity of an ordinary triennial celebration. That colossal orchestra and that multitudinous chorus over which Sir Michael Costa presides with all the calm and decisive mastery attributed by painters to his patron saint, are mainly composed of national elements; the orchestra of mixed native or naturalized instrumentalists; the chorus, of English voices pure and unalloyed. Music is becoming more and more every year a manly as well as a womanly accomplishment in this country; it is beginning to be taught in our great public schools. At the Monday Popular Concerts in St. James's Hall, at the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts, so admirably conducted by Mr. Manns (who was once a "Herr," as Sir Michael Costa was a "Signor" before he was a "Mr."), it is most interesting to observe the number of ladies who bring their "score" with them, and follow the performance of a work by Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Schubert, or Schumann, book in hand. No doubt if we descend a little lower in the social scale, we find little to boast of in the popular musical taste. But here we are about on a level with our neighbors, who have naturalized Offenbach, after adopting Gluck, and who worship Mlle. Theresa as a tenth muse.

Among the many eminent musicians who have come to live among us, and who are Englishmen by adoption, none has attained a more deserved distinction, or won deeper and wider respect in his profession, and among the public, than the Italian gentleman upon whom her Majesty was pleased to bestow the honor of knighthood on Wednesday fortnight. His career in this country is a model and example of those qualities which are not always found in company with great talents, but which in all countries and in all careers deserve success, and nowhere more than in this practical country of ours are calculated to command it. How many years ago we know not, Signor Michael Costa arrived in London from Naples in the capacity of a tenor singer, with a pleasing but somewhat small and ineffectual voice. By what process the Neapolitan tenorino became transformed into the chief of the orchestra at Her Majesty's Theatre, and subsequently the director, composer, and conductor at the Royal Italian Opera, and the presiding accompanist of the Court concerts; how the composer of occasional operas and of showy ballet music at the old Operahouse developed into the composer of oratorios of European celebrity, the famous orchestral chief of the Sacred Harmonic Society and the Handel Festivals, would perhaps be as interesting a chapter of biography for the pen of the author of Self-Help, as the story of one of those great captains of labor and industrial capitalists, who started with the proverbial wheelbarrow and half-a-crown.

Rare capacities and extraordinary natural gifts account for much, but not for all. There must have been many obscure and patient years of indefatigable labor and devotion to his art; above all, there must have been rare force of character, rare consistency and integrity of conduct, and that undeviating and unfailing self-respect which is the secret of true dignity of labor and of life, and which compels the esteem of social aristocracies and of the multitude alike. Such force of character is something more and better than that supple genius for intrigue, and that dexterity in "getting on," which so often makes the most marvellous success morally contemptible. Whether the honor which Sir Michael Costa has received at the hands of the Queen will be acknowledged with equal pride and satisfaction by the profession he adorns, we cannot pretend to say. Professional bodies are not always absolutely content with vicarious honors, and, unless the musical profession is wonderfully changed in these latter days, its harmony is made up of many discords. The majority of the profession, however, and especially the orchestral branch of it, whose interests he has always so vigorously defended, will, we doubt not, join with the general public in cordial congratulations to Sir Michael, and will wish him many years' enjoyment of the honor which only crowns with the grace of a Royal recognition a dignified public and private life, and many years' laborious dedication of rare talents to the interests of the highest order of musical art.

Arias: Spohr: from Faust, and Concert Aria; Weber: from Silvana and Freyschütz; Mozart: two from Titus, one from Figaro; Rossini: from "Tell" and "Semiramide"; Rossi: from "Mitrane"; Schubert: from "The Resurrection of Lazarus"; Spontini: from La Vestale; Haydn: "Ariadne at Naxos," and from the Creation; Handel: from "Julius Cæsar"; Beethoven: "Ah perfido"; Gluck: from Orpheus; Randegger: Media scena; Meyerbeer: from Vielka; Halevy: from Les Mousquetaires.

Songs. Of Schumann: five, besides the Cyclus "Frauenliebe und Lehen"; Mendelssohn, two; one each by Brahms, Scarlatti, Moscheles, Gluck, Rossini (two-part), Taubert, Randegger, Rubinstein, Goltermann, Reinecke, Schubert.

Twenty two of the above works were heard in the Gewandhaus for the first time. The soloists who took part were as follows: Singers: Frau Peschka-Leutner, Fräulein Ritter, Frau Joachim, Sophie Förster, Bellingrath-Wagner, Frä. Hänisch, Frau Rudersdorff, Frä. Börs, Scherbel, Anna Strauss, Nanits, Borré; Herren Wallenreiter, Rehling, Bletzacher, Ehrke, Dr. Krückl.—Pianists: Messrs. Saint-Saëns (French), Cowen (English), Brüll, Reinecke; Milles, Joel, Holländer, Scherbel, Dittrich.—Violinists: David, Röntgen, Joachim, Besekirski, Wilhelm, De Ahna, Deeke, de Graan.—Violoncellist: H. Grützmacher.—Flutists: De Broye (French, a rare artist), Barge, Klansnitz.—Oboes: Linke.—Clarinet: Landgraf.—Bassoon: Weissenhorn.—Horn: Gumpert.

CONSERVATORIUM. Among the new pupils admitted to this famous school at Easter was a young South Australian, from Swansea in Van Diemen's Land; after an 86 days passage from his home he was duly inscribed on the 2nd of April as the first pupil from that quarter of the world. The other four continents are already represented: Europe, by all its States, with the exception of Belgium, Spain and Portugal; America, by 22 States of the Union, besides Canada; Nova Scotia, several of the West India islands, Rio Janeiro, and Colombia; Asia, by Tiflis in further Caucasia and Batavia in Java; Africa, by Enon in the eastern province of Capeland. So that the Leipzig Conservatory now counts its pupils from all the five quarters of the globe.

A new Tonkünstler-Verein, or Association of Musicians, has just been formed. Its object is to introduce to the public new and unknown compositions, printed or unprinted. The committee consists of Herren Reinecke, Von Radecki, Trefftz, Fritsch; Drs. Zopff, and Abraham. The first performance took place on the 31st March, when the programme contained: Christnacht, a Cantata for Women's Voices, Herr Triest; Pianoforte Quintet in D major, Herr Thieriot; two Choral Songs, Herr Rheinberger; Violin Sonata, Op. 13 (G minor), Herr Grieg; and "An die Musik," Herr Grimm.

Herr Müller v. d. Werra has been entrusted with the task of selling some highly valuable autographs, formerly belonging to a celebrated composer, who was the friend of Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert. They are the manuscripts of complete works, and comprise a short stringed quartet by Mozart, some pianoforte pieces by Beethoven, and several of the most beautiful songs—such as "Die Forelle" for instance—by Franz Schubert. What renders the pieces particularly interesting is the fact of their varying in different places from the known editions, and having marginal observations, as well as a dedication. An unpublished song by Franz Schubert, to words taken from Holy Writ, is included among the collection.

London.

NEW PHILHARMONIC; ORATORIO, &c. The Athenæum, of May 1, tells us:

Mendelssohn's "Reformation" was the Symphony of the second New Philharmonic Concert, and it was for the most part well played. The opening movement, indeed, and the allegro vivace, which does duty for a scherzo, were more spiritedly and brightly rendered than anything we remember to have heard Dr. Wyld conduct; but the final allegro maestoso was taken somewhat too fast, and the chorale thus lost much of its impressiveness. The Overtures were "Die Weihe des Hauses" and "The Ruler of the Spirits"; the vocalists, Mlle. Scalchi—who gave the rondo finale from "Cenerentola" with remarkable volubility—and Signor Naudin. Mme. Trautmann and Herr Jaell played Bach's Concerto in C for two pianos and orchestra, and the gentleman brought forward a Concerto, written for him by Herr Ferdinand Hiller. On this we hesitate to offer any remarks, as we have been anticipated by the writer of the annotated programme. But we must take leave to ask if the system now in vogue among concert-givers of telling the audience what to admire is permissible? Brief remarks on the works to be performed, with illustrations in musical type of the principal themes, are acceptable and useful enough. Anything more than this is unnecessary, and there is danger of its being impertinent. We have nothing to say about the assertion that "with the exception perhaps of Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' one of those isolated points of beauty which scarcely admits [sic] of any comparison, there is not a finer overture in existence than 'Die Weihe des Hauses,'"—except that it will not be shared by many musicians. Nor is it worth while to criticize such an expression as a "thread of melody opening up a wave of darkness." But we are bound to protest against the bad taste of heaping extravagant praise, as ridiculous as it is fulsome, on anybody engaged for the concert. Such barefaced puffing must be distressing to a true artist, and it certainly has a tendency to lower him in the opinion of the public.

Mr. Barnby's fourth Concert was given to "The Creation." Mr. Sims Reeves sang his finest, and the choruses were unusually well done. The lowered pitch has a distinctly appreciable effect on the quality of the choristers' voices. Mr. Leslie's penultimate Concert was devoted to part-songs, two or three solo singers of course assisting.

[From the Orchestra, May 14].

On Wednesday "Israel in Egypt" was given by the National Choral Society: principal singers Miss Arabella Smyth, Mme. Baby Barrett, Miss Palmer, and Mr. R. Mason. The sublime choruses were well taken: in fact the general efficiency led Mr. Martin into heresy, for he altered the celebrated duet for basses, "The Lord is a Man of War," and made a choral number of it. The artistic effect was not such as to justify a repetition of the interference with the composer's intention; but the audience lacked judgment and encored the trick.

Mr. Barnby's fifth oratorio concert on Wednesday at St. James's Hall, again suffered from the absence of the undeniable and unreliable great tenor, who was assigned a place in the "Lobgesang" and "Stabat Mater." Mr. Cummings filled Mr. Reeves's place, and achieved mark-worthy effect in both works. A second substitution was that of Mlle. Scalchi for Mlle. Drasill, also indisposed. These concerts are generally marked by the defection of a couple of principal singers at each performance. Mme. Rudersdorff, as soprano, sang with her accustomed power and dramaticism. Herr Stepan in the "Stabat" was forcible. The choruses were excellently given, and not less to be applauded was the performance of the orchestra, conducted by Mr. Barnby as before.

The Royal Society of Musicians gave its annual performance of the "Messiah" on Friday night. The principal singers were Meses. Lemmens-Sherington and Sainton-Dolby, Miss Edith Wynne (in lieu of Mme. Bodda-Pyne, indisposed), Miss Anna Jewell, Mme. O. Williams; Messrs. Cummings, L. Thomas, and Winn. Professor Bennett was to have conducted, but being ill, was replaced by Mr. Cousins. The orchestra, chiefly composed of members of the society, was headed by one of our most experienced violinists, Mr. J. T. Willy.

Mr. Charles Hallé recommenced on Friday a series of pianoforte recitals. Mr. Hallé intends to play the whole of Beethoven's Miscellaneous compositions for the pianoforte, together with all Schubert's published works for the same instrument. The first recital included Schubert's first grand sonata in A minor, Beethoven's Andante in F, written for the Waldstein sonata, Schubert's impromptu in E flat, and his fantasia in C. Two of Schubert's "Schöne Mälerin" Lieder, were well sung by Mlle. Regan.

Frä. Mehlig's performance of chamber-music at Hanover Square on Monday may be mentioned for the excellent execution of Schubert's Duo in B minor, in which the beneficiaire took the piano and Herr Straus the violin; and no less for the rendering of Liszt's transcription of Bach's Organ Fantasia and Fugue in G minor by Frä. Mehlig herself.—The concert of Miss Agnes Zimmermann on Tuesday was the last of these soirées, distinguished like the foregoing two by Miss Zimmermann's mastery over every detail of piano-forte playing. These concerts are noteworthy for the successful interpretation of chamber-music of the best schools, a task in which the assistance of Herr Joachim and Sig. Piatti has been successfully sought, to the great benefit of Miss Zimmermann's audiences.

The concert given by M. Joseph Wieniawski, the pianist and brother of the more famous violinist merits record. M. Wieniawski played some of his own compositions, and works by Rubinstein and the Abbé Liszt, displaying considerable proficiency as an executant, combined with correct taste.

The Tonic Sol-fa Association, under the direction of Mr. Thos. Gardner, gave a very successful performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt." The choruses were very finely given. The duet of "The Lord is a Man of War," sung by Messrs. Renwick and Theodore Distin, met with a rapturous encore. The other solo parts were sustained by Miss Blanche Reeves, Miss Simester, and Marie Gondio. The room was crowded.

ROSSINI FESTIVAL. The inauguration of the new season at the Crystal Palace could hardly have been more brilliant or more successful, whether as regards the delight of the twenty thousand visitors, or the financial results to the directors. The music performed was selected from Rossini's most popular works, and included the whole of the "Stabat Mater," the overtures to "Semiramide," "La Gazza Ladra," and "William Tell," the celebrated "Benediction of the Banners" from the "Siege of Corinth," and the familiar Prayer from "Mose in Egitto." This opening festival was intended to be a kind of commemoration of Rossini, and such it eminently was; and we cannot but think that the severe strictures which have been passed upon the introduction of the March and Chorus from Costa's "Naaman" ungenerous and uncalled for. We admit, however, that the position of the "Naaman" March was injudicious; and that it was a pity to separate Rossini's music by its introduction after the Stabat Mater. But an acknowledgment of the services of our great conductor, on his first appearance at the Crystal Palace after his severe illness, and his decoration by Her Majesty, was both graceful and appropriate; and if Costa's composition had opened the festival, we believe as little exception could have been taken as to its being closed with "God save the Queen." The immense orchestra of the Handel Festival Choir was used on this occasion, and the same arrangements were made to convert the centre transept into a concert-room as at the last Handel Festival. On each side of the organ were inscriptions, recording the date of Rossini's birth and death, together with the names of the various operas composed by him. The effect of the arrangements was very striking and impressive. The band was composed of eighty-two first violins, eighty-two second, forty-one violoncellos, forty-one contrabass, a proportionate number of violas, three times the usual number of wood instruments, and double the number of brass. The chorus consisted of above two thousand persons. The solo singers were Mmes. Rudersdorff and Sainton-Dolby, and Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Santley.—Ibid, May 7.

In a notice of the fourth Philharmonic Concert, the Daily News speaks of Mr. Cipriani Potter's symphony in D as follows:

"The commencing symphony was the work of one of the most highly esteemed and respected of English musicians—a veteran artist, whose age is made continuous youth by his ceaseless and ever fresh love and pursuit of an art in which he has earned an honorable renown as well as personally the golden opinions of all who value worth and integrity. Mr. Cipriani Potter is one of the few surviving disciples and friends of Beethoven, whose vast genius, developed far in advance of public recognition, was at once appreciated by the young English student, who hastened abroad to place himself within that high and noble influence by which he has so largely and permanently benefited. One of the earliest promoters of the Philharmonic Society, and for twenty-seven years (until his retirement in favor of Professor Bennett), Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, Mr. Cipriani Potter, by his refined performances of classical pianoforte music (especially that of Mozart and Beethoven, much of which he introduced for the first time in this country); by his own sterling works for that instrument, and for the orchestra; by his excellent example and instruction both in pianoforte playing and in composition, has exercised the soundest and most wholesome influence on English musical art, and has trained some of its best living professors. His works, although not very numerous, comprise almost all forms of instrumental music, among them being several grand symphonies for full orchestra, that performed on Monday (in D major), being the fourth of the series. In this, as in his other productions, the influence of his early study of the highest models is largely apparent. The symphony now referred to contains some masterly writing, especially in the first allegro and in the andante.

SALZBURG. At the last concert of the Mozarteum, the programme included a completely new work, namely, Symphonic Concertante (Triple Concerto in one movement), for Violin, Viola, and Violoncello, with orchestral accompaniments, by Mozart. Herr Bach discovered the interesting relic hidden amid a number of archives covered with the dust of years. Mozart had written down with his own hand the sketch which Herr Bach carried out, scored and supplied, moreover, with a grand three-part cadence.

The Past Two Musical Years in Boston.

We copied in our last a summary of the Philadelphia programmes for the past season, showing that the Quaker City has taken great strides in the classical direction. To-day we translate an abstract of the matter that has been presented in the twenty and more famous concerts at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig. And the thought naturally recurs: What have we done ourselves? Let us take up the thread again, then, where we left it about two years ago, and let the procession pass before us of the noble or fine works of masters (of course mere titles, but not altogether empty ones to those blessed with opportunities and memories) which have "come to hearing," more or less public, during the last two musical seasons here in Boston. For "Brag is a good dog," and just now leader of the fashion, dog-star of the "heated period" beginning triumphantly in the ascendant—in local patriotism, music, business, we might almost say religion; in sooth we are nothing if we are not (nothing, those of us who are not) loud;—so say all the trumpets of the Press; so all the advertising agencies of Business, whose ways of saying it are curious as well as loud; so countless hammers rearing the colossal building like a mushroom in a night (a very solid one); and so soon shall echo thunder clouds of singers, hundreds of anvils, mammoth drums, and guns and bells, and all the brazen throats of glory, in such a Jubilee as the world never heard, pressing into the sweet tuneful service all the arts of symphony and song, and all their mighty masters, from Handel to Spread-Eagle Smith or Jones,—all to magnify the praise of Peace (nobody else, oh no!) and to bring crowds and bustling business to Boston,—for without crowd and bustle how can there be peace! or how any glory without the modest knighthood of the noble order of Spread Eagles?—But do not think we mean to be satirical; if there is any irony here it is only what a distinguished learned friend would call the irony of Fate. Besides, you may turn it upon ourselves, for we too are about to brag. By the very humble and dry process of mere mechanical enumeration we propose to show, that though the musical enthusiasm of our Jubilating friends be taxable with more or less extravagance and claptrap, as all popular demonstrative enthusiasms perhaps always must be, still, as a musical festival, it has a pretty solid basis to rest upon in the actual sincere taste that has been lately developed in this community of late years for music of the highest order. And we adduce it as a striking proof of the growing strength of the classical element among the thousands and tens of thousands who love and learn and practise music here, that the projectors of such a Jubilee have felt it indispensable to recognize, conciliate, and minister quite largely in their programmes to this element. In this light, if no other, the most sincere, earnest, quiet friend of Music, in the purest sense of Art, may find encouragement, at least some comfort, in this colossal piling of Ossa upon Pelion of monster concerts, the steady approach and looming up of which has certainly something of the grandeur of those mountainous electric clouds which rear themselves and cast their shadow over all the green and smiling landscape of this blessed summer season of long days.

Our brag, however, is to be of quality, and not so much of quantity. Others may prostrate themselves or dance and shout before their colossal idol Big Thing, as their natures or their interests oblige them, but our fond enumeration will include little things as well as big things, if they be only good. Our record of Boston music for the two years shall begin with

I. ORCHESTRAL MUSIC.

This consisted, mainly, last year (season of 1867-8) in the ten "Symphony Concerts" (8 subscription, and 2 benefit) of the Harvard Musical Association, with an orchestra of about 55 instruments, and an audience of from 1500 to 1800 persons; the 8 Afternoon Concerts, half classical, half popular, of the Orchestral Union, small orchestra of about 30; and 4 grand instrumental concerts given in the course of the Handel and Haydn Society's Triennial Festival, with over a hundred in the orchestra;—Carl Zerrahn being Conductor on all these occasions. This year (1868-9), the Orchestral Union have not seen fit to enter the field at all,—which has been really a public loss; the subscription series of the "Symphony Concerts" (with orchestra of 62, and audiences of at least 2,000) has been increased to ten, besides one benefit, and one given by the Conductor in his own name; and these have been succeeded by three purely classical matinées with a select orchestra and audience, in a small hall, given and conducted by Mr. B. J. Lang, and one in aid of the "Normal Diapason." Thus, in all, we have had in the two years 38 concerts, in every one of which Symphony music gave the tone at least, while in many instances two Symphonies were given in a single concert. These were the works performed (in the Harvard Concerts when not otherwise designated):

SYMPHONIES.

HAYDN. (Breitkopf & Härtel ed.) No. 2 (in D), 4 (D), 8 (B flat), 11 (Military, G), 13 (G, 4 times, once by Lang), and short one in B (H dur).

MOZART. In C ("Jupiter"); E flat (3 times, Harv., Orch. Un., Lang); D (No. 1), twice; G minor (Fest.).

BEETHOVEN. No. 2 (Harv. and O. U.); 3, "Eroica," twice; 4, twice (Harv. and Zerrahn); 5, twice; 6, "Pastoral," twice (Lang once); 7, twice; 8 thrice (Harv., Lang, Diapason); 9, "Choral," (Fest.).

MENDELSSOHN. In A minor, "Scotch"; A major, "Ital." (Lang); "Reformation," twice (Fest. and Harv.); "Hymn of Praise" Sinf., twice, (H. & H.).

SCHUBERT. No. 9, in C, 4 times (Harv., O. U., twice, Fest.); Unfinished in B minor, 5 times (O. U. twice, Harv., Fest., Zerrahn).

SCHUMANN. No. 1, B flat; 3, E flat, twice; 4, D minor.

GADE. No. 1, C minor (O. U.); 2, E; 4, B flat.

Concertos.

MOZART. In E flat, for 2 Pianos, twice.

BEETHOVEN. For Piano: No. 1, in C; 4, in G, twice (Harv., & Lang); 5, in E flat, twice.—For Violin (1st movement), twice: Triple C, for piano, violin and cello, twice. (The other Piano Concertos had been played in the Harv. Concs. of the preceding year).

MENDELSSOHN. For Violin: E minor.—For Piano: in G minor, twice (Harv., and O. U.); in D minor.

CHOPIN. For Piano: in E minor, 4 times; in F minor (by F. Petersilea).

SCHUMANN. For Piano: in A minor, twice (Fest., and Zerrahn).

JOACHIM. "Hungarian" C. for Violin (1st movement), twice (Harv. and Mme. Urso's Benefit).

LISZT. For Piano: in E flat (Fest.).

SPOHR. For Violin: in G, (Fest.).

WEBER. Concert-stück for Piano, twice (O. U. & Harv.).

Overtures.

GLUCK. Iphigenia in Aulis.

BEETHOVEN. "Men of Prometheus," 3 times (Harv., Lang, Benefit); Egmont; Coriolan, twice; Leonore, No. 3, four times (Harv. & Fest.); in C, op. 124, three times.

MEYERBEER. Midsummer Night's Dream, twice (O. U. & Harv.); Melusina, 3 times (Harv. 2, Lang); Hebrides, twice (Lang 1); Ruy Blas, 3 times (O. U. 2); Meeressstille, 3 times (Fest. 1); Trumpet Ov. in C (posth.)

SCHUBERT. Fierabras, twice.

SPORR. Jessonda (Fest.)

SCHUMANN. Genoveva, twice.

WEBER. Oberon, twice; Euryanthe, twice (Fest. 1); Jubilee, twice; Preciosa (Ben.); Freyschütz (ad lib. in miscellaneous concerts).

WAGNER. Tannhäuser, 3 times (Fest., Z. & Harv.)

BENNETT. Naiads, 4 times (O. U. 1, and Lang 1); Waldnymph.

CHERUBINI. Water-Carrier, twice; Anacreon; Medea, twice.

GADE. "Nachklänge aus Ossian," twice; "In the Highlands," twice.

RIETZ. Fest. Ov., in A, (O. U.)

ROSSINI. Tell, twice (Fest. 1); Semiramide (O. U.); La Gazza Ladra (do.); Siege of Corinth, (do).

REISSIGER. La Sirène, et al, in various concerts.

NICOLAI. Fest. Overture: "Ein feste Burg," with chorus, (Fest.)

Miscellaneous with Orchestra.

J. S. BACH. Organ Toccata in F, arr. for orch. by Esser.

BEETHOVEN. Turkish March, ad lib.

LACHNER, FRANZ. Orch. Suite, No. 2, twice (O. U.)

MEYERBEER. Serenade and Allegro gioioso (Lang); Rondo for piano and orch., (O. U.); Capriccio in B minor (do); Wedding March, ad lib.

WAGNER. Bridal Procession in Lohengrin (O. U.)
Arias sung with Orchestra.

BACH. "Well done, ye good and faithful servants," Alto, from a Cantata; Cradle Song, from Christmas Oratorio, twice; "Erbarme dich," alto, from the Matthew Passion, twice; "Mein gläubiges Herze."

HANDEL. "Angels ever bright and fair," (Parepa-Rosa); Duet: "Oh lovely Peace;" "Lascia ch' io pianga" (Miss Phillips), &c., &c.

HAYDN. "With verdure clad," &c.

MOZART. "Deh vieni" (Figaro), 3 times; "Dove sono" (do.); "Voi che sapete," (do); Duet: "Crudel, perchè," (do.); "Non più di fiori (Tito), 3 times; "Constanze" (Seraglio), tenor; "Non più andrai," (Ferranti).

BEETHOVEN. "Abscheulicher, wo eilst du hin" (Fidelio); "Ah, perfido," (Mme. Rosa).

MEYERBEER. "But the Lord is mindful," "O rest in the Lord;" "Jerusalem," &c., from the Oratorios.

WEBER. Soprano Scene from Oberon, (Mme. Rosa); from Freyschütz.

BOSSINI, MEYERBEER, &c., &c., (in miscellaneous concerts).

Concerts.

"NORMAL DIAPASON." The concert given by the three Societies (Handel & Haydn, Harvard Musical and Boston Music Hall), on Thursday Afternoon, May 20, in aid of the efforts of their Joint Committee "to establish here the Normal Diapason, or French Pitch, for all Orchestral or Choral performances," drew a goodly audience to the Music Hall, although, what with the lateness of the season and the multitude of distractions, it did not fill it. The Concert was, however, an encouraging success. Musically, at least, it was full of life and charm. The first part, after the model of a Symphony Concert, consisted of a Symphony, an Aria, and an Overture. Beethoven's cheerfulest and shortest Symphony, in F, the eighth, began it,—one of his perfect inspirations. This and the Overture, the beautiful and noble one by Cherubini to "The Water-Carrier" (or Les Deux Journées), were played with spirit and listened to with zest, although the orchestra, owing to engagements of many of the musicians (especially the Quintette Club) at a distance, was considerably reduced in numbers. This must not be taken as evidence of any want of interest in the good cause on the part of the musicians. On the contrary, many of them, who had been absent from the city all the week on a profitable engagement, felt bound to decline the offer of a renewal, in order to return in season for the concert. Considering, also, that these absences put all rehearsal out of the question, the music all went better than could have been expected.

Between Symphony and Overture came the Recitative and Aria: "Non più di fiori," from Mozart's Tito. Never have we heard that noble aria sung so well, or the Recitative so impressively delivered, as it was that day by Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS. And never have we enjoyed her noble voice and singing quite so much as in this aria. It seemed just the music for her peculiar, her best power, and might have been composed for her.

The chorus of the Handel & Haydn Society, in amply sufficient force, furnished the second part of the concert, in an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The three movements of the introductory Symphony were played through by the orchestra at the usual concert pitch; but before the voices with the Organ came in, the instruments had to be tuned down (by such imperfect means as were available) to the Organ or French pitch; nor was there much attempt to hide the awkward process either from sight or hearing. Such a tuning up as there was! prolonged and mystifying; one might have fancied it some Lisztian or Wagnerian poem of the Future suddenly interpolated. Some one behind us, plainly from the "rural districts," asked his companion: "What is all this?" "O," replied he, "this is where the Normal Diapason comes in." The scene was a good practical demonstration of the need of the reform. The solo parts were finely sung by Miss HOUSTON, Miss PHILLIPS and Mr. Wm. J. WINCH, tenor. Mr. ZERRAHN, of course, conducted the whole concert, and Mr. LANG was in his accustomed place at the Great Organ. All these artists, as well as the Orchestra, gave their best efforts freely, with their hearts, to the occasion; so that of course, with whatsoever accidental imperfections in details, the spirit and impression of the concert as a whole was fine. As to its practical result, it is told, as nearly as it now can be, in a communication from the Secretary of the Committee to the Sunday Times, as follows:

That interested parties may know something of the result of the concert recently given for the purpose of procuring instruments tuned in accordance with the Great Organ, it may be well to state that the receipts were something less than six hundred dollars. From the sum must be deducted some items of expense; though as all the vocal and orchestral assistance, as well as the use of the hall, was entirely gratuitous, the amount realized is sufficient to enable the committee to procure a portion of the instruments at least, and by making another effort the next season, no doubt the much needed reform may be accomplished.

One of the most gratifying features connected with the movement is the fact that it meets with the nearly unanimous approval of all classes who feel in the least interested in musical culture and progress among us. * * *

It has already been stated that the Mason & Hamlin Organ Co. have decided to adopt the new pitch, and it may now be said, with almost as much certainty, that the leading pianoforte makers will also fall into the ranks, though the labor and expense in drafting new scales for their instruments would be great. The movement now bids fair to become popular, and to be adopted without much unnecessary delay.

FAREWELL to ADELAIDE PHILLIPS. This was one of the heartiest and most enthusiastic testimonials we have seen for many a day. To hold such a place, as an artist and as a woman, in the esteem and confidence of such a community as this, is a lot that any woman might covet. The concert took place in the Music Hall on Friday evening, May 21. The Handel & Haydn Society had proffered their services, making, with Mr. ZERRAHN's orchestra and a good array of solo artists, a strong attraction apart from the sentiment of the occasion.

First came the overture to Egmont. Then Miss PHILLIPS, overwhelmed with welcome, sang Rossini's Una voce, embellishing the florid melody as all the prima donnas have felt free to do in this most brilliant quasi impromptu of irrepressible musical high spirits, and executing all with wonderfully fine verve and finish. It electrified the public. Yet we cannot think her best power lies in music of this frolic, ornamental kind; but rather in more serious, large and sustained melody, where there is dignity and grandeur,—in oratorio, or music like the Mozart scene above referred to. The brilliant young pianist, Miss ALIDA TOPP, played the Concert-stück of Weber in a most admirable manner, only marred by some slips in the orchestra; it was with extreme reluctance that the audience spared her from a further exhibition of her talent. That lovely florid melody from the "Somnambula:" Come per me sereno, showed the clear, bird-like voice, the sure, clean, fluent, brilliant execution, and the simple, honest way of singing, the freedom from all nonsense, all sentimental straining for effect, of Miss ANNA GRANGER, to the best advantage.

Rossini's Stabat Mater formed the second part. The solo singers were: Miss WHITTEN, who, though her voice has not quite the telling strength for the high notes of the Inflammatus, charmed by her pure and beautiful expression; Miss PHILLIPS herself of course for the Contralto, in which she is inimitable; Mr. JAMES WHITNEY, tenor, and Mr. M. WHITNEY, bass. The grand rich tones of the latter, much improved by culture abroad, were welcome in the Pro peccatis. Choruses and accompaniments went almost as well as could be wished.

Miss Phillips will soon leave us to fulfil a long engagement at the Italian Opera in Paris, and music and society will miss her greatly here.

BOSTON AS A MUSICAL PLACE is beginning to be recognized by European journals. For a long time they could see nothing this side of the Atlantic but New York. The London Athenæum has the following:

Sir Michael Costa's "Nuam" was given in Boston by the Handel and Haydn Society for one of their Easter oratorios, the other being St. Paul. The work, which appears to have pleased, is described with much acuteness and perfect fairness in Dwight's Journal of Music—an excellent paper. Boston has been very active lately in classical music. A quartet matinee given by the Listemann party the programme included Schubert's posthumous quartet in D minor, and Paganini's first Concerto; at a concert of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, a "Suite in Canon form," by Julius Grimm, one of the younger generation of living German composers, was brought forward; Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony" was one of the quasi-novelties of the Harvard Musical Association's Extra Concert, the programme of which was rightly arranged in chronological order; and a rich selection of the best orchestral classical music was made for Mr. Lang's Symphony Concert given at the Mercantile Hall in the afternoon. This list does not by any means exhaust all the good concerts that took place within a fortnight in Boston. London could seldom show so much.

In this connection we may remark that our Harvard Symphony Concerts have attracted the attention of one of the leading musical journals in Germany, the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, of Leipzig, which, after copying all the ten programmes of the season, adds: "The simple fact that such a programme could be projected and laid before the public some time before the beginning of the concerts, shows in what an assured position musical affairs stand in Boston, or in other words, how carefully and from a good artistic point of view the leaders of these concerts have laid out their plan. Not only are the orchestral works, as the main matter, placed throughout where they belong, but the solo pieces are arranged in due accordance therewith, and everywhere regard is had to alternation and variety. The fact also that Boston can rely upon itself almost entirely for soloists, contributes greatly to its concert strength; but the main thing and the beginning of all good is evermore the thoughtful and well-planned direction shown; and in this respect the Boston Concert Society could serve for a model to many a German one. What one sees still further, by the above list, is this: that, in this regard, between America (i.e. particularly Boston) and middle Europe no distinction any more exists." The article concludes with a brief allusion to the doings of our Handel and Haydn Society and the South Boston Choral Union.

"SIMPLE MOZART!" There is a half-truth in the following, which we find in the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin. One has so often cause to sympathize with it, that he wishes it contained the other half. Mozart, for instance, besides being a genius, and "simple" in the sense of true to himself, was also one of the most learned of musicians. But the little poem in the main justifies itself.

The Mavis.

The mavis sings his glorious roundelay
The thrush, in yonder bush will have his say—
In spite of critics wise and doctors deep,
Who prate for canons till we fain would sleep.

The merry songsters, void of doubt or care,
Blythe as the sunlight and as free as air,
Sing all unsought, because they needs must sing,
In joy and love, until the heavens ring.

And is true genius not akin to these?
Did simple Mozart merely write to please
Those critics who, to show their wit, must needs
Seek reasons strange to him who wrought the deeds?
To one such critic,—'twas this very day—
Methought I heard the wond'ring mavis say:
"You find too many thoughts in song so small—
An' were they mine, I could not sing at all."

FELIX STERNDALE.

ORPHEON FESTIVAL IN NEW YORK. The World, May 23, winds up its musical report with the following:

It is a relief to know that June winds up the grand concerts of the profession, and that the stereotyped phrases about the "well-rendered" aria and the "depth of feeling" of the fiddler, and the technical facility of the pianist will disappear for a while. One concert there was during the week, called the "Springtide Festival of the Free Choir Boy and Choral Schools of the Orpheon Society," which merits some notice, as it falls outside of the weak category we have alluded to. This annual festival is pretty generally known as Mr. Jerome Hopkins's concert, though it is also well known that he never receives any pecuniary benefit from it. This is the fourth year of these festivals, and they have steadily grown in excellence and in the esteem of a large number of church patrons, despite the sneers of the critics and the contempt of the few who regard the attempt to teach music to the young as a belittling occupation for an artist. On Tuesday night the Academy was entirely filled by a very brilliant audience. There were four hundred performers seated on the stage, a large portion of which was occupied by an efficient orchestra from the Philharmonic Society, conducted by Carl Bergmann. The solo performers were Mme. Dargrou, a cultivated soprano and pupil of M. E. Millet; Mme. Frankow Hess, soprano, a pupil of Mme. De Lussan; Miss Louise Livingston, a careful and generally excellent contralto; Mr. Rockwood, the well known tenor; and Mr. Jerome Hopkins himself. All these artists distinguished themselves by their earnest and painstaking efforts. Mrs. Hess, in a difficult aria from "Robert le Diable," displayed her culture and ability in an unforced manner, and was warmly applauded. The choruses were especially improved since the last festival. The superb chorus, "The Heavens are Telling," from "The Creation," and a stirring glee of Von Weber's were most effectively given.

A Te Deum Laudamus (part chant, part anthem and part solo) was performed antiphonally and accompanied by the orchestra. This was a novelty, it being the first instance of antiphonal chanting with orchestra that we know of in this country. The two choir boys (Masters Ottiwell and Seyroux), who sang the solos in this Te Deum, elicited a great deal of enthusiasm. The soprano, a bell-like voice, ran up without any effort to a clear, high A, and both sang their parts with more than the usual sweetness and charm which belong to boys' voices. Mr. Hopkins figured somewhat prominently throughout. He performed an original concert waltz on the Weber grand, conducted the Te Deum, re-appeared in his "Sepoy March," and finally read a paper to the audience explanatory of the design of these free schools and their relationship to church choirs. In the course of his remarks, he animadverted strongly upon the Common Council, the churches, the Board of Education, and especially the directors of the Academies of Music in New York and Brooklyn, for their total neglect to fulfil the requisitions of their charters, which made obligatory the supplying of musical instruction and the awarding of prizes to musical composers. The speech was an injudicious one, and, when the speaker proceeded to take the directresses of the orphan asylums to task for refusing to admit regular vocal instruction into the establishments with a view to some kind of a yearly singing exhibition such as takes place at St. Paul's in London, his audience objected strongly. A great deal more was said, which may have been true enough, but was out of place, and was, moreover, tinged with a certain bitterness that was unpalatable. Mr. Hopkins is engaged in a most creditable work. He is really making his profession a positive benefit to the community by laying it at the feet of those young people who are unable to command this kind of instruction with money; and, whatever may be his personal fitness, the endeavor is worthy of praise and emulation, but he seems to be aware that enthusiasm, and particularly musical enthusiasm, in its moments of elation, is indistinguishable to the average mind from lunacy itself. As Mr. Hopkins depends upon the average many for support, or at least is continually complaining of their treatment, something should be conceded to them. Let it be moderation. Zeal in good works is sure to bring its own fruition, and no man can enter so praiseworthy but thankless a field as that of gratuitous public instruction without becoming aware, sooner or later, that perseverance, like virtue, is its own reward. But zeal in words is dangerous and inconsistent with that humility that ought to characterize all apostles, whether of ideas or of sound.

Falsetto Voice.

Dr. Marcet, of the Brompton Consumption-Hospital, has been looking down the throat of one of the Tyrolean singers who have lately been warbling at St. James's Hall, the object of the inspection being to ascertain the physiological conditions which produce the beautiful falsetto notes for which the Swiss artists are celebrated. The observations were made by means of a laryngoscope, a little instrument whereof the principal member is a mirror placed at the back of the patient's mouth. It is pretty generally known that the human vocal apparatus consists of a pair of membranes, situated horizontally in the throat, and just touching at their edges. A drum-head, with a slit across it, may convey a popular idea of them. In the act of singing the lips of these cords, as they are called, are brought into contact, and they approach each other throughout their whole length, and remain parallel. When they are set in vibration, by the passage of air through them, under these conditions, a full-chest note is emitted; but if they do not meet in their entire length, either a posterior or anterior portion of them remaining apart, the sound is no longer full, but feeble and shrill; the note emitted is what the stringed instrument player calls a harmonic, and what a singer calls a falsetto, or head note. The violinist who would bring out a harmonic so touches a string that, instead of making it vibrate as a whole, he divides it into segments, each of which vibrates by itself, and emits the note due to its short length, instead of that which the full length of the string would yield. The same sort of thing appears to be done by the falsetto singer; the adept can at will shorten his vocal cords so as to pass instantly from one to his harmonic. The muscular process by which this transaction is effected is not clearly made out, so that it cannot be determined whether all singers are alike gifted with powers of head-singing equal to the Tyrolean, or whether Alpine melody grew out of peculiar capabilities of Alpine throats.—Once a Week.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Last Fond Look. 2. B♭ to f. Halton. 30
The last look of the sailor, as his ship turns her prow to the ocean. On his return, his beloved's house is vacant, and she is dead. Pathetic and beautiful song.

Kind words can cheer the heart. 3. A♭ to e. Barker. 30
One of the songs it is good for every one to sing. Excellent sentiment, and fine melody.

Many happy returns of the day. 2. D to f. Blockley. 30

A very "warm-hearted" and appropriate thing to sing at social meetings, weddings, birth-day parties, and all occasions of congratulation. Kind wishes will weigh more, when included in a song.

Do as you would be done by. 3. C to e. Gordon. 30
A good maxim or precept does not always make a good song, but this is an exception, being a good, wholesome piece to sing, with pleasing music.

Whip-poor-will's Song. Guitar. Hayden. 30
I cannot sing the old songs. Guitar. 30
Two favorite songs, all ready for guitar players.

Beautiful Flowers. (Nani na pua). L. P. K. 30
A song worthy of special notice, from the fact that it was composed in the Sandwich Islands, and has printed upon it the Hawaiian, as well as the English words. The former are so smooth in construction, as to suggest a thought, that they may be equal to Italian as a basis for vocalization. The poetry is very pretty, and the music sweet.

Love thee. 3. D to g. Schoeller. 30
A love song, with a beautiful melody.

The Day when you'll forget me. 3. E♭ to e. Thomas. 40
A first-class song, pathetic, earnest, tender, graceful and musical, and, as will be seen above, of easy compass.

Parting. (Scheidend). 4. E♭ to e. Mendelssohn. 30
Similar to other songs of the same composer, and, course, good.

Instrumental.

Damascus. Triumphal March. 4 hrs. 3. E♭. Gurney. 75

Mr. Gurney has arranged from "Naaman" a very powerful and brilliant march. It is commended to those who wish a good show piece for exhibitions, and to all players of duets.

Te'l rammenti. (Do you remember). Fantasia. Summer. 60
A sort of Italian song-melody, arranged and varied in a pleasing manner.

Concert des Oiseaux. Caprice. Bocswitz. 50
Just the season for a bird concert! So hear this one among the others.

Mocking Bird Quickstep. For Brass Band. 1.00
A popular Quickstep, of the kind that is apt to be very successful when played in-doors.

Two Nocturnes. By Heyner. each. 40
No. 1. Happy Memories. 4. E♭.
No. 2. Laughing Eyes. 8. B♭.

These are Nocturnes in form, but not in quality, as "Happy Memories" was evidently written in a joyful mood, and the memory of "Brightest Eyes" is one of the last things to quiet the nerves, which is the legitimate end of a Nocturne. Both are very pleasing pieces.

Sea-Shell Schottisch. 3. F. Hobson. 45
"Hobson's choice" of a melody was a most fortunate one. He could not well have found a prettier.

Era Diavolo. 4. B♭. S. Smith. 1.00
The well known airs of Auber's opera, capably arranged.

Books.

ROSSINI'S MESSA SOLENNELLE. (Solemn Mass). Cloth, $2.50; Boards, $2.00; Paper, $1.60

This the last work (of any length at least) of the great composer, was in manuscript in 1863, and was first "brought out" at the house, or "hotel" of Count Pillet-Will, in 1865. It was not, however, heard by the general public till last winter, when in February, it was given at the Italian opera in Paris. It is recommended to musical societies. There is a piano accompaniment, and also one for the Reed Organ, which may be added or omitted at will.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The h-y is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double the rate.

Rossini.

THE LIFE OF ROSSINI. By H. Sutherland Edwards. In one volume. Hurst & Blackett. 1869.

In this handsome volume we have the first of several promised biographies of the illustrious Italian musician. Time will show whether we have also the best; but it is certain now that Mr. Edwards has written an eminently readable, interesting, and trustworthy book. Few were better qualified for the task. The author of a standard History of the Opera, and the most brilliant writer upon current operatic topics, was instinctively looked to for a life of Rossini. He has done what was expected of him, and the result—a very satisfactory one—is before us.

Nobody will look for an exhaustive biography of the great Italian in a volume of 340 pages. The reason is to be found in our author's first sentence:—"Although Rossini's active life did number precisely the 'threescore years and ten' allotted to man, we must go back a full seventy years from the date of his last work to the first incident in his musical career." All the story of those seventy years will take a long and patient telling, and will require the plodding, unflagging energy of a Jahn or a Thayer for its elucidation. Such a work Mr. Edwards has not attempted. He has not written exclusively for the reference library of the few, but also for the pleasure and instruction of the many. No end could be more completely attained. The salient features of Rossini's life and labors are grouped in admirable order, and the book, while it conveys everything necessary to an accurate idea of its subject, is as interesting as a novel. To this result pure and graceful English in no slight degree contributes.

In fixing the main divisions of his work Mr. Edwards submitted to the dictation of circumstances. The "acts" in the master's life were as well defined as those in one of his own operas; hence Act I., "Rossini and his early works;" Act II., "Rossini at Naples;" and Act III., "Rossini's French career," is an arrangement which might have been predicated before opening the book. In our present notice we shall limit ourselves exclusively to the first of these epochs; not, however, neglecting the brief "introduction," which contains some sensible remarks of a general character. Thus early we meet with specimens of the thoughtful, or happily expressed ideas, which abound in the work. One or two quotations (the italics are ours) must be given. Speaking of Rossini's temperament, Mr. Edwards says: "every one has heard that when, writing in bed, he let fall the piece he was just finishing, he did not rise to pick it up, as a man of sluggish imagination would have done, but at once, with true musical activity, wrote another." The skill with which what seems the result of consummate laziness is here made into the reverse, savors of real literary legerdemain. Again we are told "he did not like the half-material bother of setting to work, but he was full of ideas, and when he did begin, melody flowed from him as from an eternal spring." Further, "he was too delicately organized and had too much sense to love labor for the sake of labor;" and, again, "his success was immediate, like that of a beautiful woman whose beauty every one can appreciate." We like to meet with passages such as these on the very threshold of a book. They entice us onward by showing that our guide is a pleasant fellow, who will not bore us with routine orations.

The space covered by our author's first division begins in 1799 (the printer has made it 1709), when the Rossini of seven years old took the part of the child in Paer's Camilla at the Bologna Theatre, and ends in 1814, when Rossini established himself in Naples. Mr. Edwards takes us agreeably over the interval between Rossini's first appearance on the stage and his first musical work (written nine years after), by chatting about his master's ancestors and family arms. The latter, adopted by one Giovanni Russini, circa 1550, are described, in language which would be the death of Garter, King at Arms, as "three stars in the upper part of the escutcheon, and a hand holding a rose, surmounted by a nightingale in the lower part." Mr. Edwards takes care to point out that the bird establishes Giovanni's credit as a far-seer. We need not dwell upon the story of Rossini's early operas here detailed, further than to note one or two amusing points. Prinetti, the young musician's pianoforte master, "never went to bed, and he taught his pupils to play the scales with two fingers, the first finger and thumb." These peculiarities are very well put together, because the first acts as buffer to the shock of the second. A man who never goes to bed may be expected to do anything. Another good story is of a seconda-donna for whom Rossini wrote in his Ciro. "The poor woman had only one good note in her voice, and he accordingly made her repeat that note and no other, while the melody of her solo was played by the orchestra." Complaisant maestro! yet more complaisant public! But the best story of all tells how thoroughly Rossini "sold" a boorish manager who treated him uncivilly and gave him a "monstrously absurd" libretto. The composer was obliged to write, but, as the terms of engagement did not dictate how, he made the bass roar at the top of his register, and the soprano murmur on her lowest notes. To a comic artist he gave all sentimental music, and the most difficult air, accompanied pianissimo and pizzicato, to another who could not sing at all. He went further, and got an "effect" out of the tin shades of the orchestra candles, which were struck by the musicians. This was too much, for it irritated the audience, and Rossini was compelled to go, without standing upon the order of his going. Mr. Edwards excuses him by implication, very neatly, saying, "Rossini had to choose between a bad joke and a bad opera, and he preferred the former."

The production of Tancredi in 1813 brings us to a very valuable feature in this biography—a clear description and estimate of the reforms made by Rossini in Italian opera. At the outset, Mr. Edwards rapidly sketches the history of Italian opera down to the time of his hero, choosing as representative works Pergolesi's Serva Padrona, Gluck's Orfeo, Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto, and Paisiello's Barbiere, arriving, in the end, at the complete development which a German composer, Mozart, attained in his Don Giovanni. This development, as every musical reader knows, preceded the changes Rossini was the first among Italian musicians to make, and our author clearly leans to the assumption that the latter were independent of the former. The case, however, is not very clear, and no authoritative evidence is produced from which anything positive can be inferred. After describing the production of Tancredi at Venice, Mr. Edwards goes on to tell of Rossini's improvements in the construction of comic opera, which began thus early (1813) with L'Italiana in Algeri. For information as to what these were, as also for particulars of the corresponding changes made in opera seria (Tancredi) we must refer to the book itself. But we cannot so pass over the master's quarrel with Velluti, the male soprano, and its consequences to music for the voice. Our author's account of these matters is prefaced by some remarks upon the want of dramatic interest in Rossini's life, at which we must for a moment pause. They are very tersely put, as witness the following:—"In his numerous affairs of the heart he seems always to have been met half-way; nor did his works ever remain unappreciated for more than about twenty-four hours at a time." He was a "practical philosopher," and "if, as occasionally happened, an opera of his fell to the ground, he literally picked up the pieces." In illustration, Mr. Edwards cites the overture to Aureliano, "which a year afterwards was taken to Naples, to serve as an introduction to Elisabetta, and a year after that (Elisabetta having perished), to Rome, where it got prefixed to the immortal Barber—from whom may it never be separated." Imitating Handel in this respect, he imitated him also in off-hand dealing with the whims of vocalists. The gist of his quarrel with Velluti amounts to this: The sopranist had a part written for him in Aureliano, which he wanted to embroider according to the then detestable fashion (a fashion not wholly extinct unhappily); which he did embroider, in point of fact, so much that Rossini could not recognize his own handiwork. The composer, who "knew that it was not his part to supply these acrobats with bits of carpet on which to perform their gymnastic feats," objected, and a row ensued, ending in a resolve to write for the future exactly what was to be sung, neither less nor more. Rossini was the man of the time, and his declaration of war against the domination of singers was enough. "To be sure," says our author, "these giants of sopranists, with their vocal equestrianism, their shouting from the summits of mountains, and their plumes five feet high, were already approaching their last days. Still the great Velluti was in his vigor in 1814, and it was in that year that the young Rossini declared war against these Philistines, and succeeded in liberating vocal music from the tyranny of vocalists." The eighteen months' interval between Aureliano and Elisabetta (first of the Neapolitan operas) occupies the last chapter of the division now under notice. In that interval, Rossini produced Il Turco in Italia and Sigismondo, which together supply but little matter. Hence, Mr. Edwards gives us an interesting disquisition upon Italian theatres, from which, wanting space, we cannot quote. If anybody desires to be amused and instructed upon this point, the book itself is accessible.

In a future article we shall accompany Mr. Edwards throughout the second period of his hero's career. It is our fault if any reader feels reluctant to go with us.—London Mus. World.

Musical Instruments.

(From the London Athenæum).

54 Addison Road, March 27, 1869.

I submit to you a short account of my collection of antiquated musical instruments, since I have reason to believe that such a collection may be of some interest to others besides musical readers.

Among the lutes there is one resembling the figure of the "old English lute," given by Thomas Mace in his "Musick's Monument," London, 1676. It has a double neck, and only thirteen strings. Thomas Mace says, "The theorboe is no other than that which we call'd the old English lute." On the theorbo used on the Continent, however, the neck for the bass strings was much longer than it is on the present specimen. Still more interesting is another lute, which has attained the venerable age of 450 years. It is the work of Laux Maler, a German, who lived in Bologna about 1415, and who may be considered as the Amati of the old lute-makers. At the time when Thomas Mace wrote his book before mentioned, the lutes of Laux Maler were in high repute, and, "pittifull old, batter'd, crack'd things" as they were, they fetched as much as 100*l.* a piece. My specimen is in a sound state of preservation; nothing has been altered on it, except the tuning-pegs—brass and ivory screws having been substituted for the original pegs. This contrivance, as well as a painting of flowers on the sound-board, is probably not older than about a hundred years. The cracks on its pear-shaped body have been carefully mended, and, in my opinion, rather contribute to its dignity, like the wrinkles of a venerable grandsire. Its tone is remarkably fine.

One of the most popular instruments in domestic circles about three hundred years ago was the cithara, also mentioned by the old writers as cittern and cythara. It must be remembered that the name of cithar was formerly applied to various stringed instruments, but especially to such as had wire strings which were twanged with a plectrum, usually made of a quill or a piece of whalebone. My collection contains several of these instruments. One is a fine specimen of the cithar which was commonly found in barbers' shops and in gay houses. It is ornamented with inlaid ivory, mother-of-pearl, colored woods, &c. Another, the cithara bijuga, has, as its name implies, a double neck. It evidently dates from the sixteenth century, and belonged formerly to a museum of antiquities at Vienna. There are on it seventeen wire strings, eight of which are placed near the finger-board; and the others, which extend to the longer neck, serving for the bass notes, run at the side of the finger-board. I know of only one other specimen of this instrument equally well preserved, which is in the museum of the Germanic Society at Nürnberg. A third cithar in the collection I would notice, because I think it likely that it represents the "poliphant" of Queen Elizabeth. Playford, in his "Introduction to the Art of Descant," London, 1683, while extolling the musical accomplishments of Queen Elizabeth, remarks, "I have been informed by an ancient musician and her servant that she did often recreate herself on an excellent instrument called the poliphant, not much unlike a lute, but strung with wire." I have not succeeded in finding trustworthy information respecting this poliphant, (polyphon?) but I should not be surprised to learn that it was the kind of cithar just noticed. Another curious instrument with wire strings admired by our ancestors was the pandore. The name is probably known to many of your readers, but the construction of the instrument seems to be now scarcely clear to musicians. As far as I have been able to ascertain, there were three differently shaped instruments in use in England called by very much the same name, viz., the Italian pandura, the English pandore (both of which are represented in my collection), and the bandoer, which is recorded to have been invented about the year 1560 by one John Rose, a citizen of London, "living in Bridewell," but which is, in reality, only a pandura with some modifications in shape. The gittern, which by recent musicians has not unfrequently been mistaken for the cittern, had catgut strings like a guitar. Mine has ten strings, which produce five different tones, as each tone has two strings in unison. The mandoline, one of the handsomest instruments of the collection, is not very scarce, neither can I assign to it a high age. On the other hand, my mandola, exactly like the mandoline in shape, but of the size of a large lute, I consider an especially interesting acquisition, on account of its scarcity. My dulcimer, mounted with wire strings, which are struck with two little hammers, cannot claim a high age; but it is of the old stamp, and may be regarded as a faithful representation of the dulcimer mentioned in the Bible. I need hardly add, that the translators of the Bible, unacquainted with the musical instruments mentioned in the original text, adopted for them the names of those in use at their time which appeared to them to correspond most nearly with those of the Hebrews and Greeks.

I pass over my viola da gamba ("viol-de-gambos," as Sir Toby Belch calls it), and several others musically not less interesting, to my clavichord. This instrument, the precursor of the pianoforte, has not the "jacks and crowquills" of the harpsichord, spinet, and virginal, but it is provided instead with so-called tangents, i. e., little iron pins, which press under its brass strings when the keys are struck. It is well-known that Sebastian Bach, and other great composers who lived before the invention of the pianoforte, wrote for the clavichord many of their admirable fugues, gignes and sarabandes. Its tone, though but weak, is impressive, and really very pleasant and soothing; at least, I must say that I have often thoroughly enjoyed playing in the evening on the clavichord the old precious "Suites" by Bach and other great masters of the periwig age as they were intended to be played. The pitch of this instrument is more than a "whole tone" below that of our present pianoforte; and this reminds me to moot a question which, considering that the pianoforte has now-a-days become a necessary article of household furniture, may not be inopportune. One of the principal causes of the high price of a good pianoforte is said to be the power required for resisting the enormous tension of the strings, which on the largest instruments amounts to about sixteen tons. Now, if the recently proposed lower pitch should be adopted, we ought to buy our pianofortes cheaper than hitherto; and this is a by no means unimportant recommendation, in addition to others often advanced and very manifest, for the adoption of a lower pitch. But to return to the old instruments.

The musical reader will naturally ask, "How do they sound? Might they still be made effective in our present state of the art?" Allow me, therefore, to say a few words on these musically important questions. It is generally, and in my opinion very justly, admitted that in no other branch of the art of music has greater progress been made during the last century than in the construction of musical instruments. Nevertheless I cannot help thinking that we have also lost something here which might with advantage be restored. Our various instruments, by being more and more perfected, are becoming too much alike in quality of sound, or in that character of tone which Prof. Tyndall, in his "Lectures on Sound," calls "clang-tint." Every musical composer knows how much more suitable one clang-tint is for the expression of a certain emotion than another. The old instruments, imperfect though they were in many respects possessed this variety of clang-tint to a high degree. Neither were they on this account less capable of expression than our modern ones. As regards beauty in appearance, they were superior. Indeed, we have now scarcely a musical instrument which can be called beautiful. The old lutes and cithars are not only elegant in shape, but are also often very tastefully ornamented with carvings and with designs in marqueterie and painting. In confirmation of this opinion, I may also point to the musical instruments exhibited in the South Kensington Museum. There are at present about 150 instruments in the Museum, most of which are still in use; but there are also some fine specimens of antiquated ones among them, and several of these are of high interest—as, for instance, the precious Italian spinet, ornamented with jewels, of the year 1577, and Handel's harpsichord, recently presented by Messrs. Broadwood. A descriptive catalogue of this collection will shortly be published as well as photographs of the most interesting instruments in the Museum.

Most kinds of the musical instruments in use at the time of Queen Elizabeth were evidently introduced into Northern Europe from Italy and Spain. It would, however, now be futile to search in these countries for fine specimens; they are more likely to be met with in Paris and London. Signor Mario has procured several in London for his Museum of Antiquities at Florence. I have purchased most of mine from M. Chanot, in Wardour Street. It gives me pleasure to mention his name here, especially as my acknowledgment of his assistance may be useful to other collectors as well as to M. Chanot. Unimpaired specimens of these antiquated instruments are, indeed, now rarely met with; as a rule, they have been altered in the course of time to fit them to modern requirements. I should think, however, that well-preserved relics of this kind may still be stowed away in the lumber-rooms of old mansions. Perhaps this letter may have the effect of rescuing a few from oblivion. Are there not in some of the cathedrals store-rooms containing relics of articles which were used in religious performances before the time of the Reformation? Surely some such objects must have escaped demolition by religious enthusiasts. Among these relics may possibly be found the regals—a portable organ, which was used by the Roman Catholics in religious processions. There could be now no better place for the preservation of any such antiquities than the South Kensington Museum.

CARL ENGEL.

A Letter from Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy to Goethe.

(From the "Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.")

A wish has been expressed in many quarters that the letters written, with youthful reverence to Goethe, by Mendelssohn, in his long travels through Germany, Italy, Switzerland, and France, during the period from 1830 to 1832, should find their way before the public. The following letter written on the 28th August, 1831, at Lucerne, to Goethe, after Mendelssohn's return from Italy, will, therefore, as the first characteristic specimen of the youthful letters in question, which have as yet remained unknown, doubtless excite universal interest, though it can be given merely in a somewhat imperfect state. In the manuscript, as it fell, quite accidentally, into our hands, neither the name of the writer nor that of the person addressed, is given; and the same is true of the date. The object for which the letter was written, however, points pretty directly to Goethe. No wonder, consequently, that the name of Mendelssohn suggested itself, when a combination of names, so well-known to us from the Reisebriefe, as that of Engelberg, Sebastian Bach, and Wilhelm Tell, with the address: Lucerne, and the date, August, 1831, caught our attention. It is evident that the letter must have been written on some festival and holiday. Now the 28th was the only Sunday Mendelssohn spent in Lucerne. We may remark, moreover, that the 24th, which, from the letter of that day (Reisebriefe, I., 266), written at Engelberg, might be supposed to be Sunday, fell on a Wednesday, and that the service described in it was in honor of St. Bartholomew. On Thursday, the 25th, Mendelssohn went from Engelberg to Lucerne, saw there, on Friday, Weigl's Schweizerfamilie (Devrient, Reminiscences, p. 130), and, on the day following, wrote the letters to Devrient (Ibid., p. 122), and to Taubert (Reisebriefe, I., 267), in which there was consequently no mention of the performance of Tell at Lucerne. Mendelssohn must have witnessed it on the Sunday afterwards. The annexed letter was written on this Sunday, the conclusion being added after the performance. Mendelssohn's stay at Lucerne terminated on Monday, the 29th. It is probable that the present letter was the only one which Mendelssohn addressed to Goethe from Switzerland. The fact of Goethe's having had several copies made—but for which we should not have been able to lay the letter before our readers—proves that he attached a peculiar value to the descriptions it contains of the deluge-like rain, and of the performance of Tell. The parallel passages under the text are intended to direct attention to Mendelssohn's scrupulous exactness and truthfulness in the descriptions. The tone adopted towards Goethe is, it is true, a little more staid, but no less fresh than that of the Reisebriefe, though the exclusively subjective touches, which impart so much grace to the latter, are wanting.

VON LOEPER.

Lucerne (the 28th), August, 1831.

As I am to send you an account of all the principal features of my journey,* I must not neglect Switzerland, which was always the country of my predilection. I shall never forget the time I have spent wandering about the mountains on foot, all alone, without knowing anyone, and without thinking of anything, except the new and magnificent things I beheld every moment.

I came from the land of clear skies, and of warm climate; Switzerland soon announced itself very differently; I had rain, storm, and mist; I had even to submit to be snowed up frequently in the mountains.† I do not know how it was, however, but even that pleased me, and when, at times a few black rocks reared their summits out of the clouds, or a whole tract of country rose up in the sunshine from out the mist, it was something magnificent.‡ I did not, therefore, allow any storms to prevent me from clambering about, as well as I could; sometimes the guide would not accompany me; I frequently saw nothing at all, but I made the attempt notwithstanding, and then, when a fine day did come, my delight was doubled.§ It seems to me as though I felt more respect for Nature, and yet were nearer to her here than elsewhere; but the country and the people are dependent entirely upon her.

You will have heard of the fearful inundations and tremendous downfalls of rain that have devastated the Bernese Oberland; I was there at the time, and it was terrible to see how everything due to man, even those objects which were most solid, disappeared without resistance and in a moment, leaving no trace behind, just as if it had never been; roads, bridges, meadows, and houses; at the expiration of three days, all nature was again quiet and smiling, as if nothing had occurred, and the people set about restoring their works which had been destroyed, as well as they could.

I happened just at that very time to be alone, without a guide, journeying along by the Lake of Thurn.¶ Now, ever since the day that you told me about your observations on the weather, and the clouds,* I have taken a particular interest in the subject, and remarked more than once before what is going on overhead; on the present occasion, I was enabled to see exactly how the storm gradually formed. For two days clouds had been collecting, when, at length, on the evening of the 7th there was a heavy storm, which lasted, with continuous rain, all through the night; in the morning, it seemed, however, as if not rain, but clouds had come down. I had never seen clouds lying so low; they had settled, far and near, round the foot of the mountain, in the valley, quite white and thick, while the heavens above were full of black fog. For a time it did not rain, until the clouds underneath began moving, and shifting backwards and forwards; the rain then recommenced, lasting the whole day and the whole night, but it was not until the third morning, the 9th,‡ that the masses, properly so called, had collected, the entire extent of the horizon and of the heavens being filled by them. As you generally see a storm rise in a clear sky, so, on the present occasion, one host of clouds was piled on the other, and passed over the country from the flat land in the northwest into the mountains on the south-east. It was utterly impossible to distinguish the opposite shores of the Lake;§ in the interval that one layer of clouds had passed, it did not rain, but it began then from the next, in a moment, and with indescribable fury. All the footpaths were now under water; the springs ran in all directions over the roads, and the mountain streams foamed madly down; they were quite dark brown;|| it seemed as if various kinds of dark earth were leaping over each other in the bed of the flood, and dashing into the Lake; you could see the dark streaks for a long distance in the clear waters of the latter. The smaller bridges were all carried away in the morning; the piers and arches of the larger stone ones were torn asunder; and a stream from the woods bore objects for household use and furniture into the Lake,* but it was not then known where the houses had been destroyed. The following day, when it left off raining, on my entering the valley of Lauterbrunn, the broad carriage-road had disappeared; a confused heap of stones, sand, and blocks of rock† covered for a quarter of a mile the ground it once occupied. The same misfortune visited on that day nearly the whole country, the Gotthard, Unterwalden, Glarus, etc. It was sometimes difficult to go forward; and I had to walk over the mountains because the water had not left a dry spot in the valley; but it was, for this reason, all the more beautiful in the mountains.

I spent the last week in an Unterwald monastery, Engelberg,‡ many thousand feet above the sea, in a perfect solitude. I found there a fine organ, and some friendly monks. They had never heard of Sebastian Bach, and it struck them as something quite strange when I played them two or three of his fugues; they were pleased, moreover, to say that I must perform the duties of organist on the festival,§ accompany the mass, and execute the responsories; it was the first respectable organ that I had had under my hands for some time, for in Italy I did not meet with one in anything like decent condition. The monks possess, also, a fine library; politics, strangers, and newspapers never penetrate into that part of the valley, so I spent a pleasant time there. The weather, too, has cleared up, and, at present, especially, it seems as though nature wished to celebrate the day and rejoice. There is the brightest blue sky, the mountains have decked themselves out in the lightest colors, and the landscape has put on a joyous holiday look, as though they knew what festival it was.||

I have just returned from the theatre, the only one in Switzerland, where they performed Schiller's Wilhelm Tell; as the Diet is holding its sittings here, the Swiss make an exception to their custom: rather to have no theatre at all than a bad one. As it is the only one in the country, allow me to say a few words about the patriotic performance. There are only about ten persons in the entire company, and the stage is as large and high as a moderate-sized room; still they were anxious to give the grand folk's scenes. So two men in peaked hats represented Gessler's host, and two others, in round hats, the Swiss country people; none of the subordinate personages made their appearance at all. Whatever they had to say of importance they omitted without ceremony, and quietly went on with the next words of their part, without any connection, a circumstance sometimes producing comic results. Some of the actors had learnt only the sense, which they turned, on the spur of the moment, into verse themselves: Gessler's crier tore the drum from his button-hole the first time he gave the instrument a blow, so that it fell to the ground and could not be made fast again, to the great delight of the liberty-loving public, who laughed heartily at the slave of the tyrant; yet with all this, the piece was not to be killed, and produced its effect. When the well-known names and places, which one had seen the day previous, came under their notice, all the audience were delighted, nudging each other, and pointing to the pasteboard lake, although they could see the real one, which was far better, by going out of the theatre. The person who afforded the greatest satisfaction, however, was Gessler, because he behaved very rudely, ranting and raving furiously; he looked like a drunken mechanic, with his tangled beard, red nose, and cap on one side; the whole affair was exceedingly Arcadian and primitive, like the infancy of the drama.

The Lower Rhenish Festival of 1869.

(Correspondence of the London Musical World.)

The forty-sixth "Niederrheinisches Musikfest" took place at the Festival of Whitsuntide at Düsseldorf. As a sketch of the foundation and progress of these meetings has been on more than one occasion given in these columns, it is hardly necessary again to enter into historical details as to their origin and their gradual development into the most interesting triennial cycle of musical festivals in Europe. Suffice it to say that they were instituted in 1818, since which year they have been held at Elberfeld, Düsseldorf, Aix-la-Chapelle, or Cologne, and that since 1860 they have occurred in unbroken triennial alternation at the last three places. Of these, Düsseldorf, whether considered historically, artistically, or locally, claims precedence in interest and association. For, in the first respect, it is at Düsseldorf where these meetings have most frequently been held, and where the first one, in 1818, took place. It was at Düsseldorf where the most important works were produced; for instance, Mendelssohn's St. Paul in 1836, and Schumann's D minor and B flat symphonies, respectively in 1853 and 1860. And with this town are the names of these two greatest composers since Beethoven closely associated, both masters, as well as Rietz and Hiller, having here been music-directors. Four of the Düsseldorf festivals were conducted by Mendelssohn, who also directed at Cologne in 1835 and 1838, and at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1846. In the second place, Düsseldorf is the centre of a district in which perhaps a stronger artistic feeling prevails than in any part of Northern Europe, and shares with Munich, whither its famed collection of pictures was removed in 1805, the honor of possessing the best school of modern painting in Germany. During the present month no less than five exhibitions of native talent are open in this comparatively small town—namely, one at the Tonhalle, another the "annual exhibition of the Art-Union of Rhineland and Westphalia," a third, to which the pictures are all presented by the exhibitors, for a bazaar in aid of the funds of the Roman Catholic hospital, and also two permanent exhibitions. So that the attractions to those who visit this place at the time of "Pflingsten, das liebliche Frühlingsfest," are on this account alone in no slight degree enhanced. But independently of these advantages Düsseldorf is a far more suitable and pleasant locale than either Cologne or Aix for these delightful musical congresses, for in consequence of its beautiful environs and famed public gardens—in which, inspired perhaps by the frequent visits here of Jenny Lind, the nightingales take up the song when it ceases at the evening concerts, and continue it the whole night long—and on account also of other attractions here at spring-tide, Düsseldorf is always at this season thronged with holiday folk who come in from the neighborhood to keep joyously and religiously the three days of the great Whitsuntide Festival. Again, Düsseldorf has for the last three years possessed a "Tonhalle" accommodating 4,000 persons, and admirable as to acoustic effect, which, with its adjacent rooms and spacious garden, is superior to most buildings of the kind, and considerably so to the "Kurhaus" at Aix, or the "Gürzenich" at Cologne. In this splendid new building, which was last week brilliantly illuminated and tastefully decorated with festoons and evergreens, a fine organ has recently been erected by Schulze, which contains three manuals and forty stops, and is worthy of the first builder in Germany.

This year's Festival has been a brilliant one; the selection and performance of the music as worthy as usual of the occasion, and the receipts, a secondary matter with the Germans, have been about 15,000 thalers, a large figure considering the reasonable price of tickets for the best places—namely, six shillings for each concert, a sum which cannot fail to remind an Englishman of the exorbitant price in his own country for hearing music less artistic, less rehearsed, and less well performed. The admission to the three preliminary rehearsals was one shilling, and to the three dress rehearsals two shillings. As has been stated on former occasions, these "Proben" conduce very much to the interest of a German festival, affording opportunity to musicians of hearing how the most effective readings of great works are brought out and communicated to band and chorus by a first-rate musician such as Dr. Julius Rietz, Hofkapellmeister of Dresden, who, on this occasion as well as at several previous Rhine Festivals, was commander-in-chief. The local conductor was Herr Tausch, a composer and pianist of much ability, and music-director at Düsseldorf. The orchestra, selected from some of the chief towns in Prussia, numbered 134 players—viz., 50 violins, 19 violas, 19 violoncellos, 13 double basses, 4 flutes, 4 oboes, 4 clarinets, 4 bassoons, 6 horns, 4 trumpets, 4 trombones, 1 ophicleide, 1 drum, 1 triangle. The chorus, supplied from Düsseldorf, Elberfeld, Cologne, Aix, Bonn, Essen, Crefeld, Gladbach, Dortmund, Wesel, Rotterdam, Mulheim, Emden, Dessau, Barmen, Cleve, Erkelenz, Carlsruhe, Detmold, &c., consisted of 220 sopranos, 175 altos, 123 tenors, and 192 basses—in all 710 voices. The total number of performers was 854. The soloists were Mme. Bollingrath (née Wagner), soprano, of Dresden; Mme. Jenny Soltans, soprano, of Cassel; Mme. Joachim, contralto, of Berlin; Herr Vogl, tenor, of Munich; Herr Carl Hill, bass, Schwerin; Herr Grützmacher, violoncellist, of Dresden; and Herr Joachim, violin. At the organ Herr Knappe, of Düsseldorf, presided with great ability; his accompaniments were never intrusive, and instead of merely doubling or overloading the orchestral parts, as is too often done in England, he played an independent part, and gave to the general tone of the orchestra a new and mellow tint, often producing novel and charming effects of combination, and proving that "Pope and Emperor" (as Hector Berlioz aptly calls organ and orchestra) may be on friendly terms, especially if the former be subservient to the latter. Throughout the performances the organ was, if the expression be admissible, not heard, but felt. Much tact in handling the instrument having also been noticed at the Rhenish Festival at Cologne, last year, when Herr Weher was the accompanist, and at Aix in 1867, when Herr Breuning presided, special reference is here made to the fact, as it must be confessed that in respect to use of the organ at English festivals there is often considerable room for improvement, and that on this point, as well as in many other matters musical, we might take a hint from our Teutonic neighbors.

The band, led by Japha of Cologne and Röntgen of Leipsic, was magnificent. Such orchestral playing is not attained chez nous. It may have been approached at Birmingham festivals, on which occasions the strings are so numerous and so efficient, and in some respects by the orchestra under Herr Manns' admirable direction at the Crystal Palace Saturday Winter Concerts, or by Herr Hallé's justly famed band at Manchester. But, when considered as a whole, the performances at Düsseldorf appeared to us far in advance of those realized by our three best orchestras, and quite up to the standard of excellence attained at Berlin, Leipsic, or Vienna. The chorus was in its way as efficient as the splendid band which supported it. "Never," said Charles Klingemann, writing to England of the seventh Düsseldorf festival—"never did I hear such chorus singing. All the singers, with the exception of the soloists, were amateurs, as also the greater number of the instrumental performers. It is this circumstance which gives to this festival its peculiar excellence and beauty. From all the neighboring towns, and the whole country round, the dilettanti were gathering, arriving in steam-boats and eisenwegen—not to toil at an irksome, ill-paid task, but for a great musical field-day, full of soul and song. All ranks and ages uniting for the one harmonious end. . . . Add to this love of the art, the good training, a well-cultivated taste, and general knowledge of music, and it is explained how they produce such an effect. You felt the life, the pulsation of this music; for their hearts and understandings were in it. It was here, in this chorus, and in this band, that public opinion resided; the audience listened and enjoyed, but the amateur performers really constituted the festival." These remarks by Mendelssohn's intimate friend concerning the meeting of 1836 apply with no less force to that of 1869.

The programme of the first evening was the oratorio, Joshua, by Handel, and symphony, No. 7 (A major), by Beethoven. The first of these works, which was composed in the year 1747, has received a fair share of the neglect and indifference shown to many of the master's oratorios in the country wherein they were produced. It seems to have been performed four times in London in the following year, 1748, and three times in 1752, after which we can find no record concerning it until 1839, when it was given twice, and again twice in 1842, under Mr. Surman's direction, who has done so much for the promulgation of Handel's less known oratorios, at Exeter Hall. For the latter performances, Mr. G. Perry wrote additional accompaniments. The oratorio was also given in 1846, under the same direction, and again in 1849 and in 1854, the number of times of its performances thus being fourteen during 122 years. It has been selected at four of the Rhenish Festivals—in 1838, 1845, 1861, and 1869. On the first of these occasions, it was performed under Mendelssohn's direction, according to the original score, with organ accompaniment; in 1845, it was conducted by Rietz, who added additional accompaniments, which were used in 1861, and at the Festival under notice. It is unnecessary here to give a detailed account of a work which probably has not been heard, nor, it is to be feared, is likely to be heard by our readers. Should it be revived, and should it be our lot to notice the occasion, the acquaintance made last week with its many beauties will be serviceable, and experience gained by hearing it so carefully rehearsed will be recorded. It is enough now to say that the oratorio is one of Handel's great works, although, as in Samson, some recitatives and duets might be omitted without disadvantage; that the performance was superb and excited great enthusiasm, and that Mme. Joachim, as Othniel, and Herr Carl Hill, as Caleb, were all that could be wished. These two artists, respectively, contralto and bass, are great in oratorio. Mme. Joachim is now considered one of the first oratorio singers in Germany, and at the Festival she certainly bore away the palm. Her voice is of excellent quality, and throughout its entire register is equally good, and her style is pure and broad, as might be expected from the illustrious name she bears. Although his voice is lower and less flexible than that of our great baritone, in style and appearance, Herr Hill resembles Mr. Sanley, and is a thorough artist. His singing of Schumann's songs is second only to that of Stockhausen, and has been recorded by us as admirable at previous Rhine Festivals. The other soloists, Mme. Soltans (Othniel) and Herr Vogl (Joshua), were hardly up to the mark in oratorio singing, their style, especially that of the Munich tenor, being tinged with an operatic flavor. Beethoven's glorious symphony, No. 7, which has been given at eight of these festivals since 1823, should have been played the next day; as such a symphony after a long oratorio, even with an hour's interval in the enjoyable garden adjoining the "Tönnhalle," is almost too much for mortal ears. This concert lasted altogether nearly five hours, and the heat in the hall was excessive. The performance, however, of Beethoven's grand music was, with the exception of that at the rehearsal the previous day, the finest we have heard. The three first movements were as near perfection as could be imagined, but Rietz, probably feeling the concert to be far too long, took the finale at such tremendous speed that, although no want of clearness in the most rapid passages was noticed as played by that marvellous orchestra, it was felt that this extraordinary movement was being played quicker than the composer intended.

The programme of the concert on Whit-Monday was as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber.
"Magnificat".....Bach.
"Spring," and "Autumn," Nos. 1 and 3 from the Seasons.....Haydn.
"Lobgesang," Sinfonia cantata.....Mendelssohn.

Weber's greatest overture was played à merveille, and almost encored. The most important and interesting selection on this or any of the festival days was Bach's glorious setting of the Song of the Blessed Virgin. This work, which is in the loftiest regions of choral music, was last given at Aix in 1864. Why, as we have asked on previous occasions, are these grand choral works of Sebastian Bach systematically ignored in England? As regards some of his cantatas, of which there are said to be some 400, there might be a difficulty as to translation of the German text, and as to additional orchestral parts; but in the case of this superb Magnificat, neither of these difficulties exist, as the original Latin words could be sung, and additional accompaniments, which were used on this occasion, have been ably added by Robert Franz. If such a work as this were in the programme of the Worcester or Norwich Festivals which are to be held in September, special interest would at once attach itself to these two meetings. Much might be written concerning the six sublime choruses in this noble composition, and it seems useless to attempt to convey to those wholly unacquainted with the majesty of Bach as a choral writer any adequate idea of the effect he produces. It must suffice to mention the stupendous choral following the "Ecce enim ex hoc beatum me dicent"—when the whole choir burst in with the nominative case, "Omnes, omnes, generationes," on which words alone a masterly fugal chorus is constructed, and also to specify the force of the treatment of the passage, "et dispersit superbos," with which the next chorus with a "diminished seventh" on the dominant of F sharp minor so suddenly concludes, and the subsequent magnificent adagio at "Memento cordis sui," in which the modulations and progressions in sustained harmony equal in sublimity anything—not forgetting instances in Israel in Egypt—which can be called to mind. The six solos were well given, and the chorus, "Suscepit Israel puerum suum," which is indicated to be sung by all the soprani and alti, was, probably on account of its difficulty, assigned to Meses. Bellingrath, Soltans, and Joachim. Considerable enthusiasm was manifested, especially after the choruses above specified, and after an admirable rendering of the fine fugue a 5 voci, "Sicut locutus es." Little need be added as to the rest of the second day's programme, as the two lighter works which followed—viz., Haydn's genial Seasons and Mendelssohn's popular Hymn of Praise—are stock favorites with us. Both of these were performed far better than on any previous occasion in our recollection, and it was particularly interesting to hear the Lobgesang in the place where Mendelssohn himself so carefully rehearsed and conducted it in 1842, when his intimate friend Rietz was also, as last week, conductor.

The following was the selection at the "artists' concert," originated by Mendelssohn as a supplementary performance on the third day of the Feast:

Overture, "Anacreon".....Chernblin.
Air from "Euryanthe," Herr Vogl.....Weber.
Violin Concerto, Herr Joachim.....Beethoven.
Recitative and air from "Iphigenia," Herr Hill.....Gluck.
Songs, Mme. Joachim, { "To the Lyre".....Schubert.
                                  { "Ewig Liebe".....Brahms.
Choruses from the "Seasons".....Haydn.
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven.
Air from "Rilsh," Mme. Bellingrath.....Mendelssohn.
Violoncello concerto, Herr Grillmacher.....Schumann.
Piano and air from "Freischütz," Mme. Soltans.....Weber.
Barcarole and scherzo for violin, Herr Joachim.....Rohr.
Songs, Mme. Del.....{ "Im Wald".....Hiller.
                                  { "Ich wandre nicht".....Schumann.
Bass air, Herr Hill, and Choruses from "Joshua," Handel.

Here was a superb selection. Herr Vogl received an ovation—as, indeed, did each artist. On the appearance of Joachim there was a flourish of drums and trumpets, and flowers were thrown by the chorus singers, which the great player—to the delight of the audience—handed to Mme. Joachim, who happened to be within reach. On the conclusion of the concerto, which he never played better, and which we never heard so well accompanied, another demonstration took place, and a wreath was amongst the offerings to the shrine of his genius. Hardly less enthusiasm was elicited on the appearance of Mme. Joachim, who sang Schubert's setting of the translation from Anacreon and Brahms's new song so well as to be encored, when she gave Schumann's exquisite "Ich grolle nicht." Hill's singing of the very trying recitative, &c., of Gluck evinced high dramatic power, and his delivery of "Shall I Mamre's fertile plain" was in a different way as admirable. The concerto of Schumann was wonderfully played by the great Dresden violoncellist, and after more ovations to Soltans and Bellingrath and to Joachim, and the coronation of Rietz with a large laurel wreath, the Festival came to a worthy conclusion with a repetition of the two finest choruses in Joshua, "Hail, mighty Joshua," and—

"For all these mercies we will sing Eternal praise to Heaven's high King."

The performances were honored with the presence of her Royal Highness the Princess of Hohen-Zollern, her Royal Highness the Princess (jun.) of Hohen-Zollern, his Royal Highness Prince Frederick of Russia, and the Prince of Holstein. Amongst musical celebrities were observed Ferdinand Hiller, and Franz Weber of Cologne, Samuel of Brussels, Schornstein of Elberfeld, Grimm of Munster, Verhulst of Amsterdam, Lindhult of Stockholm, Reinthaler of Bremen, Breunung of Aix-la-Chapelle, &c.

One of the most interesting features in connection with this Festival was an invitation from Joachim to hear the performance and the composition of a youth of fourteen of extraordinary promise—Julius Röntgen, son of Röntgen of Leipsic who led the first violins. This talented boy played on the pianoforte three preludes and fugues for organ by himself, in F minor, E flat major, and E minor, each of which exhibits a rare knowledge of counterpoint and an intimate acquaintance with the best models of ancient and modern art. He also performed some variations on an original theme in A flat, of remarkable excellence, and as the composition of a mere child almost magical. But the most astonishing effort of this precocious, though at the same time entirely childlike and unsophisticated young genius, is a Duo for violin and viola in three movements, which was performed by Joachim and Röntgen senior, the interesting young composer, whose head did not reach the top of the desks, standing by these two great artists, and turning over for them, in entire oblivion of the audience present, and evidently wrapped up heart and soul in his new work. The boy's face and his inspired look as if he had caught a ray of the afflatus divinus, and indeed the whole scene (which would be an apt subject for a painter) is not likely to be forgotten by those present, especially if Julius Röntgen should one day become, as Joachim thinks not unlikely, one of the great masters.

The Whitsuntide weather was propitious, but when the last note of Tuesday's performance had ceased, Nature put off her festive appearance, and wept at the conclusion of the Festival; and the nightingales followed suit and were mute that night. No one, we think, who "assisted" on this memorable occasion could leave Düsseldorf and its artistic atmosphere without regret, and without re-echoing the hearty greeting which musicians gave on parting—Auf Wiedersehen im nächsten Jahre in Aachen.

Handel and Haydn Society.—President's Report.

At the annual meeting of the Handel and Haydn Society, on Monday evening, May 31, the following report was made by Dr. J. BAXTER UPHAM, the President:

Gentlemen: As is my custom, and in compliance with the requirements of the By-Laws of the Society, I respectfully submit my

ANNUAL REPORT.

Prominent among the great choral societies of the world stand the Sing-Akademie of Berlin, the Sacred Harmonic Society of London, and the Handel and Haydn Society of our own city. In naming them I ought more properly to place this association second in the list, since it belongs there in precedence of time, and, I may add, in its influence on the musical taste and culture of a populous community. Adopting this order, then, they were founded, respectively, in 1791, 1815, and 1832.

Some curious coincidences appear in the early history and subsequent career of these widely separated but kindred associations; and these points of resemblance or parallelism (they may perhaps be called) between this society and its German prototype are especially noticeable. Both had their origin in the felt need of some organized association for the promotion of a higher and better taste in music by the practice of the great masterpieces of choral song. That, like ours, sprang from a smaller society of similar nature which preceded it by only a few years, and died away. The number of its original members was twenty-eight—ours was thirty-one. Its growth for the first half century of its existence was precisely after the manner of our own. At the celebration of its fiftieth anniversary, which took place with great pomp in the month of May, 1841, two or three of its original subscribers still lived; the number of its active associates (chorists of both sexes included) was 618, and its roll of membership, from the founding of the society to that date, comprised about 2000 names. At our fiftieth anniversary, twenty-four years later, the facts and statistics presented, it will be remembered, were singularly identical. Such and in so far, indeed, it is our own record, almost line for line and word for word.

Our London contemporary had a similar origin. "It rose into existence (says its historian, Mr. Bowley) to satisfy a public want." "The low state of choral music in London at that time," he continues, "would hardly be believed by the young amateur of the present day: one small but venerable institution, the Cecilian Society—if a few half-private associations be excepted—was all that could be found." In the first year of its existence the financial means of the Sacred Harmonic Society were so limited that for a time, says Mr. Bowley, its dissolution appeared to be inevitable. Singularly enough, the number of its subscribing members at the first, like our own, was just thirty-one. But here the parallel ceases. It is not to be wondered at, that in the literary and commercial metropolis of the world, with a population ten times larger, this London society, once upon its legs, should soon outstrip both its Berlin and Boston competitors in the race; and that, in the 37th year of its life, it numbers its more than 700 active members and subscribers, and boasts of its 500 public performances; of its gigantic fêtes and festivals, attended by an aggregate of a million and a half of auditors; of its fund of £5000; its orchestral library and library of reference, the revised catalogue of which latter covers 320 pages 8vo; its rare manuscripts, its musical instruments, its paintings and its statuary. All honor to the devotion and energy and enterprise of the founders and managers of this noble institution! We rejoice in its well earned prosperity and success.

Turning again for a moment to the Sing-Akademie of Berlin, it is interesting to notice how wide-spread and democratic a hold it has upon the affections of the whole community.

I find on its catalogue of members representatives of every profession and honorable occupation and calling—divines, philosophers, diplomatists, lawyers, physicians, professors in the universities and schools of art and technology, kapellmeisters and composers,—the élite of the social circle of Berlin,—staid citizens, young men and maidens, students, tradesmen, artisans,—in amicable and harmonious union. The honored name of Felix Mendelssohn appears for nine years on the list of tenors, at the same time with that of his distinguished father Abram Mendelssohn, who for forty years sang among the basses. Otto Nicolai, the composer, was likewise included with the bassi profondi; and Henrietta Sonntag and her sister lifted up their angelic voices with the sopranos. Here, also, in the ranks of the chorus, were Meyerbeer and Grell and Reissiger and Schneider and Seidel and a host of others known to fame—examples worthy of imitation to any who may deem the sphere of chorus singing below the level of their superior powers—inconsistent with their aspirations for a great renown.

But I must not dwell on these attractive themes. My duty is rather to review with you the practical operations of the year in connection with our own domestic circle, and present in brief an abstract of the doings of the Society for the past season, with such suggestions and recommendations as seem applicable to the occasion.

As appears from the Secretary's records, the government have been fourteen times called together during the year to attend to the artistic and business interests of the corporation. During the same period the Society have been three times summoned for the admission of members and the transaction of other business. Thirty-nine gentlemen have been admitted to membership, sixteen have been discharged, five have resigned, and none, so far as I am aware, have died.

The regular rehearsals were commenced in Burnside Hall on the 4th day of October, and have continued, weekly or oftener, until the 16th of the present month. The number of these rehearsals, thirty-nine in all, if we except the Festival seasons, is greater than for any previous year since my connection with the Society; and, on the whole, the attendance has been better than ever before. How much of this is due to the practice recommended a year since, of indicating the rehearsals attended upon the cards of the members at the door I shall not now stop to inquire. The plan has certainly operated well and deserves to be permanently established. Whether, in addition, some means of registering the particular rehearsal attended should not be adopted I leave it to your good judgment to decide. Surely any means which can add to the efficiency of our regular rehearsals merits your careful consideration.

Seven public performances have been given in the Music Hall during the season, of which the following is the programme:

November 28th—Handel's "Judas Macabæus."
November 29th—Mendelssohn's "Elijah."
December 26th—Handel's "Messiah."
December 27th—Mendelssohn's "Elijah."
March 27th—Costa's "Naaman."
March 28th—Mendelssohn's "St. Paul."
May 20th—Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise."

This last in connection with the Harvard Musical and Boston Music Hall Associations in furtherance of the fund for the establishment of the normal (French) diapason.

To these should be added the very interesting and satisfactory programme of the Stabat Mater on the evening of May 21st, by the full chorus of the Society, in aid of the parting testimonial to our distinguished townswoman (Miss Adelaide Phillips) in praise of whose modest worth, of whose generous nature, and genius, and artistic culture, too much can hardly be said.

The following are the principal vocalists who have given their aid to the society in these public performances, all of whom (which can rarely be said) were taken from the ranks of our resident artists:

Miss Adelaide Phillips, Miss J. E. Houston, Miss Lizzie M. Gates, Miss A. S. Whitten, Mrs. Flora Barry, Mrs. D. C. Hall, Mr. Jas. Whitney, Messrs. W. J. and J. F. Winch, Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen, Mr. H. Wildo, Mr. M. W. Whitney.

The works above enumerated have received much and careful preparation on the part of the society, and have been presented with the usual liberal expenditure of means, without regard to the pecuniary results.

If I were to particularize the performances which seem to me to demand especial praise, I should mention the repetition of "Elijah" at Christmas, and the "St. Paul" at Easter, on both of which occasions a crowded audience testified their high appreciation of the more than usual excellence with which these great works were performed. Per contra, the rendering of "Judas Macabæus,"—the first in the series of the winter concerts,—is placed by general consent among the poorest of the Society's public attempts for many years; and the November performance of "St. Paul," three years since, falls somewhat into the same category. Is this a coincidence, merely? or is it a natural consequence of the reaction which follows upon the excitement and unusual effort of the great festival week of the preceding spring? The latter, to some degree at any rate, may be the true explanation.

The interest which centres upon such special occasions, and the extra effort of an enlarged chorus and orchestra to give them éclat and a brilliant success would naturally dispose to subsequent inaction and indifference, and so these festivals, much as they are sought after and enjoyed by the public, and greatly as they have contributed to the reputation of the society, may retard for a time our steady every-day progress. A conscientious determination on the part of every member to resist such influence is therefore necessary, or an apparent benefit may be turned into a real detriment. This leads me to refer again to a subject before mentioned in my annual reports, viz.: the expediency, on future occasions of this sort, of relying more exclusively upon the materials we may possess within our limits. This will be possible now more than ever before, so far as choral ability is concerned.

I wish our orchestral resources were such as to warrant my saying as much for that department of a great festival occasion.

The monitorial plan, adopted for the first time at the Triennial Festival last May, has now become a feature of our public performances, although as yet, in some respects, faulty. I doubt not, with due attention, it can be made a success. A decided improvement is also to be recorded in the order and discipline of the Society in passing to their places in the choir in the large hall. This is mainly to be attributed to the present practice of numbering the seats of the chorus, in both the upper and the lower halls, so that each member may at all times know and occupy his own appropriate place. Our thanks are due to the gentlemanly corps of superintendents who have so efficiently carried out the details of this system and have so satisfactorily marshalled the several departments of the choir.

The financial results of the operations of the Society for the year, I regret to add, show a balance on the wrong side. The funds, however, in the treasury at the beginning of the season, added to the receipts for the year, have so far made up the deficiency as to obviate the necessity of calling for either a loan or an assessment.

The library, as appears from the report of our excellent Librarian, is in good condition. The number of volumes has been increased by the addition of the required quota for the new oratorio "Naaman," which has been added to our repertoire during the year.

The library room, adjoining this hall, has proved to us a great comfort and convenience. But we still miss upon the catalogue many of the works of the great composer from whom this society takes its name. I could wish that ere long a complete collection of Handel's oratorios could be added to the list we already possess. For the first time our shelves now show a nucleus of the choral compositions of Seb. Bach. It is to be hoped that this also will be extended till it comprises at least the Passions-music and the Magnificat in G of this great author. Of the mass music of Haydn, Beethoven and Mozart and the additional Psalms of Mendelssohn I will not speak. All this, we confidently believe, will come in good time.

I am happy to announce that the task of preparing the annals of the Society for publication has been committed to competent hands, and is now in process of completion. I have in times past pointed out freely, and as I hope, candidly and impartially, such faults and shortcomings of the Society as have come to my notice. That those defects have been entirely overcome, I do not presume to assert. The standard of excellence for choral performances in our community is advancing year by year, and that degree of excellence which, a few years since, might have been looked upon with complacency, would by no means be deemed satisfactory by us now. Other choral organizations are springing up in this community and in neighboring cities, which, in their public performances of the same great works, challenge a near comparison with our own, and the increased attention given to musical education, as shown in the recent remarkable exhibition of that department of our Public School system, as well as in the occasional concerts of the two great Conservatories of Music, warn us to be yet more critical in our judgment of ourselves.

Something more can be done for the better balancing of the chorus, and in adding to the numerical force of our association especial care in this particular should hereafter be taken. I have previously ventured the assertion that the limit of our active members might, for the present, be properly fixed at 600. And by this I mean that number of really competent, co-operating and well trained voices. It would be much better, in my opinion, to add to the efficiency and excellence of our numbers within that limit than to attempt to go beyond. How this can best be done is a problem I will leave to the incoming Board to solve. Better by far eliminate, if need be, existing incompetent material by rigidly enforcing the exactions of our by-laws as to punctuality and regularity of attendance at rehearsals, and by raising at once and decidedly the standard of requirements in the examination of new candidates, than to court an extension of our forces at the risk of the dilution of their efficiency and power.

With this anniversary closes the eighth year of my official connection with our venerable association. In this term of eight years the society has gone through some of its most trying experiences, and it has known some of the most joyous and triumphant eras of its history. It has seen the last of its original members, the remnant of that heroic band who upheld the honor and bore the burden of its struggling infancy, drop into the tomb. It has passed into and out of the cloud of rebellious war, the like of which the world had never known before, and in which it bore its share of the general doubt and uncertainty and gloom.

On the other hand it has seen the creation of a fund upon a secure and substantial basis, with encouraging prospects of its continued increase. It has established a series of triennial festivals with a success so signal and unqualified as to give assurance of their permanency as an institution. It has but recently, as has been said, joined with our sister associations in art to arrest and bring back to a safe anchorage the musical pitch, which in these latter years of storm and excitement had drifted so wide of its moorings. It has crossed the boundary line of its first half century of life, and is now in the maturity of its strength, never before so conscious of its own power, never so honored and so loved, never so ready and so able to do battle for the noble cause to whose interests it stands pledged.

For myself I deem it most fortunate,—providential indeed,—that, in all this term of service, so little change has occurred in the organization of the Society. Our conductor and organist, both without their superior, have manfully stood by us. The Executive of the Board of Government, with the exception of the treasuryship—made vacant by the death of our esteemed associate, Mr. Matthew Parker—has remained unbroken. Our beloved vice-president, so suddenly stricken down in the prime and vigor of his useful life, will now, we venture to hope, ere long be restored to us again in the fullness of health. And in all these years, with no reservation that deserves a second thought, harmony and good feeling have prevailed,—almost an identity in matters of taste and of judgement, and the same kindness and courtesy and good will on your part, gentlemen, command my grateful appreciation.

In conclusion, will you accept once more for yourselves individually, and for the Society whose honor you have done so much to uphold, my earnest wishes for your happiness and prosperity.

Musical Festivals—Their Rise in England.

Musical Festivals, upon a grand scale, with Oratorio, may properly be said to have begun with the Handel Commemoration in Westminster Abbey, in 1784. Dr. Burney, who chronicles the events of those five days (May 26th, 27th, 29th, and June 3d and 5th) in a sumptuous quarto volume, with all his glowing enthusiasm, and his elegant and scholarly garrulity, (the book is now rare,) took great pains to ascertain if there were any record of an earlier musical feast in any country in which as many as 500 performers were united, and could discover none. A few instances are named of gatherings of two or three hundred singers and musicians on some royal or national occasions in Paris, Rome, or Venice, but the elements of a grand organic musical festival scarcely existed before Handel. There was no orchestra, upon which all must centre; and even Handel's orchestra, and such as they had at that centennial of his birth, was but a rude and imperfect agglomeration compared with the grand orchestra of our day. Several of the periodical Festivals, now celebrated on so vast a scale in England, had their small beginnings earlier than the Handel Commemoration. The Annual Meetings of the three Choirs of Worcester, Hereford and Gloucester, commenced in 1724; the Birmingham Triennial Festival (now the most famous), in 1778. But the Commemoration of Handel brought together 525 musicians—a moderate number for our day.

Nothing but the influence of Handel's music, and the general love and reverence especially for his "Messiah," made such an occasion possible. "Handel's Church music had been kept alive, and had supported life in thousands, by its performance for charitable purposes." The hospitals and infirmaries throughout the kingdom were "indebted to the art of music, and to Handel's works in particular, for their support. His "Messiah" alone, as performed under his own direction in the last ten years of his life, (1749-59,) yielded about £7,000 to the Foundling Hospital, which was increased by subsequent performances until the year 1777 to over £10,000. That very Westminster Abbey Festival gave £1,000 to the Westminster Hospital, and £6,000 to the Society for Decayed Musicians, to which Handel had already bequeathed £1,000 at his death. Thus, besides its direct influence on the hearts and minds of men, the music of Handel has been one of the world's great charities; for charity is still the end of all the great festivals, at Birmingham and elsewhere, into which his music breathed the breath of life.

From Burney's book we glean some curious particulars about the Commemoration in Westminster Abbey. The proportions of choir and orchestra were singular; there were 250 instruments to 275 singers.

The orchestra itself was strangely composed; he gives a list of 26 players of the hautboy, and 26 bassoons and one double bassoon! These instruments were much cultivated in Handel's time. There were no clarinets. The other elements were: 48 first violins, 47 second violins, 26 tenors, 21 violoncellos, 15 double basses, 6 flutes, 12 trumpets, 6 "trombones or sacbuts," 12 horns, 3 kettle-drums, 1 double kettle-drum.

The Choir consisted of 60 Trebles, most of whom were boys, (thus the list includes "three Master Ashleys," "ten Chapel boys," "Master Latter," "Master Loader," "Mrs. Love," "ten St. Paul's boys," "Master Piper," &c., &c.); 48 Counter Tenors (men), instead of our contralti; 83 Tenors; 84 Basses. The famous German prima donna, Mme. Mara, sang the great soprano airs in the "Messiah." The conductor was Joah Bates, Esq., who played the organ, seated at a keyboard nineteen feet in front of the organ itself, in the middle, and in full view of the performers; he he was aided by two violin "leaders," but there was no beating of time; the whole "moved like clock-work," without such aid. The scene, as described by Burney, must have been magnificent.

The music performed was all by Handel, and consisted, besides the "Messiah" twice, of the "Dettingen Te Deum," and miscellaneous selections from his vocal and instrumental works, arias from his operas, hautboy concertos, organ fugues, overtures to other oratorios, &c. This so set the example of all miscellaneous programmes, that we find in all the English festivals from that time until the Sacred Harmonic Society was established in 1832, scarcely an instance of a complete oratorio of Handel being given, with the exception of the "Messiah."

The influence of such festivals in England may be judged by the following table of all that were held, down to the time of the first great Handel Festival in the Crystal Palace, 1857, with estimates of the aggregate attendance upon each.

6 Westminster Abbey.....	1784 to 1791.....	60,000
1 ditto.....	1834.....	20,000
4 York Minster.....	1823 to 1835.....	90,000
4 Edinburgh.....	1813 to 1843.....	32,000
11 Norwich.....	1824 to 1854.....	88,000
17 Birmingham.....	1769 to 1829.....	180,000
8 ditto in Town Hall.....	1834 to 1855.....
4 Chester.....	1806 to 1829.....
7 Derby.....	1810 to 1831.....
1 Dublin.....	1831.....	100,000
8 Liverpool.....	1813 to 1848.....
2 Manchester.....	1828 & 1829.....
2 Bradford.....	1853 & 1856.....
132 Three Choirs of Gloucester, Hereford, &c.....	1724 to 1856.....	370,000

This makes a total of 1,000,000 persons as the entire number presents upon all these occasions. The Sacred Harmonic Society in 1832, originated a regular series of performances of Handel's Oratorios in London, on a scale equal to that of the Festivals of former years. Between June 1836 and June 1856 this Society had given 344 performances in Exeter Hall, which, it is estimated, were attended in the aggregate by 650,000 persons. One half of these 344 performances consisted of entire Oratorios of Handel, embracing the "Messiah," "Israel in Egypt," "Judas Maccabæus," "Samson," "Solomon," "Joshua," "Saul," "Jephtha," "Deborah," "Athaliah" and "Belshazzar."

Thus England has been the cradle and the chief seat of these monster musical Festivals, and Handel's music has been as the breath of life to them.

Next to Handel's oratorios, there have figured at the festivals such works of course as Haydn's "Creation," Mozart's "Requiem," Spohr's "Last Judgment," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," and only recently the "Passion" of Bach, Handel's great contemporary, who never went abroad from his own Germany. Then came the day of Mendelssohn; a great day was that for England's music when the composer himself conducted the first performance of "Elijah" at the Birmingham Festival, on the 26th of August. The influence of his music upon English writers soon became as visible as Handel's had been, and a large crop of English oratorios soon sprang up, plainly inspired at second hand by Mendelssohn. The most successful of these imitations, several of which have had their turn at festivals, have been Mr. Costa's "Eli" and "Naaman," the filial relationship of which to the "Elijah," those who have heard them performed here by the Handel and Haydn Society, can hardly fail to recognize.

The Past Two Musical Years in Boston.

We have given the list of the principal Orchestral music which has been performed here in the last two seasons; from which it appears that in 38 Concerts we have had 30 different Symphonies, some of them repeatedly (namely 6 by Haydn, 4 by Mozart, 8 by Beethoven, 4 by Mendelssohn, 2 by Schubert, 3 by Schumann, 3 by Gade); 14 different Concertos (Mozart 1, Beethoven 5, Mendelssohn 3, Chopin 2, Schumann, Joachim, Liszt, Spohr, Weber, 1 each); and at least 35 different Overtures (Gluck 1, Beethoven 5, Mendelssohn 6, Cherubini 3, Weber 5, Bennett 2, Gade 2, Rossini 4, Schubert, Schumann, Spohr, Wagner, Rietz, &c., 1 each); besides works in other forms.

The Symphonies heard here for the first time were: Haydn in G (No. 13), in B flat, and the short one in B major (H dur); Schubert in B minor, Schumann in E flat (the "Rhenish," or "Cologne" Symph.); Gade in E; and Mendelssohn's "Reformation." The Concertos new to us were: Joachim's for violin; Beethoven's Triple Concerto, and the No. 1 for the Piano; Liszt's in E flat; Mozart, for 2 pianos. The Overtures heard here for the first time were: Beethoven's "Weihe des Hauses" (op. 124); Mendelssohn's "Trumpet" Ov.; Bennett's "Waldnymph"; Cherubini's to "Medea." We should have mentioned that the Violin Concertos were played by Mme. Camilla Urso and Mr. Listemann; the Piano Concertos by Messrs. Dresel, Leonhard, Lang, Parker, Perabo, Petersilea, Miss Topp and Miss Dutton; the "Triple Concerto" by Messrs. Lang, Eichberg and Fries, and again by Perabo, Listemann and Fries.—So much of the properly Orchestral Concerts. We come now to

II. CHAMBER MUSIC.

Our summary will embrace two seasons of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, of four concerts each; the four Quartet Matinees of Mr. Listemann, instituted this last winter; Otto Dresel's Piano Readings (Spring of '68); Hugo Leonhard's four Piano Matinees in April last; J. C. D. Parker's three Trio Soirées, this past Spring; besides various scattering chamber concerts given by Miss Alide Topp, Mr. Perabo, Petersilea, and others. Unfortunately, as we have not the data at hand, it cannot include the numerous programmes of classical chamber music given by the teachers and pupils of the New England and the Boston Conservatories, which would swell the account considerably. So far as we are able to recall, the different composers have been represented as follows:

J. S. BACH. Piano-forte pieces, from Suites, Partitas, Well-tempered Clavichord, &c. (mostly played by Mr. Dresel or Mr. Leonhard); of Sarabandes, Gavottes, Minuets, Airs, Passepieds, &c., &c., say 16 performances; of Preludes and Fugues 6 or 8; also Concerto in D minor, for three pianos.

HANDEL. Variations in D minor, piano, (Miss Topp).

HAYDN. String Quartets: No. 69, in B flat; No. 75, in G, twice.—Trios for Piano, Violin & 'Cello: in G, No. 1; in B flat; in A.

BOCCHERINI. Quintet in G, No. 62.

MOZART. Quintet (strings), in B flat.—Quartets: No. 2, D minor; 4, E flat; 6, C (twice); No. —? Cello Solo: Adagio (W. Fries).—Piano Solos: Sonata, No. 5, in A minor (Perabo); Adagio in B minor; &c.

DUSSEK. Sonata for Piano and Violin.

BEETHOVEN. Quartets: in F, op. 18; A, op. 18; F, op. 59; E minor, do. (twice); A minor, do.; C-sharp minor, op. 131; F, op. 135 (twice).—Trios: No. 2, in G; 3, C minor (twice); in B flat, op. 97 (3 times).—Sonatas for Piano and Violin: in F, op. 24 (4 times); in C minor, op. 30; in A, op. 47 (4 times).—For Piano and 'Cello: in G minor, op. 5 (twice); in A, op. 69 (twice).—For Piano Solo: in F minor, op. 2; C, op. 2; E flat, op. 7; C minor, op. 10; F, op. 10; B flat, op. 22; A flat, op. 26; C-sharp minor, op. 27; D minor, op. 31; E flat, op. 31; C, op. 53; E minor, op. 90; A flat, op. 110.—Variations: in F, op. 34 (Miss Topp); 15 do., with Fugue, in E flat, op. 35, (Perabo).

HUMMEL. Septet in D minor.

MOSCHELES. Sonata for 4 hands; "Homage à Händel," do.; Etude in A flat.

SCHUBERT. Quintet in C (with 2 'cellos).—Quartet, in D minor.—Trio (piano and strings), in E flat, op. 100 (3 times).—Piano and Violin: Rondo brilliant, op. 70.—Piano Sonata, F minor, op. 142; Ländler, Marches, &c.

MENDELSSOHN. Ottello, op. 20.—Quintet in B flat, op. 87.—Quartets: in B minor, op. 3; E minor, op. 44.—Trio, in C minor, op. 66 (3 times).—Sonata for Piano and 'Cello, in D, op. 58 (3 times).—Piano Solo: Songs without Words, 8th Book, (Lang); others, too many to count; Andante con Variazioni (Parker); Caprices, op. 16; op. 33, No. 2; in B minor; Rondo Capriccioso, E minor (twice); Fantaisies in A minor, and E minor; Scherzo, arr. from Reformation Symphony; Presto scherzando; Scherzino; &c., &c.

SCHUMANN. Quintet (piano and strings), op. 44.—Trios: No. 1, in D minor; in F, op. 80.—Piano: Arabesque, op. 18; Scherzino in B flat; Toccata, op. 7; Scherzo; Novelties; Intermezzo; Romanza; 2 Allegros from op. 58; "Grillen," "Fabel," op. 12 (twice); "Evening," from Phantasie-stücke; Andante, op. 17; Theme and Variations in B flat, for 2 pianos; Slumber Song; Allegro in Canon form; &c.

SPOHR. Nonetto, op. 31.—Violin Concerto ("Gesang-Szene") arranged for Flute.

TOMASCHKE. Three Eclogues for Piano.

WEBER. Piano: Polonaise in E flat Scherzo from a Sonata; Adagio and Rondo presto, do.

CHOPIN. For Piano: Impromptus in A flat and C-sharp minor; Fantaisie in F minor, op. 49; Andante Spianato, op. 22 (twice); Rondo in E flat, op. 16; Mazourkas, 10 or more; Polonaises: op. 22; op. 26 (twice); Etudes, 4 at least; Scherzo, from Sonata, op. 31 (twice); do. in E, op. 54, and others; Ballades: in G minor (twice); in A flat; Berceuse; Notturmes, Valses, Preludes, &c. &c.

F. HILLER. Piano: Caprice; Valse.

LISZT. Rhapsodies Hongroises, Nos. 1 and 2; "Gnomonreigen"; Valse Caprice, after Schubert; Gondoliera and Tarantella; Songs of Franz, transcribed; &c.

RAFF. Valse Caprice.

A. RUBINSTEIN. Quintet in F, op. 59; Etude for piano, in C.

STEPHEN HELLER. Piano: Etude in D flat, &c.

THALBERG. Cradle Song; Etude; Fantasias, &c.

J. O. GRIMM. Suite in Canon form (for string quintet).

SCHAEFFER, SARAN, DRESEL. Phantasie-stücke, &c. for Piano.

Most of the Chamber Concert programmes have been relieved by one or two vocal solos, and it is creditable to our singers, as well as to the public taste to which the singer keeps instinctively quite close, that their selections have been of so high an order. Airs and Cavatinas from Italian and French opera, namby-pamby sentimental ballads, &c., visit the concert room with much less frequency than formerly; ears once so pertinaciously bored by that tribe, are now wooed and won by strains of finer influence. For instance—though we cannot be exact—the nobler masters of song have ministered to us through their sincere melodies, somewhat as follows:

BACH, in several Arias, (as well as Chorals),—not, we are sorry to say, so often as in some previous years.

HANDEL. Dozens of times, in half a dozen airs; familiar ones of old.

GLUCK. Two arias.

MOZART. We count 12 various arias from operas, and songs, several of them sung frequently.

BEETHOVEN. The Liederkreis: "An die entfernte Geliebte;" "Ah Perfidio;" "Adelaide;" Quartet and Scene, from Fidelio.

SCHUBERT. 10 Songs, including (besides the well-worn ones) "Kolma's Klage," "Du bist die Ruh," "Geheimes" (Le Secret), &c. Also several Hymns and Choruses for male voices.

MENDELSSOHN. 14 Songs, besides Arias from Oratorios and Psalms.

SCHUMANN. 9 Songs, including part of the cycles: "Dichterliebe," the Duet: "Unter'm Fenster," &c.

ROBERT FRANZ. Some 15 Songs, some of which have figured in a good many programmes.

FERD. HILLER, GADE, DESSAUER, &c., in a few instances.

ROSSINI, of course, often.

We have yet to sum up the Oratorio and Choral performances, the Organ music, &c., &c.

Concerts.

THE CHICKERING CLUB invited their friends to the pleasant Hall that bears that name a few weeks ago, and gave them a delightful feast of their singularly refined and perfect male Part-Singing. The selections were all choice and seasonable, the words beautiful, mostly little poems of Nature, about "Night," "Early Morning," "Winter," "The Mountains," "The Woodland Rose," "On the Water," &c.; or patriotic; or, as in the case of "Vinota," the sunken city, mystical-romantic; and the English translations had been made with great felicity and tact by a poetic member of the Club. The compositions were by Schubert, Gade, Abt, Fischer, Marschner, Kücken; and for a finale, best of all, and in a grander strain (this alone with piano accompaniment) they sang Mendelssohn's noble music to Schiller's Ode "To the Artists."

The Peace Jubilee.

Having to go to press this week on Wednesday morning, we have hardly a column left in which to make a few notes on the performance of the first day. The scene on entering the huge Coliseum was indeed most imposing. The sight of all those faces turned toward you from the vast amphitheatre filled by ten thousand singers and a thousand instrumentalists, all full of glowing expectation, and of the audience of more than twelve thousand, covering floor and balconies, was inspiring. The building, too, with its strong, light framework, however plain without, is beautiful within, and the decoration with flags and banners excellent in color and design. Much as we disliked the extravagance of the plan originally, and shrank from the boastful style of the announcement of this "greatest musical festival ever held in any part of the world," (as if greatness were to be measured by mere magnitude and numbers!)—we cheerfully make haste to own that the result so far has in many respects agreeably disappointed us. Upon the whole, a better thing has been wrought out of it, than a plan so vain-glorious in the conception, so unscrupulously advertised and glorified before it had begun to be, and having so much of claptrap mixed up with what there was good in its programme, gave one any reasonable right to expect. But the wide, stupendous advertising filled thousands of minds with an enthusiasm which, if ignorant, was entirely honest; the mustering of all the clans of song, in such vast numbers, all within one city and one building, fired the imagination of the singers far and wide; and then, when the thing was really taken hold of by those with money to ensure, and business energy and skill to organize, the inordinate dimensions of the plan had to be reduced to make it practicable (even while the boastful advertising went on!),—and that reduction was the saving of the enterprise. For the managerial end of awakening attention far and wide, the biggest number served; but to really musical and thinking persons, the smaller the number, the greater the recommendation. Hence when the chorus of 20,000 was reduced one-half; the real orchestra from 1,000 to 500; the 20,000 children to 6,000; and the building itself cut down accordingly, the thing began to look more feasible and more attractive; for of course 10,000 voices must sound better than 20,000.

But we have no time now to take the whole great subject up from the beginning. We can only say that the success of Tuesday was in the main glorious and inspiring. The vast audience were greatly stirred, delighted. The best effects were those achieved by the great Chorus. The unity of impression was much better than we had dared to expect; for it had seemed a very doubtful problem whether the sound of the nearest and the farthest voices, hundreds of feet apart, could reach the ear at the same instant. In the plainer harmony, with long sustained tones, like the opening Luther's Choral, we felt no lack of unity,—only, at each pause, a faint nimbus of remoter harmony was heard after the nearer mass of voices had ceased. More rapid and complicated movements were of course less clear and precise in outline. But in all, the wonder was that so vast a chorus sang so well together; it was a proud proof of the wide-spread choral culture in the region which has Boston for its centre. The Mozart Gloria and the Inflammatus, in which Mr. ZERRAHN conducted, went the best, and indeed admirably. MINE. PAREPA-ROSA's voice told better, doubtless, than any other voice could have done in the solo; yet it sounded very far off, and did not justify the introduction of solo-singing in so vast a place. The same of Gounod's Ave Maria, in which the 2000 voices made a rich sound in the obbligato. The "Star-Spangled Banner," it is pretty certain, never was sung so well before, nor with effect so electrifying, at least in safe and peaceful times. Keller's "American Hymn," being plain, simple harmony, an honest but rather commonplace composition, was one of the things most sure to sound well. The "Anvil Chorus" was a childish, trivial thing for any grand occasion, and the poor clasp-trap of the hundred blacksmith's anvil was more ring to it. The guns were wonderfully well timed, think what you will of them. This and the patriotic pieces were conducted by Mr. GILMORE in person. Mr. FENNELL took the baton in the first orchestral piece, the overture to Tannhäuser. It was a splendid orchestra with its 35 double basses, and played well; but, where we sat (in the middle of the floor), it was with difficulty we heard all. The Overture to "Toll" and "Coronation March" were clearer. But we must wait till it is all over. So much merely by way of recognition and beginning.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. The annual meeting for the election of officers and the transaction of other business, was held in Burnstead Hall, May 31, the president of the society, Dr. J. Baxter Upham, in the chair.

The report of the treasurer showed that the receipts of the society from concerts, &c., including a balance on hand of $1129 71 at the beginning of the year, were $9723 12. The whole of this was expended in paying sundry bills and current expenses. The treasurer was consequently without any funds, but as the society was out of debt no assessment was necessary. The present value of the permanent funds of the society was $8195.

The report of the librarian showed that the library was in good condition. A beautiful fac-simile copy of Handel's autograph score of the Messiah, in chromo-lithograph, had been presented by Carl Zerrahn, and a fine engraving representing the "Apotheosis of Handel" was presented by Dr. Upham.

The president read the annual report, which we print elsewhere in full.

The following officers were reelected for the ensuing year:—

President, J. Baxter Upham.
Vice-President, O. J. Faxon.
Secretary, Loring B. Barnes.
Librarian, George G. Chickering,
Treasurer, George W. Palmer.
Directors, D. L. Laws, E. C. Daniell, R. M. Lowell, Oliver B. Lothrop, George Fisher, Samuel Junison, Levi W. Johnson, William H. Wadleigh.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL ASSOCIATION. The annual meeting of the stockholders was held at the Music Hall, June 9th, J. Baxter Upham, the President, in the chair.

The report of the Treasurer was read, showing the receipts for the year to be as follows:

From Organ Concerts.....	$3,901 85
Other Concerts.....	9,184 00
Fairs, Lectures and other gatherings.....	18,378 50
Use of Hall for Sunday Services.....	2,000 00
Yearly rent of New England Conservatory of Music.....	2,500 00
Use of Burnstead Hall and Ante-rooms.....	1,892 00
Sale of Organ Books.....	50 00
Profits of Exhibition of Busts, etc.....	106 88
	$31,912 21

Payments for the year were as follows:

For gas.....	$3,485 84
Fuel.....	508 00
Insurance.....	1,682 50
Interest.....	8,867 88
Taxes.....	2,480 20
Salaries.....	1,200 00
Sundry Expenses.....	11,587 67
	24,871 98
Profits of the year.....	7,240 23
	$31,912 21

The account was referred to an Auditing Committee with instructions to report to the Directors at as early a day as practicable.

The President made a report on the condition of the affairs of the corporation, saying that all the property was in good condition, and called the attention of members to the fact that six pictures had been presented to the association during the past year by Mr. Gardner Brewer. These were all portraits of musical composers, celebrated in their day, one of them having been the teacher of Beethoven. A marble bust of Charlotte Cushman had also been presented by Mrs. Gorham Brooks.

The subject of Insurance was brought up, and it was stated that the amount on the building was $75,000; on the organ $60,000, and on the statue of Beethoven $2,000. Many members thought the insurance on the building was more than enough to cover any loss which they were liable to sustain, although the amount on the organ was not too high. The President stated that this instrument could not be replaced short of $100,000 at the present time, and that it cost about $60,000 in gold.

The discussion was now dropped, and the subject of electing Directors for the ensuing year being the next business, a Nominating Committee was appointed. They reported the following list who were all unanimously reelected:

J. Baxter Upham, R. E. Apthorp, Eben Dale, E. T. Osborn, H. W. Pickering, John P. Putnam, S. Lothrop Thordike.

Bernhard Molique.

A slight memorial of one of the worthiest human beings that ever existed, and one of the most complete artists who have expressed themselves in Music, is due to the sterling merits of Bernhard Molique. Though no one could number him among the men of genius who have figured so brilliantly during the past half-century, his conscientious working-out of every talent which he possessed by nature, and could improve by study, give the deceased that high place among his predecessors and contemporaries which it is fit and fair to claim for him now that his simple, laborious and honorable life is over.

He was born at Nuremberg in the year 1803. His father, a town musician (to which position there is no equivalent in England or in France), obliged the boy to make himself useful on many instruments—an admirable musical training. When he was fourteen years of age he was sent to Munich and placed under Rovelli, first violinist of the Royal Chapel. Two years later he was in the orchestra of the Theater an der Wien, at Vienna; subsequently he returned to the Bavarian capital, to succeed his master as first court violinist, when only seventeen years of age. I have heard his contemporaries speak of his playing at that time as something rash, daring and brilliant in no common degree. But I must doubt the fidelity of such a character. It is more certain that the sobriety and sedateness of his manner (unimpeachable as was his execution), and the strictly classical forms of his compositions, stood in the way of his success at a time when such more showy but less solid men as Lafont, De Beriot and Paganini were abroad. After travelling for some years as a virtuoso, he took up his abode in Stuttgart. There he was resorted to and consulted as a master of his instrument. On the breaking out of the troubles in Germany, encouraged by the respect shown him during previous visits to this country, he took that resolution which is always perilous in one whose nationality is distinct and whose habits are formed—of changing his country; and settled himself in England. Here there was no occupation for him analogous to that he had left in his own land. But it was admirable to see how he conformed himself to our requirements. Incessantly—too incessantly—occupied with composition, for "all sorts and conditions" of musicians, and as a matter of nature and conscience always doing his best, never degrading the standard he had set for himself, with a view to popular requirements, Herr Molique undertook the exhausting duties of a professor of harmony and composition. That he was singularly happy in his pupils may be seen in future records of English music and musicians. No one profited by his teaching who did not esteem and regard the man, apart from his lessons. This, he it said without indelicacy, was proved emphatically and gratefully, when his tired hand could write no longer, and his tired brain had to take rest beyond the contest and turmoil of London. He died quietly, at home, after a long period of bodily and mental decay, "among his own people," without, it is hoped, a want or a care.

To appraise his value as a composer is not an easy task. His favorite work, "Abraham," an elaborate oratorio, proves, after all that could be said and sung about it, to be little more than a reflex of "Elijah." His violin concertos, I believe, will wear, so long, at least, as any show-music can wear. After the one by Beethoven, and the one by Mendelssohn, there are few, if any, works of the kind in which fancy and classical texture are so happily combined. Some of his songs are charming. "If o'er the boundless sky" (so capably sung by Miss Masson), and "The Gondolier Song," are as good as any contributions to the world of German song-writers ever made—Schubert's not excepted.

To end, Bernhard Molique was, as a man, child-like, gracious, unsuspecting, unselfish, without bitterness; and this is remarkable, when the worth of his labors and the smallness of his gains are considered.—Athenaeum.

HENRY F. CHORLEY.

CARLSRUHE. Herr Ed. Devrient, the well known German actor, (with whose "Recollections of Mendelssohn" we have been making our readers acquainted) lately celebrated his fiftieth professional anniversary. A short time previously, he had refused a very flattering offer from Stuttgart, preferring to remain here. The Grand-Duke has now made him General-Director of the Theatre. On the day of the anniversary, Herr Devrient received congratulatory messages and letters from his brother actors and from his admirers in all parts of Germany, besides the Order of the Crown, &c., &c.

COLOGNE. The greatest regret is manifested among all classes at the resolution of Herr Ferdinand Hiller to throw up the post he has so long filled with credit to himself and eminent advantage to the city. According to report, his retirement is due to a feeling of indignation at a series of annoyances and vexations to which he has been subjected. Herr Hiller had for some time past demanded an augmentation of his salary as Town Conductor, and the guarantee of a pension for himself and his family; he had likewise expressed a wish that his position should be assured by a proper legal contract; but neither of these requests was gratified, and he has, therefore, determined to sever his official connection with the town.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Footprints in the Sand. Braham. 30
Good comic song, about the pretty prints of a lady's foot on the beach sands of Rockaway. Pleasing melody.
- I can't make up my mind. Smith. 30
Quite unfortunate, as the young ladies, (as he believes) are quite anxious he should choose. Good music, and amusing words.
- I'm as happy as a bird. Hernandez. 30
Comic love song, with a very quaint and pleasing melody.
- Farewell. 3. D to f. Stark. 30
Fine poetry, happily adapted to the music.
- Bill Craven. Collins. 30
A hearty sea song, full of quirks and puns; as when the ship sails out of the harbor, while "his love she went to sea;" or, as when Bill, sighting a pirate, exclaims, thinking of his cargo, "I ope—I am to save my op-I-un!"
- The Swiss Boy. (Steh nur auf). Varied. 6. C to a. Pixis. 65
The well known melody, exquisitely varied for the voice. Has an easier and a more difficult part, but neither are easy. Fine concert piece, and has been recently sung "with great applause."
- Chevy Chase. 3. Eb to e. McFarren. 30
The good old English ballad. Everybody has heard of it, but hardly anybody knows it.
- The Crystal Cave. Duet. 3. C to g. Glover. 65
One would think that Glover's duets would deteriorate after a while, but this is as good as the best.
- God keep our country free. 30
A fine hymn, sung at the great "Peace Jubilee." Russian melody.
- The Harp that once thro' Tara's Hall. Chorus. 30
It still holds its own as one of the most melodious of melodies, but now is a "song of ten thousand" as it still echoes over the Jubilee neighborhood in Boston. On Thursday's programme.
- A Hymn of Peace. Chorus. 2. F to f. Keller. 30 Keller's American Hymn, with O. W. Holmes' admirable words. On Tuesday's programme at the Jubilee.
- The Monk. (Il Monaco). 5. F to c. Meyerbeer. 75
A fine concert song, sung by M. W. Whitney and others. A poor young Monk is struggling to concentrate his mind on religious duties, but is sadly distracted by dreams of the gay world.

Instrumental.

- Festival Waltzes. (Wein, Weib und Gesang). 3. Strauss. 75
A bright, cheerful collection, quite suitable for a "festival" set, as Strauss is one of the best of "Festival" conductors.
- Magali. Grand Waltz. 4. Eb. Leybach, Op. 83.
A brilliant waltz in Leybach's masterly style.
- Fifth Nocturne. 4. Ab. Leybach, Op. 52.
One of the prettiest; graceful and flowing, the melody pleasing and soothing.
- Memory. "Summer Reveries." Wilson. 50
Among the Hills. " " " " 50
Two very graceful productions, and very reasonable. Take them with you on your summer jaunt, and play them by the mountain or sea-side.

Books.

- GLAD TIDINGS. A Collection of New Hymns and Music, for Sabbath Schools, Anniversaries, &c. By L. O. Emerson and L. B. Starkweather. Boards, 35; paper, 30
Both teachers and pupils will welcome this new book, by two authors of rare taste, the first of whom at least is "known by his works" to some hundreds of thousands, the latter also, having an excellent musical reputation. One need not turn over the leaves of the book long to become convinced that there is nothing dull in it. On the contrary, both hymns and music are concise, bright and cheerful to a degree that cannot fail to please young singers.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c., A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

The Peace Jubilee.

ITS CONCEPTION, EARLY STRUGGLES, AND ORGANIZATION.

(From the Daily Advertiser, June 15).

The great oak which overshadows Boston to-day, and to which the nation looks with interest, had its acorn in the brain of Mr. P. S. Gilmore. Whatever credit is to be given to others for energy, sagacity and liberality, in pushing the plan on to completeness and success, to him alone belongs the honor of originating the idea. Seven cities claim the birth of Homer; there is even dispute as to priority in suggesting the name of the President who visits us to-morrow; but nobody has been audacious enough to attempt to divide with Mr. Gilmore the glory of the conception of the Peace Jubilee. No friend suggested it to him; no acquaintance advised him. Warm-ed into life by the great stimulus of travel, the first idea had birth in Mr. Gilmore's mind just two years ago this month, as he was going up and down the land in his business. It has never ceased in progress since, but has increased in size and momentum steadily, as the snowball becomes an avalanche, until it has the magnitude which we see in Boston to-day,—covering an expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars, calling into being the largest audience hall in the world, drawing together hosts of people from every part of the country as far as the Pacific coast, summoning into its service the best musical talent, talked about the world over.

But the progress at first was very slow. Nobody but the projector himself will ever fully realize with how many difficulties it was attended. At first Mr. Gilmore only talked about it to few people, confidentially, seeking encouragement and getting instead cold water by the bucketful. It was not until after the presidential election of 1868 that he began to make formal calls in explanation of his project, and solicitation of aid, subscriptions and indorsement. But by that time the plan had assumed a complete and symmetrical form in Mr. Gilmore's own mind; and it is interesting to compare the sketch of a programme which he had printed in those days as a prospectus, with the full-blown arrangements which people now have almost by heart. There is very little difference. Some changes of course have been made. The time of the Festival has been expanded from three days to five, and the number of the chorus has been pared down from twenty thousand voices to little more than ten thousand. But the grand outlines of the picture, the character of the music, even most of the selections, remain as Mr. Gilmore drew them. The very ball, on the evening of the 17th of June, which comes up now as the latest fruit of consultation, was provided for in this sketch prepared in December last.

It was on the first days of the new year that the public at large was given its first hints of what was in store. These came in mysterious paragraphs in the Boston newspapers, framed at first so as to arouse without gratifying curiosity, followed up in a few days with gradually more and more explicit expositions of the matter. Letters of sympathy and encouragement from leading citizens, in official and private life, and from eminent musicians, were published one by one. The newspapers of Boston all editorially commended and favored the project; those of other cities were disposed to sneer at it and bring it to ridicule, but at the same time its magnitude and aggressiveness were such that they were forced to talk about it, and thus the great end was gained of bringing the matter prominently before the people. Soon everybody was talking about it. There was every room for difference of opinion on the musical and the financial practicability of the undertaking; thus discussion was stimulated, and everything seemed brisk and prosperous.

It was shortly after this that the enterprise had its darkest days—Mr. Gilmore fell ill. The talking community were wide awake, for a time, but the doing, subscribing, paying community were rather disposed to hold aloof. Canvassing for the guarantee fund was up-hill work. Other men who tried it gave up discouraged after a few days' experience. But Mr. Gilmore kept pegging away. In one day he called upon seventy business firms and obtained seventy refusals to subscribe so much as a dollar. But the percentage of negative answers was not always so large. In the course of two months' work pledges were obtained of forty thousand dollars,—about one quarter of the amount originally estimated as likely to be required. Then a private meeting of business men and musical people was called, and took place on the 13th of March. Mr. Gilmore's match at last seemed to have struck fire; his enthusiasm became contagious. Mr. Eben D. Jordan consented to act as treasurer. A building committee was also appointed. A few days later the citizen subscribers organized into a working body, with Hon. A. H. Rice as president, and committees for every branch of the multifarious duties into which the details of the work naturally divided. The public interest was rekindled. Musical people everywhere began to sing and practise. The city government appointed a committee to coöperate with the organizations of the citizens; and the labor of Mr. Gilmore henceforth was divided among a body of men all earnest and sagacious workers.

A slight interruption to the harmonious flow of affairs was occasioned when it became necessary to determine the location of the building for the Festival. The original prospectus had left this matter open. Suggestions of using for the purpose any part of the Common had been so warmly opposed that that idea was given up, and it was generally announced that some accessible part of the Back Bay lands would be selected. But some of the gentlemen of the citizens' organization thought the Common, if it could be obtained, a much more advantageous site in many respects; and on their application leave was granted by the municipal authorities without much discussion of the subject. Objections were at once made by many of the truest friends of the enterprise to the proposed misuse of our great breathing-place. Numerous signatures were appended to a protest; many leading citizens addressed the board of aldermen in remonstrance, and though that body adhered to its first action, the committee wisely and gracefully gave way to public opinion; and the announcement was made that the original selection of St. James Park had been again and finally ratified.

No further clouds have marred the progress of the Festival to its fruition to-day. Work went ahead swiftly in many departments at the same time. The contract for the building was given to Judah P. Sears & Son, and on the 29th of March they staked out the land. They have been at work ever since, often by night as well as by day, employing about two hundred workmen; and the last stroke of their hammers will ring through the big spaces this morning. About the same time Mr. Tourjee began to organize the grand chorus, and Mr. Zerrahn to drill the Boston nucleus of the force; and these two gentlemen, both incomparably well fitted for their respective divisions, have been hard at work every day and almost every evening. Mr. J. Thomas Baldwin has been selecting the orchestra. A firm in Grantville have searched out the big oxen and made the big drum. The Messrs. Hook have devised, constructed and set up the organ, small but mighty. Competent persons have directed the extensive advertising, the decorations of the building, the sale of tickets, the engagement of soloists, the provision for guests, and so on through more ramifications of detail than we have space to enumerate.

THE CHORUS.

The duty of selecting and supervising a chorus of from ten to twenty thousand persons was one of the most arduous and responsible duties connected with the whole enterprise. Mr. Gilmore proposed to Mr. Eben Tourjee, the director of the New England Conservatory of Music, to accept the trust, and after some hesitation and mature deliberation he did so. The wisdom of this selection of Mr. Tourjee is now fully manifest; for his pleasant and affable disposition, as well as the extensive knowledge and experience which he possessed, has contributed largely to the harmonious development of this branch of the great project. Having accepted the charge, Mr. Tourjee, on the 10th of March, issued his first circular which invited the coöperation of the musical people of the country, stated the proposed plan of organization, and the choruses to be sung. Within a very short time after the circular was issued seventy-five societies had reported according to its terms, and the response from all portions of the country was eminently satisfactory and encouraging. On the 18th of March a special circular was issued, and by the middle of April the applications and acceptances of vocalists had been so numerous that the requisite number had been secured, and it was found necessary to issue "Chorus Circular No. 2," stating that the chorus was already full, and giving such instruction as was thought necessary to those who had become its members. From that time until the present the different societies, which are to participate in the festivities of the next four days, have been actively engaged in rehearsing the music to be sung by them on this occasion. The rehearsals of Boston choruses, as is well known, have taken place in Bumstead and Music Halls; and they have been largely attended, and full of interest. Early in May the work of classifying the members of the Boston chorus began, and each applicant was obliged to pass individually under the examination of Mr. Tourjee, in order that his or her qualifications might be tested. Over three thousand persons of Boston and vicinity were examined by Mr. Tourjee; and the directors of associations and societies in distant places are held to a like responsibility for the capacity of the singers under their charge.

Below we give a list of the choral organizations which have been accepted, and which will take part in the exercises during the week:

The chorus, constituted of the societies mentioned above, will number in the aggregate over ten thousand voices, of which Massachusetts furnishes about 8,500; New Hampshire, 810; Maine 279; Vermont, 94; Connecticut, 199; Rhode Island, 136; New York, 111; Illinois, 95; and Ohio, 60. As seats had been provided for only ten thousand singers, it was found necessary to furnish additional accommodations for all over that number. Two rows of seats were therefore placed in position yesterday in the promenade in the southern end of the building.

THE SOLOISTS.

In addition to Mme. Parepa-Rosa and Miss Adelaide Philipps, who have been secured to sing much of the solo music, the following leading singers have also been engaged:

Soprano. Miss Annie M. Granger, Miss S. W. Barton, Mrs. H. M. Smith, Miss Sophia Mozart, Miss Lizzie M. Gates, Miss A. S. Whitten, Miss Graciele Ridgway, Mrs. D. O. Hall, Mrs. J. W. Weston, Mrs. Fluke of Worcester.
Alto. Miss Addie S. Ryan, Mrs. Charles A. Barry, Mrs. Drake, Mrs. A. C. Munroe of Worcester, and Mesdames S. J. Sharland, T. H. Emmons and J. J. Henry.
Bass. Signor A. Ardavan, and Messrs J. F. Rudolphsen, P. H. Powers, C. A. Guilmette, E. C. Barnabee, C. H. McClellan, E. B. Fairbanks, G. W. Hazelwood, Hiram Wilde, J. E. Perkins, J. J. Kimball, M. W. Whitney, Henry M. Alken.
Tenors. James Whitney, H. L. Whitney, W. H. Daniel, L. W. Wheeler, W. W. Davis, D. F. Flitz, James P. Draper, Edward Prescott.

The following singers, selected to "save the chorus," as it is termed, have also been accepted, most of them being residents of Boston or its immediate vicinity:

Misses Mittle F. Osgood, Annie L. Harman, Emma A. Hamlin, E. Fannie Whipple, Hattie M. Safford, A. Florence Houtch, Louise J. Sharland, Emma F. Reed, Mary E. Nichols, Laura M. Porter, Emma V. ## THE ORCHESTRA.

Mr. J. Thomas Baldwin, at the suggestion of Mr. Gilmore, was selected, as having the requisite talent, judgment and capacity, for the laborious and difficult task of organizing the orchestral forces, and he immediately proceeded with his labors. Numerous conferences were held with the principal musicians in our large cities, and after long and wearisome negotiations he made selections of various bands, orchestral performers, &c., to the number of about four hundred from New York and about seventy from Philadelphia. Mr. Baldwin also entered into an extensive correspondence with leading musicians throughout the country, and as a result of his labors he has secured the services of four hundred performers from New York; 389 from Boston and vicinity; from Philadelphia, 70; Baltimore, 30; Troy, 25; Montreal and Quebec, 15; Chicago, 15; Cincinnati, 12; Hartford, 10; New Haven, 6; Albany, 5; and Springfield, 3; making a total of 930. In addition to these the following cities and towns will be represented: Salem, Lawrence, Weymouth and Taunton, Mass.; Rockland and Wicasset, Me.; Norwalk, Ohio; Medina, N. Y.; Pittsburg, Penn.; Stamford, Conn.; Salem, N. C.; Milwaukee, Wis.; St. Louis, Mo.; Washington, D. C., and Stirling, Germany.

The above list does not include the following bands of music which have been engaged for the Festival: Metropolitan Band, Boston; Boston Cornet, Bond's Cornet, Boston; Ninth Regiment Band, Boston; Edmonds's Band, Boston; Suffolk Band, Boston; Hall's Band, Boston; Haverhill Brass Band; American Brass Band, Providence; Manchester, (N. H.) Cornet Band; Doring's Band, Troy, N. Y.; Weymouth (Mass.) Brass Band; Bridgewater (Mass.) Brass Band; Worcester Cornet Band; Nashua (N. H.) Cornet Band; Portsmouth (N. H.) Cornet Band; Taunton National Military Band. The members of the orchestra will wear citizen's dress, and the bands will be clad in their respective uniforms.

The instruments as a mass will be classified into two orchestras, one for the performance of symphony music and such other strains as are given by instruments alone, and the other for oratorio and popular music, the bands above enumerated joining with all others in concert on the 15th and 17th instant.

The select orchestra will be constituted as follows, comprising the best of all the instrumentalists:
Stringed.—First Violins, 115; Second Violins, 100; Violoncellos, 65; Violas, 65; Double Basses, 65. Total, 410.

Wind.—Flutes, 8; Clarionettes, 8; Oboes, 8; Bassoons, 8; Horns, 12; Trumpets, 8; Trombones, 9; Tubas, 3; Drums, 10. Total, 74. Grand total, 484.

The grand orchestra will include the following instruments in addition to those constituting the select orchestra:

Piccolos and flutes, 25; Eb clarionettes, 20; Bb clarionettes, 50; Eb cornets, 50; Bb cornets, 75; Eb alto horns, 75; Bb tenor horns, 25; tenor trombones, 50; bass trombones, 25; Bb baritones, 25; Eb basso tubas, 75; small drums, 50; bass drums, 25; cymbals, 10; triangles, 10; total, 590; select orchestra, 484; grand total, 1074.

The presence in the orchestra of the distinguished musician Ole Bull, who has been induced to accept the position of first leading violinist of the Jubilee, will also be a prominent feature of attraction.

[Mr. Carl Rosa held the second place, and, on Ole Bull's retirement, after the first day, the leading place.]

The Jubilee in Retrospect.

(From the Springfield Republican, June 21.)

The Boston press is too much overpowered by the immense success of the peace jubilee in most respects, to give a candid estimate of its actual musical achievements; while the New York papers, moved by a petty jealousy which damages only its possessor, are demeaning themselves by mere dirt-throwing and by ignoring the position and unmistakable triumph of the great festival of song. The truth of the matter lies somewhere between these two extremes. The jubilee was in no sense the failure which New York proclaims it, nor was it quite the unqualified success which Boston would have us believe. In most respects it was a prodigious experiment, alike bold in conception and masterly in preparation. It would have been marvellous, indeed, if such an immense undertaking had shown results wholly without blemish; and the brilliant meed of success which was secured was scarcely less marvellous in view of all the untoward circumstances.

In the first place the Coliseum, with its roomy accommodations for thirty or forty thousand persons, is really much too large for a concert room. Sounds which would elsewhere be deafening are perfectly harmless there; and hundreds who attended the jubilee hoping to be stunned were more or less disappointed, except when the "big guns" came in. The popular impression that eight thousand singers can produce eight times as much noise as one thousand was pretty thoroughly exploded. In fact the eight [ten] thousand voices in the Coliseum gave hardly as loud an account of themselves as the eight hundred in the Music Hall at the last Handel and Haydn festival. For this, of course, the Coliseum is really to blame. But the New York critics, who deify Noise, charge the fault on the chorus and even complain that Mr. Gilmore's cannonading wasn't very loud! We beg of him to secure for their benefit at his next festival a large supply of first class thunder storms and two or three prime South American earthquakes.

There was one peculiarity about the chorus which must have attracted the attention of every listener. It was sublimely ponderous. The adage that large bodies move slowly was proved anew. Never was grander music heard in America than the chorals from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," as that chorus produced them. Such slow moving strains it could and did sing inexpressibly well. But the elephant could not dance, and with fast movements came confusion. It was a weight as of tons which neither orchestra nor organ, powerful as both were, could bear up under or lighten. The instruments, except in slow and regular passages, constantly tended to get ahead of the singers, and the latter constantly tended to drag. Even the magnetism of Zerrahn's presence, when he rushed from the conductor's stand, as he did many times, up among the singers, beating his baton with a vigor that it would seem might have stirred hundreds of thousands, could hardly bring them up to time. The result was that much of the vocal part of the programme was heavily performed. This was true of the Gloria from the "twelfth mass," attributed to Mozart, which was sung at least one-third too slow. Indeed, the conductor plainly dreaded to trust a more rapid movement; and one of the choruses was on Friday stopped mid-way, at a convenient point, from fear of attempting its more rapid and elaborate conclusion. The greatest achievement in the faster choruses was "Thanks be to God," (from Mendelssohn's Elijah), which was begun and ended grandly, though it did not escape the tendency to lag which we have referred to; and it was applauded with a spontaneous heartiness which shows how classical music is beginning to be appreciated, and that the masters are gaining on the ground of the ear-tickers.

The inference which every close observer must have drawn from the jubilee concerts is that, while such a great congregation of singers can be used most effectively for choral music and for such stately-moving compositions as Handel's "Hallelujah chorus," it is impracticable to attempt much else with them. There is a limit in numbers beyond which the best-drilled chorus becomes unwieldy and easily liable to get beyond the conductor's control. Whether that limit is one thousand singers or five thousand is by no means plain, but the chorus at the Boston jubilee over-reached it. Besides, when so many as four or five thousand singers are assembled, the addition of as many more will not, strange as it may seem, add any very appreciable amount to the volume of their tone, while it will inevitably make the whole mass in a degree uncontrollable, and insomuch endanger the musical effect. It was really no fault of the chorus last week that they so often fell behind the more pliant and ductile orchestra. No finer body of singers could be assembled anywhere; certainly no city in America can call together such a glorious chorus, and the New Yorkers, much as they sneer at Boston, know that as well as any one. In view of the surpassing difficulties to be overcome, they did their part surprisingly well. But, as we have already hinted, a chorus of half the size in the same capacious cavern—and especially in a room of half the size—would be found a great deal more versatile and manageable and effective. Yet with the gain would come some loss. There is an indescribable sense of immensity—not mere immensity of noise—in the harmonious massing and unity of a great number of voices. It is a sublime suggestion of the infinite, such as no other combination in music can give. And in this respect the greater the host the grander the result.

The choral successes of the festival were due in a very large degree to the magnificently powerful Organ, whose tone buoyed up the voices and added immeasurably to the grandeur of the combined effects. No number of orchestral instruments could have performed this office so well, and the singers' voices, many as they were, would have sounded weak in the extreme parts of the Coliseum without its aid.

The orchestra was excellent—rather, would have been elsewhere than in that Mammoth Cave. The most delicate instrumental effects were absolutely lost in its vast expanse. A room of such dimensions is no place for performing the best class of orchestral compositions, although more dashing and tumultuous martial music was given there with unbounded vim and startling effect. We find no fault with Mr. Gilmore because he made works of this kind so prominent in his programme; he was shrewd enough to know that a great popular success, such as he sought and won, could be obtained only by the performance of popular music, and he improved the opportunity to let the masses hear at the same time works of unquestioned merit—the acknowledged classics of the art. In this popularization of music, and in the sharp impulse given to musical education in New England, and, in a degree, throughout the country, the jubilee will have wide-reaching and beneficent results.

So we congratulate Mr. Gilmore and his ten thousand coadjutors. In spite of hindrances and obstacles the Jubilee must be set down a success, meriting in sober truth very much of the enthusiastic praise which has been bestowed upon it, and taking rank as the greatest event in the musical annals of our country. It has been especially valuable as showing what is feasible in music on a grand scale and what is not; and profiting by this knowledge and experience, it is safe to predict that the second mammoth musical festival—we shall have another ere many years—will be a more perfect musical and artistic success than its notable progenitor, which has just passed into history.

The Peace Festival and its Results.

(From the New York Sun, June 22.)

The results of so great an undertaking as that just concluded at Boston, deserve to be carefully weighed. No experiment in which ten thousand intelligent people are the actors, and two hundred thousand the spectators, can be passed by with a sneer, or even merely with a good-natured laugh. The immense numbers engaged in it, and their culture and intellectual standing are alone sufficient to give the affair dignity. Aside from this, it is freighted with great consequences to American art, and its lessons should be thoughtfully studied. If we have failed in the accomplishment of our purposes, it is well that that should be known and the blunder avoided in future. If we have done a creditable thing, then we are entitled to the encouragement that flows naturally from work well performed.

One good result that is likely to be gained by it is a recognition of American art. Heretofore America has had no standing in the musical world. England has looked down on us. Germany has supposed that no festival could be given here except by her Sängerbunds. Italy and France have recognized for us no higher possibilities than the production of their operas. At one step, without any preliminaries, without more special preparation than could be crowded into a few weeks, we have lifted ourselves, so far as great musical art gatherings are concerned, to an artistic level with these nations. Hereafter, when the noted musical festivals of the world are enumerated, not only will it not be possible to ignore America, but she must head the list. The journals of Europe, heretofore silent on all questions concerning our musical art, are now called upon to tell their surprised readers that the largest gathering of singers and players ever brought together has just been held in the United States.

The enterprise has been conceived and executed on a scale in keeping with the vastness of the country, with the breadth and largeness of the American methods, and with the expedition and fearlessness that characterize all our attempts in untried fields of effort. It challenged the attention of the world by the magnitude and daring of the scheme proposed, and must now command its respect by the manner in which it has been accomplished. If it has done for us no more than this, it has done enough.

But it has done more. It has shown that our people can think of something beyond mechanical inventions and the almighty dollar, and it has given earnest of a noble musical future for America. The great chorus which did the work of the first four days demonstrated this; but confirming it was the astonishing fact that when they withdrew there were still ten thousand children ready to step directly into their places, and possessing the ability to sing almost as well as their elders.

And here let us give New England the credit that is her due. Thanks to the excellent training in the rudiments of music which is part of her common school education, and the very general cultivation there given to chorus singing, by far the greater part of the immense army of vocalists who took part in the Jubilee were from the Eastern States. The Handel and Haydn Society of Boston alone furnished six hundred and fifty voices. Let the whole country emulate the example of New England, and there will soon be heard over the length and breadth of our vast territory, not only the whistle of the locomotive, the hum of spindle, and the din of the forge, but everywhere, in peaceful contrast with these sounds of daily labor, the pleasant harmonies of evening choral songs.

But while awarding this merited praise, it seems useless to ignore the fact that great defects marred the performance of many of the pieces. They have been freely pointed out and commented upon in the reports that appeared from day to day in this journal. The great chorus and orchestra could not be held together long enough to give them the necessary rehearsals; and even if they could have been, the forces were too large and the building too spacious for the most accurate results. And yet while the blemishes were many, the merits were also great. There was such a majesty of tone as never before was heard—a solemnity, richness, depth, and grandeur of effect that were intensely moving. This grand fusion of tone, where all effect of individual singing was lost and the voices were melted into one, like the massive song of the ocean surf, was one of the most impressive features of the great festival, and could not proceed from any smaller chorus.

It is not, however, to any special excellence in the performance of a given piece that we look when we speak of the results attending this festival, but to the recognition that it secures to us from foreign nations, to its influence in giving a fresh impulse to art at home, and to the enthusiasm necessarily kindled from the magnetism of so many joined together in a great enterprise. It will be talked of for months in every hamlet in Massachusetts, and its influence felt in every church choir and musical circle. In this direction it is difficult to over-estimate its power for good, and looked at from this point of view it must fill us with hope for the musical future of our land.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 3, 1869.

The National Peace Jubilee.

To-day our columns are entirely occupied with this remarkable project, the dream, the one life purpose, for two years, of Mr. PATRICK S. GILMORE, and with its still more remarkable fulfillment in this city on the five days which an Irishman might call the next to "the top of the year," crowning the slope that leads right up to Midsummer, June 15th to 19th inclusive, making the dreamer famous, a popular hero in his way. Indeed we fear such stars as Mendelssohn just now, or Mozart, if they lived among us, would "pale their ineffectual fires" before such Calcine effulgence. The Jubilee has been the all-absorbing topic for the last month. As we have been silent about it during the preparation of the mighty work; and since, with all the extravagances of the plan, it has been pushed forward with such faith and energy that the imagination of the People, the "popular heart," perhaps we should even say the good genius of our People, fired and filled with it, has adopted it and made it its own, transforming it as it were into its own likeness; since it has been crowned with such unique success, we can do no less than gather together what we can of its history, weigh its results from our own point of view, and note the impression it has made on others.

To do this satisfactorily, we must let the topic still encroach quite largely on another paper.

For the present, we borrow a sketch of the history of the Jubilee, with lists of the participants, &c., from the Daily Advertiser. We have copied two among a number of the most sensible and candid of the critical summaries which have appeared in other papers. We ask attention, also, to the clear, sound statement, contributed on our last page, of the acoustic results of the novel experiment of music by 10,000 voices in a building holding nearly 30,000 listeners (if listeners they could all be called).

For ourselves, as our readers know, we came to it sceptically, little disposed to trust or countenance a musical project making such enormous claims, and so unblushingly heralded after the manner of things as uncongenial as possible to the whole sphere of Art. The following letters, which we transfer from the New York Tribune of Saturday and Monday last, describe our position candidly, before and since the feast, though not as briefly or concisely as we could have wished. It was due to a very large class of the most sincere, enlightened, earnest friends of music and of culture, who, as far as any public expression was concerned, were entirely silent and unrepresented from the first, to state the way the thing looked to them from the outset, even at the risk of some seeming harshness or unfairness now that the plan is generally counted a success, a great event in some important senses, if not all. As for Mr. Gilmore, he has fairly earned all the reward which a grateful people appear eager to bestow. If the laudations of the newspapers do not turn his head—and so far we know he takes it sanely, modestly and simply—it is infinitely to his credit. So was his behavior during the last days of the Jubilee, in keeping himself and his own peculiar element of "Anvil Choruses," &c., resolutely in the background, rather than spoil the classical programme of the fourth day, or rudely break the fairy spell of the school children's festival.

The Peace Jubilee Summed up.

To the Editor of the Tribune.

SIR:—You ask for "a careful, critical summary of the net result:"—musically, of course, you mean. But to weigh that rightly we must look at more. Your able correspondents have given you the details and impressions day by day. To see it in the right light, the whole must be put together. We must begin by going back to ask

1. How the Plan looked at first, and how it was worked up.

At first sight, certainly, the project was vain-glorious. The whole style of the announcement was such as to commend it more to the noisy and spread-eagle class of patriots than to still, thoughtful lovers of their country and of peace; while, in respect to music, its enormous promise, its ambition to achieve "the greatest," to "thrust" greatness upon us by sheer force of numbers, and so eclipse the musical triumphs of the world by saying: "Go to now, let us do ten times the biggest thing that ever yet was done"—this, and the extra-musical effects, the clap-trap novelties, grotesquely mingled in its programmes, chilled the sympathies of the real, the enlightened, the disinterested music-lovers, who, feeling for the honor and the modesty of Art, two qualities as inseparable in the artistic character as they are in woman, inevitably shrank from such grandiloquent pretension, as much as they inflamed the imagination of the ignorant or only sentimentally and vaguely musical. "Twenty thousand voices!" Why will you have so many, when even the grandest of Handelian Choruses are better sung by 1,000? And then will "50,000 people" under one roof hear, or let hear, as well as audiences in smaller halls? But it shall be "the Greatest Feast of Sublime and Inspiring Harmony ever heard in any part of the World!" (sic.) This is calculating greatness upon a mere material scale of numbers; this makes your physical giant a greater man than Shakespeare; this confounds the grand homme with the homme grand. Shall quantity compete with quality? Shall great in mass be measured against great in kind? We are making musical progress in America; in popular musical education, as well as in the support of high-toned concerts, in some of our cities, we have really something to boast of; but does any one believe that we are yet so musical that we can produce a musical festival as great in quality, in kind, in spirit, as the best of the Old World? To a true musical character, which were the rarer godsend (to hear, at least, if not to see): a greatest Jubilee like this, or say some festival at Düsseldorf, with seven or eight hundred performers, but with Mendelssohn for a conductor, and such an orchestra as only can be found in Germany, and such a programme (not only Handel Oratorios, but Passion Music or Magnificat of Bach, and, as it was at this last Whitsuntide, with a Joachim to play Beethoven's Concerto, instead of an Ole Bull with "Mother's Prayer"); and above all, with such a spirit of sincere, true art and poetry and piety pervading the whole feast, to the exclusion of all heterogeneous nonsense, all flattering of vanities, catering to all tastes and no taste, startling ad captandum clap-trap, substitution of effect for meaning, to which add decent self-respecting abstinence from the "swell" style of advertisement? Or, not to look so far, compare it with our own best efforts here, with the last Handel and Haydn Festival in Boston Music Hall, where audiences of 3,000 people heard three or four great Oratorios entire, with Choral Symphony of Beethoven, and admirable symphony concerts besides, all in one week, impressively performed by an orchestra of hardly more than 100 instruments and chorus of 800 voices: was not that, musically, greater?

Mind, we are putting the case as it looked, as it must have looked, to really musical and sensible persons at the outset; as it would certainly have looked to Mendelssohn, had he been living then and here.

The idea and the authorship presented the same aspect. That the projector, master-spirit, brain, and central organizing force of the "greatest musical festival in all the ages" should be, not a Mendelssohn, a Handel, or great musical man of any sort, or hardly one who followed with artists, but a Gilmore, a clever leader of a local band, an Irishman by birth, but zealous for the land of his adoption zealous for freedom in a truer than an Irish sense; a man of common education, singularly good-natured and, we doubt not, generous; an enthusiast of rather a sentimental type; chiefly known as caterer in music to the popular street taste, dispenser of military and of patriotic airs, exceedingly fond of demonstrations, restless getter up of "monster concerts," in which classical works of genius were pressed into damaging promiscuity with musical mix pickel for the million; bountiful in advertising patronage (sure road to favor with the press); one of the glibbest, most sonorous and voluminous in all the wordy ways of "stunning" and sensational announcement:—that such a man should be the breather of the breath of life into the great feast of song to which "all that have life and breath" are summoned; that the grandest conceivable of all musical demonstrations should be in its spirit like unto his spirit; that our whole musical world, with all the musical resources of the nation, should be set revolving round a musician of that stamp, and that at such a bugle's blast all the makers of sweet sounds in all the land should rally to a Jubilee of Peace with him, in his way, was something too much for the common, unsophisticated intellect, musical or not, to take in at once, unless one took it in the nature of a colossal joke. How any sound mind at that time could conceive it possible for a thing so started to succeed as this has done, is inconceivable to this day, after the great success. Now, indeed, the lorgnette is turned round, and, looking through the small instead of the great end, cause and effect may not appear entirely incommensurate.

But Gilmore was in earnest. His "fixed idea" had vital marrow in it, and he knew how to magnetize other efficient people to like earnestness. His great devotion to that fixed idea saw only the shining end, pressed onward gazing steadily into the sun, using for means whatever came most readily to hand—chiefly that cardinal lever of all modern business enterprise, unscrupulous advertising, meant innocently in this case, no doubt, though questionable to squeamish folk like you and me, dear Tribune! And had he not the example of the whole business world to tempt him? And here, too, the swell mob style, the returned Californian digger garb and heavy watch-chain air, with which the thing presented itself, was not particularly inviting to sincere music-lovers, jealous, as we have said, for both the honor and the modesty of art. The finer instincts are the more suspicious of whatever is most loudly advertised. The quiet gentleman we trust, but from the loud-mouthed quack we turn away. Not so, however, with the simple masses; high-spiced advertisement does its perfect work with them. To draw an audience of 50,000, a whole community must by some means or other first become infatuated. Never was such advertising, in editorial even more than business columns, as this same Jubilee has had. Shrewd dodges, too! Innocent Bostonian, calm and unsuspecting, opens his daily paper one fine morning, and is coolly informed that he—that all musical Boston—is in a great state of excitement about something of which he never heard a hint before! Our neighbor, in his (Democratic) newspaper, has read the same; and so through all the party shades of journalism—all agreed for once! Day by day, beginning with mysterious hints, do they the tale unfold foreshadowing the great event. Day by day, in ceaseless round, all vying with each other, all the newspapers keep lifting corner after corner of the curtain that conceals the miracle too bright for mortal eyes; kindly provide us with smoked glasses too that we may bear the revelation when the great day comes. Count Cagliostro never conjured more adroitly. Biggest, best-drilled orchestra in all creation? That surely was the Press, which unseen fingers played upon, ever one theme with endless variations, as upon the keys of a piano. The whole expression, publicly, was of one side; the advocates of Jubilee, they only had a hearing. And with a tutti crescendo of amazing confidence, new wonder upon wonder was proclaimed, not as a thing suggested, but as fait accompli, with a: Resolved unanimously, it is to be! No reason to the contrary, no doubt might dare to peep; no uninvaded nook in newspaperdom where any "still, small voice" might seek to be heard. Peace Jubilee had stolen a march upon us in the night and forestalled every channel of communication.

This ringing confidence of the whole Boston Press, this ceaseless roaring deluge of exulting prophesy, was meant to convey the impression to surrounding populations and to distant States that all Boston, with one mind—Boston, famed for music and fine culture—was thoroughly in sympathy with Gilmore, and committed to the project. We were all made ostensibly responsible for the extravagance of the plan, and all the braggadocio with which it was written up. This representation was by no means just or true. There was a vast discrepancy between this newspaper flourish and the private sentiment and conversation in cultivated circles, particularly among those who had the cause of pure musical taste the most at heart; those who, in a sincere and quiet way, it might be, found their best life in the best music. Unconvinced as they were of either the practicability or the desirableness of a musical festival upon so vast a scale, instinctively averse to claptrap, to startlingly "big things," to the whole spirit of the "monster" concert system, mortified, indignant at the boastful attitude in which they found themselves all placed against their will, against their very nature, these were without representation in any public form whatever, except in the exulting taunts of those who had it all their own way. Mr. Gilmore and his early coadjutors doubtless had a host of obstacles to contend with, and it was often up-hill work with them; we honor the faith and perseverance worthy of the Saints, which overcame so signally; but "these little ones," who felt, believed another way, and firmly set themselves against the tide, rather than give in ignominiously to what they could not see to be good, had much the harder trial of their faith, their courage, their integrity.

Meanwhile there had been skillful procuring of endorsements of the project; letters from influential citizens who, not musical themselves, were readily persuaded to a festival of Peace, and not unwilling to have Boston beat the world in the grand scale of its music; letters, too, from prominent musicians who would naturally be the ones to take the lead in practical performance. There was shrewd calculation shown in the order in which individuals were approached, and their adhesion won and published; the prime mover knew his men. Indeed, the thing was worked up with consummate tact; and here lay, probably, the "genius" which has been so freely ascribed to the Projector; for surely the conception, the idea itself, did not require creative imagination, nor invention, until it came to the details of execution, and here, with money, business talent was the one thing needful. And at the critical moment Business stepped in to the rescue; Business, with the money guaranty, with organizing skill, with ready way of rushing its big enterprises through. The application of Dry Goods and Railroad methods saved the whole. The work was well laid out among responsible committees. The word went forth that now the enterprise was on its feet. Conversions became numerous; subscriptions, too; whole business streets were canvassed, and it demanded courage in the unbeliever to say no. The hugo Coliseum went up as by magic. The invitation flew abroad to all the singers; 10,000 wanted; New England—Massachusetts, even—was good for nearly the amount, could honor the draft at sight. By choral societies, clubs, choirs, groups who had sung in Conventions, they poured in. Many new societies sprang up for the occasion; musical instruction in the public schools had silently been feeding all these fountains. They came together with enthusiasm; it waxed warmer and brighter with rehearsals; the sense of participating, and feeling like singing particles in the live fragments of the great whole soon to be fused into one conscious life, the mutual magnetism, the sense of pride, of progress, of coöperation, while the grand culmination loomed beyond—this was inspiring and uplifting, was a great good in itself, almost enough to offset the brag, the claptrap and the humbug of the earlier stages, even should the consummation fail. As for the grand orchestra (1,000 instruments), it was simply a matter of business and money to bring the elements of that together.

The success of the Jubilee in some shape having become a forgone conclusion, those who now took it in hand to draw the actual working plans soon found it necessary to reduce its scale somewhat to bring it within practicable dimensions. Instead of 20,000 singers, the limit was set at 10,000; the Coliseum, instead of 50,000, was to hold less than 30,000 hearers—says 37,000, counting stage and auditorium together. Large enough, in all conscience. With every such reduction the plan gained in the opinion of really musical persons. One by one many of these gave in, accepted part in the management or in the performance, saying: Since its success is certain, let us try to make it worthy of success; let us mould its character, as far as possible, to some consistency of true artistic end and outline—make it musical in the best sense we can, eliminate some nonsense wholly, keep guns and anvils within reasonable bounds, and give the highest music a fair chance. Hence a considerable modification of the programmes. The 20,000 school children, reduced to 7,000, were to have their own day, sweet and peaceful, set apart, and not be huddled in with the general medley of noisy cannonading choruses and all the boisterous excitement sure to go therewith. The Ninth Symphony was wisely voted quite impracticable. The duration of the Festival, having been increased from three to five days, gave room for two programmes almost exclusively of classical selections. The five programmes as definitely settled were pointed to as miracles of skill and "genius." Yet what was good in them was common, the most familiar choruses of well-known oratorios, &c.; what was uncommon was of questionable taste, as guns and anvils for a sublime occasion. And these incongruous elements were queerly mingled. Which was the ruling element? Which set the key and mainly dominated? Plainly, the pieces which the unmusical many like the best, the national airs, &c., with the anvils. The classical selections had, we must confess, the look of being put in apologetically, in order to conciliate the higher taste. (The "sop to Cerberus" reversed). But we shall see.

II. A Few Notes on the Programmes & Performance.

The first day's programme was ceremonial, inaugural, sensational, patriotic. Prayer and addresses, were unheard, while that vast multitude, 12,000 facing 11,000, gazed in wonder on itself, and felt the inspiration of a scene the grandeur and beauty of which were unimaginable before. That spectacle needed no speech, no music even, to make its eloquence sublime and irresistible. That was the secret of the great impression throughout all the days: so many beings met and held together there in full sight of each other, and in perfect order. What but music could secure such order? Prayer and speech were brief; but, even could they have been heard, they were superfluous. What fitter prayer than that religious Luther Choral: "Ein feste Burg," which followed? Full, rich, solemn, grand, the chords rolled forth from 10,000 voices, supported by the great orchestra, but even more by that most powerful organ (small, but built for power), which really seemed the backbone of the chorus. We could wish it had been harmonized by Bach, instead of Nicolai, if only that Bach might have had some recognition among the other mighty masters. Two things were proved at once: that there was no increase of loudness at all proportioned to the number of voices; and that, even if the farthest voices reached the ear a fragment of a second later than the nearest, the ear was not aware of it, while many individual imperfections, even false notes, possibly, were swallowed up in the great volume and momentum of the mass. The same held good of the other pieces of plain choral harmony: Keller's American Hymn, and the concluding "God Save the Queen" (which one of our Psalm Kings, Psalm-anazar I., we dare say, has nicknamed "America") sung to "My Country," with all the spread-eagle accompaniments of drums, guns, bells, &c. The Mozart "Gloria" was a good selection for a day of Peace, and, though it moved unsteadily, yet by its animation and its clear intonation made most hearers deaf to faults. Wagner's Tannhäuser Overture did not prove a fortunate selection for that great orchestra, nor had it any special fitness for the occasion, except as a piece of stirring effect music. In few parts of the vast space could much of it be heard; the violins and brass told well; the reeds, intrusted with the theme at times, were lost. The Overture to "Tell" fared somewhat better, at least in the spirited finale, though the opening, so beautiful with violoncellos (60 of them,) was dumb show to all but the nearest. One envied the singers their places round the rim of the great seething instrumental maelstrom, looking down into it as well as hearing. The "Ave Maria" solo, built by Gounod upon a prelude of Bach, was notable for the rich obligato unison of the 200 violins (though all there was of Bach about it, the arpeggio modulation, complete in itself, and used by Gounod for accompaniment, was covered up so as to be imperceptible), and for the clearness with which Mme. Rosa's voice penetrated the whole space, although it sounded far off and in miniature, as if heard through the wrong end of an opera glass. In the Inflammatus her triumph was more signal, while the great choral climaxes look like the grander summits in the memory of mountain scenery. The rest was sensational: "Star-Spangled Banner," glorified by such broad treatment, with artillery and bells beside—a signal, as it were, to all the world outside that Jubilee had reached its highest moment—and with the melody so divided between deeper and higher voices as to overcome the difficulty for average singers of its great compass. That indeed was thrilling! March from "The Prophet," by full band of one thousand—business enough for all their throats of brass. And Verdi's "Anvil Chorus," causing wildest excitement—not precisely a legitimate effect of music, not the kind of excitement or emotion which musical people seek; fatal to that mood and temper of an audience in which music as such can be felt. Such effects are extra-musical; the spectacle, the hundred scarlet firemen, &c., had much to do with it. Besides, the hundred anvils had a queer and toy-like sound, jingle of sleigh bells rather than the honest Vulcan ring. This was Mr. Gilmore's day, and he conducted all the patriotic pieces, including the opening Choral, in which he realized a good pianissimo, one of the finest effects of a vast multitude of voices. Mr. Eichberg conducted in the Tannhäuser overture, and "Coronation March;" Mr. Zerrahn in the solos and the Gloria.

The second was a great day of excitement. Added to the éclat of the Festival, now in full tide of success, was the visit of the President, rather disturbing the conditions precedent for the "Grand Classical Programme," which had been much relied on for the conversion or conviction of the musically cultivated. The crowd was enormous—double that of the day before; curiosity, hero-worship, swelling heart of patriotism, doubtless drew more than music did. Of course not the best sort of audience either to hear or let hear. Well, the selections were all excellent; though we would except, perhaps, the opening Festival Overture by Nicolai on Luther's Choral. The plain Choral, to our mind, was grander, than with that orchestral counterpoint and trivial episodic theme between the stanzas; not being great work in that kind, like Bach's, it weakens the impression. Of three Handel Choruses, "See the conquering hero" was the most effective; "And the Glory of the Lord," was taken so slow as to make it hard to sing—a necessity, real or fancied, in conducting so vast a multitude through any labyrinthine movement. We were surprised that we could hear Miss Philipps's voice so well; there is a weight in her rich tones that carries far and quietly pervades. The piece, one of the best for her, and one of her best efforts, Mozart's "Non più di fiori," was too good for the crowd, not heard by some on account of restless noise, and not appreciated by the majority. Such a crowd contributes nothing on its own part to music, does not truly listen, but waits to be smitten and carried away. "He watching over Israel," the gentle, softly swelling chorus from Elijah, strange to say, proved one of the most successful of all the choruses that week; like a broad Amazon the stream moved steadily and evenly within bounds, and the round, full, smooth quality of the collective tone is something memorable. "Let the bright Seraphim" was just the perfect selection for Parepa-Rosa in that place, and was the chiefest triumph of her voice. With Arbuckle's trumpet obligato (one long for the real crackling old-fashioned trumpet though) it made great effect, by no means so great as it would be in a smaller hall; but the half-musical, which is by far the larger part of any such great audience, always need the personal element to interest them in music, and go the full half-way to meet a solo. The intermission was of course filled with the Hero-President. Then came Part II., the great Schubert Symphony in C, Mr. Zerrahn's capital selection for his grand orchestra; great hopes had been placed on that, for what symphonic work can bear such magnified presentment, if not that work? Alas! the Tantalus cup was rudely snatched away. The Symphony was to be sacrificed; the other element, fasting from native noise and anvil and free swing of hurrah boys, had grown irrepressible. To the brave President all music is alike, they say, and how easy for some one of the irrepressibles to prompt him to express a wish for good Spread-Eagle Scream with anvils! So into the programme, unannounced, and right before the Symphony, were thrust bodily "Star Spangled Banner" and "Anvil Chorus," once and again, until the building shook with thunder of applause; all mood for finer music was destroyed, all fine conditions broken up, Prospero Schuber's wand tossed under feet. The Symphony was killed! Knocked on the head by anvils! The wand, however, was picked up and waved for form's sake. But it had grown late; people were weary, restless, moving about, or starting homeward, talking aloud, in no mood to listen or let others hear; so the first movement and the Scherzo were omitted; the beautiful Andante (of the "heavenly length") was scarcely heard, and never did the impetuous sublime finale, with the thunder thumps of double basses (think of 70 or 80 of them!) sound so feebly. Were we right in the suspicion that the "classical" programmes were apologetic, meant to be like the "off nights" in a theatre, a compliment to musical taste, while the substantial meal was for the fire-eaters, the sensationalists who go forth "seeking a sign?" Good Mr. Zerrahn's best opportunity was frustrated; he could not try the effect of monster orchestra on this chosen symphony. How much more satisfactory it may have been in the rehearsal, we do not know. Poor chance after this for Haydn choruses: "The Marvelous Work," and "The Heavens are telling;" for, sing as they might to an audience preoccupied, it still went: "The anvils are telling." The selected trio of a dozen solo singers on each part was very pleasing when it could be heard; but there was much floundering in the great chorus, and what was most "telling," as was just said, was retrospective and subjective: the chords those hammers set to vibrating were still undamped.

Third day, like the last, but more so. I was not there, and should have had to be dragged there after that fatigue. It was the 17th of June—of course, the chief day in the anvil calendar. That should have been the President's day; so the two kinds could have been kept distinct, one day for music and one day for glory.

Fourth day, Friday, best of all. The one really musical occasion, when the programme, choice in itself, was preserved in its purity. I had the fortune to sit very near the stage, and found it by far the best place for hearing. Even the orchestra became appreciable. Mr. Eichberg led Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, which perhaps went best of all the orchestral pieces in the festival. Mr. Zerrahn led all the rest. The glorious old C minor Symphony of Beethoven, the one of all others the best known among us, and most sure of close attention, was cut short, needlessly, as there was time enough, and the vast audience was calm; the chance at last seemed offered. But no, the experience of Wednesday had unnerved the valor and faith for Symphonies in that place; there was not courage left to risk it. So the first movement ("Fate knocking at the door") was left out; so, too, was the Scherzo—the curiosity to hear 80 double basses execute their scramble went ungratified; and, though the glorious March Finale sounded very well (and the Andante, too), yet, robbed of its prelude, out of which it grows so marvelously, it lost half its effect, while the return of the three-four Scherzo rhythm in the middle of the march was meaningless. This was the only misdeed of the concert. Miss Philipps sang that large and simple aria of Handel, "Lascia," &c., in her noblest style, and with incredible effect for that vast place. The ten thousand singers had grown more at home in their work, more blended and assimilated by common effort and enthusiasm, now burning at something like white heat, and almost everything went better than before with them. Best of all, the grave and solid chorals from St. Paul—that with the startling trumpet interlude, "Sleepers, awake," especially. It is the solid, ponderous swing of the great mass of sound in plain, long chords like these, sound equally diffused and oceanic, yet, like the wide waste of waters, smooth and unobtrusive, that dwells in the mind as the best, the true effect of choral force so multiplied. Yet all must own that that more rapid, graphic, difficult, exciting chorus of Mendelssohn, the great Rain chorus from "Elijah," was, on the whole, the choral achievement of the whole Festival, which most signally rewarded effort. It was electrifying. Zerrahn, wisely, would not risk a repetition. The down rush through the scale of those two hundred violins was a thing to thank God for, like the rain. The Haydn chorus, the "Inflammatus," this time with eight choice sopranos for the solo, the Prayer from "Moses," and the Mozart Gloria again, made good impression, though faults might be found had one the impression present. The Gloria past, the Handel Hallelujah alone remains, and we await it strong in the peace and security of a pure musical communion so far unbroken. But think not that "the other element" has all this time been sitting quite so patiently. Creditable it was, indeed, to musical taste and culture here, that the vast audience had not shrunk perceptibly before a programme altogether classical; but think not that all those 20,000 people came there without some inward assurance that the Anvil Chorus would appear and take its throne, as matter of course, by divine right of its own, divine right of disorder! Loud was the clamor for it. Fortunately, the means and men for it were absent; or rather, thank and all honor to Mr. Gilmore, who modestly yielded the command that day, and absolutely refused to have the programme interrupted. Yet the Hallelujah suffered after the confusion; singers had grown weary, nervous too, perhaps, and the effect of the great chorus, even with all those means, was not so overwhelming as it has been on more ordinary occasions. It was on the whole a noble concert, heartily enjoyed by all so placed that they could listen, and a comparison of this with Wednesday's concert gives a capital illustration of a great point in the art of programme-making—the importance, namely, of keeping incongruous elements distinct.

It was on Saturday morning, the School Children's day, that we were touched and made to feel for once. The charming scene, the innocent, pure spirit of the whole, the fresh, sweet, silvery voices of the 7,000 children, admirably true and blended in three-part song and unison, their own expressions of delight, their waving of handkerchiefs, and silvery shouts of applause, the kaleidoscopic unity of movement in their physical and vocal gymnastic exercises, all combined to make an exquisite impression. It was good to be there. It meant much for the future and for culture. It was not an art occasion, to be sure, and did not pretend to be. It was unique, a side of the Festival entirely by itself; the most genuine and sincere of all, and, in many respects, the most interesting. The beauty of it was that it did not pretend or strive to be anything but just what it was. But when the exercises came to measured breathing, then to the first utterance of a pure tone, swelling and dying away with the most beautiful crescendo and diminuendo that we ever heard, and finally to the blended tones of the Trichord, purity itself, like the white ray of "holy light" divided by the prism, we were fain to call that just the most exquisite moment of the whole week's Festival. Simple, but divine; impersonal, but alive; without conscious meaning, but implying all! And, after such an illustration as the whole Jubilee had given of the musical resources of our people, was it not worth the while to see the nursery where the seeds thereof are sown?

III. The Net Results.

As an occasion, of a new kind, of unexampled magnitude (unless in semi-barbarous times or Oriental countries)—whatever may have been musically—the Jubilee was a success. All acknowledge it, not without joy, even though at times it may come over some of us again in the character it wore from the first, as a strange overshadowing apparition, a vast work of willfulness, which had intrinsically, ideally, no right to be. As a man eminent in letters and in public life remarked to me yesterday, the amount of it is this: "A ridiculous plan redeemed by a magnificent success." Its friends had a perfect right to be wild over it. Many an unbeliever has been wholly or in great part converted, or at least reconciled to it. It has become a splendid Fact, which has to be accepted. If the projector and his fellow architects were wrong, attempting the impossible, in many points of view the undesirable, they "built better than they knew." It seems as if—the ball once set in motion, or, rather, the vigorous first twist once given at the heart and centre of the revolving and soon formidably expanding maelstrom—as the dream and the intense will of one, magnetizing a few, then many, passed by degrees into a popular movement, assuming almost national dimensions, until the very air was full of it—soon every particle and feature of it, as it were, underwent "a sea change" in the tempering, transforming, vitalizing, and idealizing element of the new, best life and genius of a great, free People; having adopted it almost before they knew it, and hardly knowing what it was, they meant that it should be American in some sense which they could be proud of, and that the biggest gathering and musical array in human history, in spite of its extravagances, should still denote us truly, and be an earnest to the world of what an ambition for the true glory of a great nation, what a sleepless ideal of an ever higher type of Citizenship and of Society, what an energy and wealth of means, what a zeal for culture, what a principle of order and deep love of harmony are in us, in spite of our diversities and the wide space over which we spread. And so it came to pass. And New England, Boston was the place for it. We need not attempt to show what has been so universally acknowledged, that such a feast could have succeeded nowhere else but here.

Musically, the Jubilee had its chief triumphs in precisely those selections which were the least purely musical, of no account as Art, no interest to earnest music-lovers. The parts that were addressed to these were certainly not great successes, and yet more successful than they for the most part had anticipated. Reasons a priori were against great success, and the results do not disprove their soundness.

Consider, in the first place, the mingling of incongruous, internecine elements in the programmes, as we have seen; an incongruity involved in the mixed motives of the plan. There lay the knot of the difficulty: the project was ambiguous; music needs a simple motif. To fire the imaginations of 50,000 people and bring them all together, something other than good music had to be held up to them; a pure feast of high Art could not do it, nor could the genius of high Art do otherwise than run away and hide its face from such publicity as that. On the other hand, when it came to the ambitious promise of combining all the vocal and orchestral resources of the land, conductors of high standing, artists schooled in Philharmonic concerts, accustomed to the interpretation of the great masters, how could their coöperation be had without giving them fit work to do, making the occasion worthy of them? You can have them for Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert, but not for Anvil Choruses and "Yankee Doodle" only. The pride of their profession, and what there is select, superior in it, has to be respected. They must appear to work for Art, else will they come? Now, the question was not simply of a Musical Festival, but also of a Peace Jubilee. Doubtless, in Mr. Gilmore's mind, the desire to display the musical resources of the land combined in one collective effort found sincere opportunity in the return of Peace. Monster Concerts were his passion; Peace and Country, also, were no strangers to his heart. Glorious and sublime it seemed to him to make the two ends meet; what an electric chain of sparks, brightness unspeakable, shot through his brain at the bringing of those two poles together! Then, again, as the circle widened, less ideal motives came in: the Jubilee would give Boston "such an advertisement as it never had;" trade would flow to us, &c., (though many burnt their fingers). These motives were most openly avowed, and the appeal to hundreds of subscribers was mainly put upon these grounds. All very well; but not for Music. Symphonies were promised to conciliate the musical; guns and anvils, national airs, &c., to draw the million and make so huge a project practicable. We have seen how the two got on together; how the anvils killed the Symphony, and how hard was abstinence from anvils when a classical programme was for once allowed its course.—There could not be a better illustration of the law in programme-making, to which we have alluded: that elements incongruous be kept apart, as damaging, if not destructive, to each other. Each piece for its effect is much dependent on what goes before and after; sensational pieces, sure to be encored, rob all that follow of all fair chance for attention or effect. It is the art of picture-hanging as applied to music. We are far from saying that all the good things were lost; not a few of them were highly enjoyable to thousands favorably placed, some of the noble choruses, no doubt, to all. One cheering sign, too, could be read in all this, in the mere indication, spite of imperfect realization, of so many good things: it showed how strong and deeply seated, how widespread the love of the highest kinds of music has become in our community, since it was found essential to conciliate it and defer to it so largely in these programmes.

Acoustically, or æsthetically, with regard to space and power of numbers, the Festival was welcome for its opportunities to test some problems. The vast hall had been pronounced good for sound, because a single voice, a violin, could be heard in its furthest corners. But the walls, built around the utmost limits of the range of a strong voice, were far outside that of many voices—two voices go no further than one, ten thousand no further than an ordinary chorus; the only gain is in intensity and quality, so far as they do reach. Vast volumes of tone were swallowed up in those great spaces, smothered by flags and awnings, or leaked away through crevices, before they reached the ear. Neither the reach, the loudness, nor the sublime sense of mass and volume, were at all proportioned to the colossal numbers. If discords, inequalities, were swallowed up in the general mass, so, too, on the other hand, many true sounds must have neutralized each other. In rapid, complicated movements, too, there was a confused impression, due to the fragment of a second's difference in the time it takes two sounds starting at points 300 feet apart to reach the ear, even supposing perfect unity in execution. At any rate, the general testimony is that all these instruments and voices in that space were not as telling, not as stimulating to the sense or mind, not as startling in the sudden climaxes, not as preoccupying and absorbing to involuntary attention, as a few hundred in a ten times smaller hall. Music as such, acting by itself, without other reinforcement to the listener's imagination, did not speak to musical people with the power it has done in more ordinary circumstances. Every musical man will say: That was no place nor way to feel and enjoy music. In many a smaller festival or common concert he has been more thrilled by it, has carried home a clearer, deeper feeling and impression. Music, in point of audience, and therefore of performing numbers, has its limits. If they were never found before, this Coliseum has outreached them.—The purely instrumental pieces, Symphonies, and Overtures, were poorly heard by most—faint in their effect to all. That mammoth orchestra of near 500 instruments was dumb show to all but the nearest, or to those who sat at the opposite extremity in front, high up in the north balcony. For the accompaniment of the choruses that little giant of an organ, built by the Messrs. Hook, would seem to have been quite sufficient, and the great orchestra almost superfluous so far as its support was palpable; yet doubtless the absence of it would have left a void. This must be understood, of course, as comparatively speaking; "Thanks be to God" could not have made the mark it did unless the orchestra were potent. The overtures, &c., in which the extra 500 military wind instruments participated, were much better heard, though the wind got the better of the strings. And, a fortiori, the out-and-out spread-eagle things, the popular airs with guns and anvils and all extra-musical accessories, made by far the most effect. And their effect made peace impossible in 40,000 people, most of whom could not be musical, nor capable of keeping very still at any time, and who, having once had the appetite for boisterous enthusiasm stimulated, could neither hear nor let hear when the real music came. The solo singers both did admirably; both were heard far better than could have reasonably been expected; yet to the musical listener it was not effect enough to warrant the introduction of a solo in so vast a space. With the multitude, the half-musical, the personal interest is far greater than the musical, and if they cannot have a song which they can identify with a singing person, the occasion is for them a barren one.

But, in spite of the physical drawbacks and the painful, fruitless strain it cost to try to hear, there was, as we have hinted, in the occasion, in the scene itself, in the mutually conscious and uplifting presence of that mighty multitude of human beings, a great reinforcement added to the effect of sound, subjectively, in the imagination of most witnesses. To sit there a live, sympathetic atom in that countless sea of intelligences, together making or receiving harmony, was to hear music through the sense of sight and through a mutual magnetism. That vast, amazing spectacle, suggestive of Infinity, taking possession of sense, mind and soul at once, and keeping it, was to the unmusical imagination a magnifier of exceedingly high power. That intensified every impression that was caught at all. Unmusical people hear what they see; the musical see what they hear. Hence the ecstatic rhapsodies of many of unmusical, but imaginative and enthusiastic temperament, about the sublimity of music never heard by mortal ear before! At the same time the more prosaic natures only knew they could not hear, or, hearing, could not comprehend, and that they felt very restless.

Now looking to the execution of the music, there was very much to praise. In the great chorus there was far more unity, precision, light, and shade in rendering, than almost any one of musical experience could have believed possible. And it grew better as the thing went on. It gave one a proud joy to know that so many thousands of singers, with only one rehearsal of the whole, could sing so well together. It told of musical enthusiasm, of esprit du corps, of good native average of voices and of talent, good instruction, thorough and inspiring drill in separate bodies. No wonder that they all watched for each appearance of their leaders, of Mr. Zerrahn, and Mr. Eichberg, and Mr. Tourjee, as well as of Mr. Gilmore himself, to overwhelm them with the heartiest applause. Certain pieces were far more successful, as we have seen, than others. Generally, the grave, slow Chorals sounded best. Strange to say, and contrary to all we could have looked for, not Handel's choruses, not even the great Hallelujah, still less the choruses by Haydn, made the great effects. The chorals by Mendelssohn, his "Rain" Chorus, and "He watching over Israel," made a far more vivid, more complete impression. Does it, possibly, point to the conclusion, after all, that, of the two great branches of the Protestant religious music—led off respectively by Bach, who built entirely on the Choral, and Handel, who came to Oratorio from a long experience in Opera—that, after all, the Bach direction, upon which Mendelssohn has built, has in it the greater capacity of expansion, a principle more universal and far-reaching, as if springing from a deeper root? I merely offer the conjecture.

One feature in the choral execution I may note with pleasure. There were some beautiful pianissimos—achievement that has seemed almost impossible in smaller halls, where everything above a whisper will sound loud; perhaps in this great space it was as easy as thinking. And generally, I find that I was oftener impressed, in the choruses, by effects of beauty than by effects of power and grandeur. I have instanced "He watching over Israel." The gentle, equable diffusion of softly swelling harmony over so multitudinous a choir, gives a sense of unspeakable beauty, fullness and pervading sweetness, that creeps over you like the infinite calm of all-surrounding ocean.

But I must hasten to a close. Whether the Festival considered musically, were very good or not, it musically did good. At any rate to all those singers and performers. It was a great experience for them. It has given them a new impulse, a new consciousness of strength, a new taste of the joy of unity of effort, a new love of coöperation, and a deeper sense of the divine significance and power of music than they ever had. It has caused hundreds of choral societies to spring into existence for the time being, many of which will certainly prove permanent; and their first bond of union has been the practice of good music, of master-works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, which, having tasted once in such deep draughts, they will not readily abandon for weak trash. Education must come out of it. It has planted, well and widely, for the future.

Was it not good to be there, too, as listener, as looker-on, as sympathetic part and parcel of it? Who would willingly have been left out of such a grand occasion? The greatest assemblage of human beings under one roof ever known! A scene so overwhelming, so sublime, so beautiful from every point of view! An almost boundless sea of live humanity; and all so cheerful, all so happy, full of kindness, rejoicing in the sense of Country and of Brotherhood! Tens on tens of thousands, yet such admirable Order! Could any object, any influence but Music, hold such countless restless atoms in such order?

Finally, in a still wider way it has done good. It has given to tens of thousands of all classes (save, unfortunately, the poorest), who were there to hear, and, through them, to thousands more, to whole communities, a new belief in Music; a new conviction of its social worth; above all, of its importance as a pervading, educational and fusing element in our whole democratic life; a heavenly influence which shall go far to correct the crudities, tone down, subdue and harmonize the loud, self-asserting individualities, relieve the glaring and forthputting egotism of our too boisterous and boastful nationality. Thousands now have faith in Music, who never did have much before; thousands for the first time respect it as a high and holy influence, who very likely looked upon it as at the best an innocent, if not a dissipating, idle pleasure. Public opinion, henceforth, will count it among the essentials of that "liberal education," which is the birthright of a free American, and no longer as a superfluous refinement of an over-delicate and fashionable few. We shall no longer have to plead against such odds to claim, that Music have her permanent, her honored seat among the "humanities" of learning and of general culture. We begin to see how Music is to teach a people manners, mutual deference, and, without outward cold authority, without appeal to fear, but freely and divinely from within, inspire the instinct of respect, of fond and childlike reverence for something still above us, be we where we may,—and this is real Self-respect. So far as the Jubilee has wrought this conversion among unbelieving or indifferent thousands, it has done incalculable good; and if, for this alone, we cannot be too grateful to the men who (whatever our mistrust of motives and of methods once) have given us a great experience. ### After the Feast.

The Tribune of June 28, besides publishing the letters we have copied, has the following editorial remarks:

Gathering up the sober opinions of wise men upon the great Boston feast, now that the noise has died away, and hot blood has cooled, and angry editors have ceased to beat the air, we ask ourselves no longer whether Boston and Gilmore have really attained the glory for which they looked, but whether the prize was worth the winning. For with all its comical aspects—and there surely were enough of them—the Jubilee was a pretty serious affair, a magnificent gathering of enthusiasm, which is too valuable a force to be wasted. There were certain defects in the execution of the plan inseparable from its very vastness; but we are all quick to acknowledge that the result was far more pleasing than most persons outside of Boston—ourselves included—supposed it could be, and more pleasing than it would have been in any other city of America. If we look at the festival merely as a monster concert, then it was not worth doing, for Boston has many a time surpassed it. But it was something more than a concert, and we think upon the whole it must do good. It will go far toward familiarizing the people with the higher kinds of music, and weaning them from the unwholesome theatrical stimulants which have so much corrupted the public taste. It will be felt by a class of persons whom the ordinary concert does not reach, because they never go to it. It may perhaps popularize musical festivals in this country such as are frequent in Germany and other parts of Europe. It will certainly promote the formation of permanent choral societies, especially among the men and women who sang in the great Jubilee chorus; and possibly it may even result in the fusion of our half dozen puny New-York singing societies into one grand and powerful organization. We may look upon it in fact as a sort of musical revival,—not free from extravagances and follies, but invaluable as generator of the enthusiasm which is afterward to be expended in sober and persistent effort.

We have said that the Jubilee could have been organized nowhere but in Boston. A great orchestra can be collected by anybody who has the money to pay for it; but a great chorus, in the present condition of American musical culture, is impossible except in the capital of New-England. Boston has the best chorus leader in the United States,—a gentleman who does not confine his labors to that city, but exerts them all through the towns of Eastern Massachusetts and some of the neighboring States, and who had personally trained about one-third of all the ten thousand singers. This was a great help, but it was not all. Children in Boston learn music with their alphabet. Singing by note—not the mere screaming of tunes—is taught in the most thorough and systematic manner in all the public schools. This is why Boston has such magnificent choruses; and shall we not say that the charming good order, good temper, and enthusiasm which were so conspicuous in the motley crowd that overflowed the Coliseum were also attributable in no small degree to the refining and elevating influence of an early musical education. Here New York and all the great cities of America may find their lesson of the Jubilee.

The Festival Acoustically Considered.

"Where does all that mass of tone go?" asked almost every body who attended the monster concerts in the Coliseum. Those who went, expecting to be overwhelmed in a tide of sound which should arouse in them something akin to awe, who were prepared for a grandeur of effect far greater than had ever before been produced by masses of instruments and voices, have been, if not disappointed, surprised at the tumultuous murmurings they have listened to. While the accuracy of time and excellence of tune which the 10,000 voices exhibited, were greater than had been feared, the volume of sound given forth was exceedingly small in proportion to the number, and therefore the Festival, in this respect, was a failure. Some predicted this; but most people expected to feel themselves uplifted upon a storm of harmony, exalted to an emotion of sublimity by a magnificent wealth of sweeping, crashing chords. Now that the glamour of Jubilee has passed away, and the result of the Festival can be considered from a purely musical view, we can easily see that the failure results not from imperfectness of execution, but from an attempt to combat the simple laws of nature.

The voices of two men cannot be heard farther than the voice of one man. This is the simple explanation of the failure. Within the limits of sound, near enough for the ear to readily and effectively hear a single voice, an added volume of tone of the same calibre tends to increase the sensation in the ear; but when the limits of hearing have been reached, a thousand added voices are no more discernible than one. They all fall short at the same point that one did.

If we throw a pebble into still water, a series of undulations are initiated, which become fainter and fainter at their circumference until they are no longer visible. If we throw a handful of them in, a far greater commotion is made where they fall, and a broken, confused series of waves initiated, which move on, like the first one, but extend no farther. It is precisely the same with the undulations of air initiated by voices or instruments. The size of the Coliseum is such as to include or nearly include the limits of an ordinary voice. Mme. Parepa, with a strong, telling voice, standing nearly one-third of the length of the building from one end, was clearly heard, and just heard, at the other end of the building. It was noticed that at the opposite balcony the eight voices which sang the "Inflammatus" made scarcely any more effect than Mme. Parepa did alone. The forty voices which sang the solos in "The Heavens are telling," sounded like a weak quartet. The fifty trumpets were scarcely more sonorous, at the same distance than one. The two hundred violins were no more telling than those of an ordinary Music Hall orchestra, and not nearly so pungent in quality of tone. The great chorus was just heard in the piano passages, and in the loudest bursts was not so voluminous as the ordinary Handel and Haydn choruses in the Music Hall. The great organ sounded as a common church organ does to one passing by in the street. The whole combined effect of the 10,000 singers and 500 musicians was far inferior, in point of soul-stirring power, to that which was experienced at the Handel and Haydn Festival in the Music Hall.

The reason of this, as we have before said, is that the distance between the performers and the auditors,—at the extreme ends—is so great that the amount of disturbance of the air at one end is not great enough to extend to the other. Very many of the voices which were raised there could not be heard at all at a distance of five hundred feet, and the limits of all of them could not extend very much farther.

In perfect stillness, the mass of tone would doubtless have travelled farther than this, not with sonority, but with a sufficient force to be distinctly heard. But instead of silent surroundings, the rustle of dressings, the conversation of thousands of people, the tramp of hundreds in the corridors, all going on during the performances, and almost inseparable from such immense gatherings of non-musical people, effectually covered up the softer passages, and materially affected even the loudest.

It may be asked why we hear sounds equally light at a much greater distance, oftentimes, in the open air? It is because they are reinforced by various agencies. The wind will carry on aerial undulations to a great distance, while they cannot be felt in the opposite direction for a greater part of the distance. A building constructed of resonant materials will hold and reflect a wave of sound to a greater distance than it would extend in space unaided. A torpedo thrown down in a parlor will create a more violent disturbance than a pistol will in a church. It is for this reason that the choral performances in the Music Hall are more sonorous than were those in the Coliseum, which was very inartistically contrived to reinforce and continue the sound made by the performers. Instead of a continuous arch, which would gather the sound and reflect it, the roof was broken into an inclined plane over the galleries, and an upright chimney in the centre, perforated with open windows. The gallery ceilings were covered with cotton cloth, from which depended, at regular distances, curtains of the same, effectually cutting off and smothering the tone which might have been carried along by resonant surfaces. The body of the building was hung with flags, stretching across and absolutely hiding the choristers from those in the corridors. All this, instead of assisting the distant voices, added to the normal hindrances to their being heard. Those on the floor were so low that the mass of tone rose far above them, leaking out at the many open windows and losing itself in space.

We have been speaking throughout of the natural and artificial hindrances to the success anticipated, of the causes why the voices of 10,000 singers sounded so faintly in the Coliseum. But we cannot omit to commend the chorus heartily for what it did, for its accuracy of time and tune, and to ascribe the highest praise to Mr. Zerrahn for the masterly way in which he led his vocal forces.

Among the Roses.

(AFTER HAFIZ).

A soft wind breathes from Eden,
And in mine ear this message blows :—
"Not from the soul of Hafiz
That fount of song exhaustless flows !
Ere time and spare were measured,
Where Eden's radiant garden glows,
Each magic verse was written
On leaf of lily and of rose."

My serious friend, advancing,
Brings the tables of Moses.
Through their dew-veils glancing,
Slyly laugh the roses.
Cries he : "On the jailer
Call to split their noses !"
What, to jail wouldst trail her,
One of these soft roses ?
Of this sneeze-wort take, then,
Two or three good doses ;
O'er thy brain will break then
Thoughts, like thoughts of roses.
"Wanton thoughts each ponders, Godless hue discloses !"
Friend, thy reason wanders,
Thou knowest not the roses.
Not in Eden's splendor,
Not on earth reposes
Aught so bright, pure, tender,
As the thoughts of roses !

Messages of heavenly wonder
Are not sent alone in thunder ;
Lo, a hedge of summer roses
Flames, the burning bush of Moses ;
And in brilliant colors' splendor,
In aroma rich and tender,
Tells, oh God ! the golden story
Of thy goodness and thy glory !

Take a glad example from the roses ;
Look, they laugh in beauty fresh and bright ;
From amber morn until the day light closes,
They rejoice in dew, and air, and light !
Dull renunciation never poses,
Never pales their bloom with joyless blight ;
In their lives they never think of Moses,
In the prophets never take delight.

When the fire is fading from mine eye,
When my laughter sinks into a sigh,
When these nerves and veins and throbbing brains
Ache with age's weary, racking pains,—
Then no grave physicians' potions bring ;
On the wind all foolish nostrums fling ;
Let me breathe the only saving breath,
Love, love, thine ! the life that conquers death !
Let me hear the spring's oracular tongue,
Spring, eternal prophet ever young !
Let me read the wisdom that reposes
On each leaf of fresh unfolding roses ;
Ope the casement, let the birds fly in ;
Come with lute, and flute, and tambourine,
Song and roses, wine and honey laden !
Bring my joy, my pride, my high-souled maiden !
But, if these cannot bring back again
Life to lethargy, and rest to pain,
Priest, physician, prayer, will be in vain ;
Go in peace then, nothing more will save ;
Say good night, my friends, and dig my grave.

Musical Libraries.

[The following remarks, under the heading :
"Art Music in 1871," appear in the London Orchestra of June 18.]

South Kensington will be in about two years' time a marvellous magazine for Art, if all promises be fulfilled. As the Museum now exists, it is a great boon to students, and an increase in point of attraction to the rising generation in the metropolis. Any young man, should he feel so inclined, may after the ordinary avocations of the day make himself a scholar in any commonly sought for language, or a thorough adept in any one of the arts. Painting is well represented ; engraving capitally so ; and there is no lack of the means of information touching the essentials of sculpture and architecture. There is a library of music, somewhat limited and wide in its selection, but good in itself, and suggestive of its many wants. As the art of music is to stand prominently forward in the Albert Hall, it would be well if the royal and distinguished governors of this institution were to direct their attention at once to the formation of a real musical library, so essential and interesting to the amateur, and so absolutely necessary to the profound musician. There is a rare and splendid library of music in the British Museum, and the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society possess a curious and valuable collection ; but there is no library in London that we know of which can boast of any strict sequential series on any particular branch of musical art. No student or amateur could gather what was done for music by such musicians as Morales, Orlando di Lasso, Alessandro Scarlatti, Jomelli, Leo, and their successors and fellow laborers in opera. Up to a certain point, Italian operas were never printed ; and how few of our musicians know anything of the hundred operas composed by Alessandro Scarlatti, the great modern founder of the Italian musical drama ? There is a beautiful edition of Lulli's operas printed in Paris at the beginning of the last century, but there is no copy of this great work in our metropolis. No London library, excepting that in the Royal Palace, contains a set of the Handelian operas ; nor is there any perfect set of the works of the great opera composers since Handel's day. An amateur may gather much from what in public libraries he may find on the opera ; but a student would be puzzled and embarrassed by constant gaps ; and as to the historian, his task is hopeless ; he would be, so to say, altogether without proper reference. Again, take the history of the metrical psalm and hymn tune. On this subject there are two libraries displaying immense research and offering everything that amateur, professor, and historian can possibly want ; but one is in Germany and the other in America. There is comparatively nothing on this point in the British Museum, and if possible less than the negative at Exeter Hall. Within these few years past some very rare books on psalmody have been offered to public competition, but neither British Museum nor Exeter Hall was represented, and these not costly rarities passed either to Scotland or to Brussels. There are two magnificent private libraries of musical art in Scotland, and the library of the Conservatoire at Brussels (thanks to M. Fétis) is a collection almost without parallel. The governors of the South Kensington Museum would confer a great boon to music and its professors by at once commencing a perfect set of the compositions by what may be called the modern composers. Of these Germany has published small and cheap editions, but much to be prized for their correctness and beauty ; and the entire works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and all the other well-known and revered names, may be obtained at an outlay of some twenty or thirty pounds. In this way a beginning might be made, offering great help now, and great promise for the future. There is, we believe, in London a perfect set, or nearly so, of the operas of Louis Spohr in full score. Although this selection cost a great sum of money, they have been offered for sale at a most reasonable price, involving a horrible sacrifice, but no one was found anxious or willing to accept the offer. This collection would be a great feature in the South Kensington library.

Works on the theory of music are essential to a public library in the art, and as books of this kind really bring little or nothing in the auction room, an historical series might be easily made, and at a small charge. The treatises of this nature are divided into six classes—those discussing Greek art, early Church art, Mediæval art, A la capella art, the school of the last century, and the present semi-tonic system. It might be difficult, and perhaps attended with some expense, to make this branch of musical study what it ought to be in a public library like that of the South Kensington Museum ; but by limiting the series much might be easily and speedily effected. Let the collection begin with the two theories which have made all modern music—that of Rameau and Tartini. The number of curious, learned, and entertaining books that have been written on this subject since the days of Rameau and Tartini is most extraordinary. Many of them are quite outside and unknown works. They come into the auction-rooms, are knocked down for a shilling, and disappear no one knows where. The enthusiastic collector dies, and about every twenty or thirty years they are found again to await the fate of the auctioneer's hammer. The last collection of this kind belonged to the late Mr. William Ayrton ; and it were well for South Kensington if such a collection could be now found on its shelves. The undergraduates at Oxford have recently heard a lecture on hymn-tunes by the Professor of Music in that University, and from this oration it is not difficult to imagine that the College libraries in Oxford, nay even the great Bodleian itself, must be sadly deficient in works on metrical hymnody. The professor told his hearers that in Reformation days hymns consisted of twelve verses or more ; but the number of verses was found to be no difficulty with congregations, for hymn-tunes in those times were sung rather fast ! As at the period to which the professor alluded there were no hymns sung at all, the question of speed does not arise. But if the professor was thinking of metrical psalm-tunes, we beg to assure him that these were not sung rather fast, but on the contrary rather slow—at a rate which in these days would be thought monstrous slow.

It is not a little singular that we should be quietly and unobtrusively founding a national academy for the study of music among other arts in this metropolis, whilst in the sister-isle we are about to destroy the time-honored establishments for the cherishing of musical song there, and reducing it to the miserable condition of church music in Scotland. Nor can it be concealed, that if musical foundations go down in Ireland, they will ere long go down in England ; and it will come to this, that musical art will be separated from religious art, and we shall fall into the status now everywhere visible in Germany, Italy, and France. Musical composition, we are told by a distinguished German philosopher and historian, is over and done with in Germany ; he sees no dawn on the horizon ; and thinks the case hopeless. There is nobody in Italy but Verdi—a giant in dramatic power—but the lyrical feeling of the stage is in direct opposition to the lyrical feeling of the Church. The very tone of the present race of Italian vocalists would appal the great church singers of the days of Pergolesi and Jomelli. The singers of their times were taught to give expression to emotions of reverence, dignity, gratitude, hope, love, brotherhood, and all the outgoings from humanity appertaining to worship; and these singers carried their great and mighty mechanism into the theatre; and although Addison in the Spectator laughed at Handel and his operas, Handel well knew what really grand singing could do, and Addison found he must bespeak his ticket of admission many days before the performance, and had to take great care lest his coat were torn off his back in his endeavour to gain his entry into the theatre. True it is the opera is now crowded nightly, and we have singers who can sing anything and everything; but the tones are not the same, for the feelings are not the same; and the general portraiture of passion in a modern opera is now frequently no way creditable, either to the book-maker or the musician. The separation of musical art from its mother and nurse—the Church—has led modern composers to take the military band, the dance, and the instrumental forms as his models for vocal music. But no military band can equal the solidity and solemnity of the old church orchestra; no form of the dance is a legitimate expression of the language-rhythms; and the best of all instruments—whatever instrument that may be—is a miserable substitute for the human voice. Music in Paris without religion has let in the Jew, and if Wagner is to be believed—and there is some truth in what he says—a pretty mess the Jew has made of it. On one point Wagner has undoubtedly spoken some truth, when he writes that Meyerbeer knew himself he was making vain and trivial music, offering one kind of ennui in exchange for another, conscious he could not create a great work of art, and simply perfecting himself in the one sole mission of his life—how to deceive. This is the end and consummation of musical art separated and divorced from the spirit of church music. We are about to do the same thing that has been done in Germany, Italy and France—take the study of music away from its legitimate connection with religious art, and leave it to the tender mercies of the academy, the concert-room, and the stage. Should this be done at the South Kensington Museum, we have small hope of any great success for music in that quarter. The museum must have its chapel, its choir, and its orchestra; and before its students write music for the pleasure of their countrymen, they must learn to write music for the honor of the God that made them.

Liszt at his Residence in Rome.

[Correspondence of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin].

Rome, Italy, June 8th.

The church of San Francesca Romana, added to its classical site, its possession of the tombs of a holy Roman Patrician saint, and of a great Umbrian painter, Gentile da Fabriano, has another attraction, which will make it hereafter a classical spot to the musical student: A great musical poet—Liszt, the inspired rhapsodist of the piano, at the very point of perfection in that instrument—lives under the roof of the Olivetan buildings, which are at the back of the church of San Francesca Romana.

Last winter, in January, the day before Liszt left Rome for Weimar, a friend introduced me to the great musician, who courteously expressed a hope that we might meet again this spring, after his return from Weimar.

During the winter I have formed the acquaintance of a young priest, who is the intimate friend and pupil of Liszt—Don Zefrino Falcioni. This young gentleman lives with his mother and her brother, an old priest, in a charming little house on the Palatine hill. There he was born, on the very ground of the Palace of the Cæsars.

His uncle, a benefactor of St. Maria Maggiore, has charge of the small, interesting old church, St. Sebastiano al Monte Palatino, which the Prince Barberini is now repairing. This church; the adjoining garden; the house, with its occupants, and accessories; the entrance-hall down stairs, whose walls are hang-with prints of old musical composers; the young musical priest's room above, with its library of quaint old books, busts and portraits of great musicians; piano, holding a laurel-crowned bust of his idol, friend and master, Liszt,—all make up a spot full of romance. Fifty novels might be thought of there, and the picturesque-looking young musical priest might be the hero of a hundred romances. My imagination always flies off on voyages of discovery in the region of fiction whenever I go there. Through Don Zefrino, as we call him, I received, a fortnight since, an invitation from Liszt to call upon him, and last Friday afternoon I went with Don Zefrino, accompanied by a lady friend. We found some gentlemen in the salon. Liszt received us most cordially, and, after a pleasant little talk, said to me, in a low voice:

"If you can wait until after these gentlemen leave, I will play for you."

During their visit I had time to examine the celebrated musician and his surroundings. Liszt is known to be singularly free from all luxurious tastes. His reception room is a large, spacious one. The floor is covered with a simple drugget. On the day I was there the large table, which stands in the first corner, had on it a plain white cover, some pamphlets and well used books, and a paper-weight or two of simple fashion. In the other corner near the large, full grand Chickering piano, was a statuette of the Blessed Virgin; beside this was a small table, with papers, photographs and two small busts—one of Wagner, the other of the young King of Bavaria, who jilted his pretty young cousin. The only thing on the plainly papered walls was a map of the seven hills of Rome. The other furniture consisted of chairs and two sofas, covered with common brocatelle, and the curtains to the windows were of the simplest white muslin. But the view from these windows made amends for all shortcomings in the way of upholstery. The Sacra Via passes under them; the Arch of Titus and Palatine Hill lie in front, and by leaning a little out there can be seen to the left the ever graceful profile of the colosseum against the tender, throbbing blue of the beautiful Roman sky.

Liszt, too, must be described while we are waiting for his visitors to leave. He is fifty-seven—for, like kings and queens, his birth is registered, and there can be no evasion—but he does not look so old by ten years. The Abbé's costume is very becoming to him, for he has a well-shaped leg and foot. The shoes: ad on them gold buckles, but the rest of the dress was very plain,—black silk stockings, knee-breeches fastened at the knees with three black buttons, and a long black coat, made something like a woman's polonaise—the orthodox Abbé dress.

Liszt's hair is thick and long, as in his pictures, but streaked with grey. The expression of the face is benignant and dignified, and his eyes are a bright keen grey. The wild, melancholy look, and defiant expression of the mouth and long, firm jaw, which can be seen in early pictures of this remarkable man, have disappeared entirely, if they ever existed. He is called homely by a great many; but when I admire a gifted person I never think of good or bad looks; to me, such faces are always just the ones that ought to belong to their owners. "It must be admitted," said a friend to me, "that Liszt has six huge warts on his face."

Yes, I remember noticing them—a snarling one on the forehead, just above the nose—and I thought when I looked at them how well they agreed with his face; they added to the individuality. But, after all, in the expression of Liszt's face lies the charm: it is kind, courteous, gentle and yet dignified. He is accused of being haughty and conceited. I saw nothing of it. I did notice a high air of poetic exaltation—a happy, free, independent expression, which was extremely attractive.

Liszt's manners are easy, quiet and genial, and he converses freely in French, German and Italian; English he speaks slowly, but well. After his visitors left, he rubbed his hands and said gayly:

"Now we will have the music while it is fresh."

But just as he said this the door opened, a new visitor entered who had to be attended to, and we waited another ten or fifteen minutes. During that time I noticed his hands. They are slender, the fingers long and thin, well-kept, good-shaped nails; but the thumb was the wonder. We have been amusing ourselves over Deshayrolles' "Mystères de la Main," this winter, and we carried on a sotto voce conversation over these marvellous thumbs. They are the longest I ever saw, and reach up to the first joint of the fore finger. "The thumb is the whole of life," all old chiromantists have said, and Liszt's certainly seems to be one proof at least of this. We examined as well as we could his other fingers, balanced them with these thumbs, and used all our superficial knowledge. The result was that of most fortune-tellers who know the fate they prophesy. Liszt's fingers are finely formed; they express idealism and poetry, susceptibility, analytic order; they are smooth and flexible, which implies inspiration, tact and egotism; but every quality is balanced and controlled by these long thumbs; powerful will speaks in the first joint, and logic in the second, and these united to the fine fingers and firm hand, according to Deshayrolles, give activity, power of execution, and lead on to fortune.

The second visitor left and Liszt said, as he took a seat at the piano:

"Since you are interested in Chopin, I will give you something of his."

To see Liszt playing is as fine as to hear him. His mobile face expresses every varying emotion and feeling in the music. He seemed one with his instrument. I forgot to examine how he made his wonderful trill, which is more like the nightingale-note than any other piano trill I ever heard; and when he ended one and passed on to the other musical passages, I thought of —"her post-coital she strength O'er pain to victory;"

the music went with the same keen sweep as the bird note does. I could not analyze or note any way or manner of his playing while I listened, except this: his perfect stillness, his quiet pose. That firm hand, long, supple, smooth fingers and powerful thumbs drew out the music, as if it had been harmonious breath, and the face was lofty, smiling, gentle, serious, just as the music came. I was not surprised as I had expected to be—not overpowered; but his music made me perfectly happy, it seemed to be full and satisfactory.

"What did he play?" I have been asked very often since. If he had not told me I should not have known. Two or three gleams of some of the Chopin Etudes peeped out here and there, but flitted off just as my memory tried to seize on them. After awhile a mystic confusion began, and a mazourka glided swiftly by. It was a beautiful shadowy dramatic fantasia, and sometimes Liszt looked just as he does in the popular picture which almost every American music-loving girl has hanging over her piano—Matinée with Liszt—in which Czerny, Berlioz and Ernst are listening to this king of pianists.

"But what did he play?" my friends repeat. "Three etudes and a mazourka of Chopin, arranged by myself as a fantasia," was Liszt's reply, when asked.

I thanked him after he was through and we took our leave. He accompanied our little party through his anteroom to the head of the stairs, shaking us by the hand cordially many times, and repeating his courteous invitation to come again to see him, and so ended my

"Matinée bei Liszt."

ANNE BREWSTER.

The Forthcoming Requiem for Rossini.

In the course of the next three months Verdi and his collaborators promise to be ready with the new Requiem Mass, to be used for the early peace and happiness of the late Gioacchino Antonio Rossini. The composers handed together in this labor of love number one over the dozen; but of the thirteen not many are known for special work in this country. With Verdi all the world claims acquaintance, and of Ricci and Cocca something has been heard. Bazzini, Rizzola, Boucheron, and Cagnoni are names without currency; Gaspari, Nini, and Mabolini rise up for the first time; and Pedrotti, Petrella, and Platania, whether entities or nonentities, are terms irresolvable, and are quoted without impression. The Office for the Dead in the English Church, whether for idea or language, is unsurpassed by that in any branch of the Church Catholic; and take it all in all, that for the Latin is wonderfully appealing and sublime. The former considers rather "those that are alive;" the latter is more especially directed towards the one member who has passed from the visible into the invisible; one sojourn has been completed and ended, another has been entered upon, and all thoughts, hopes, and energies are concentrated upon the consideration of the next passage, and the consummation so longed for and so to be prayed for. The mere Requiem Mass is but a small part of the office. The Psalms are some of the finest in the Psalter, and admirably fitted for intense musical expression: the short lessons are most beautiful, and in lyrical and in dramatic feeling call for the heart and hand of the foremost of masters in composition. "Behold, I show you a mystery," "(O) death, where is thy sting?" "The hour is coming and now is," "If we believe that Jesus died," "I know that my Redeemer liveth," "I am the resurrection and the life," and other portions of Holy Scripture of like solemn and yet jubilant character, tend to give this ancient office the tenderest regards. Many of these texts fall familiarly on English ears, from their settings by Handel in his oratorio of the "Messiah," and it is not a little singular that the third division of this great work should contain so much of the ancient services for the departed. The oratorio ought to have closed with the grand alleluia, and it is said that the third part was an afterthought. Had it been otherwise we should have lost a great song, much fine concerted music, the "Worthy is the Lamb," and one of the few canonic choruses teeming with life and interest.

No one could have objected to a club of composers undertaking to set the Dirige and Requiem Mass to music, and there is ample material for the employ of a dozen hands or more. But we object to the division of the Requiem. Clubbed operas have never answered, and the clubbing together for a Mass has hitherto been declined by all great artists. The Requiem Mass is no longer service; the Dies Ira takes the place of the Gloria, and the Lux eterna and Hosanna are no very extended additions. Nothing can be gained by division of labor, but much must necessarily be lost. The general feeling of the situation cannot be obtained, the growth and development of the contrasts must fail in truthful realization, and each composer must lose in power by his hand being shortened and his imagination restrained. The arrangement with the Rossini Requiem we think altogether a mistake, and likely to lead to a miserable result. The noble and grand hymn, the Dies Ira, has been split up into seven fragments, and apportioned to MM. Bazzini, Pedrotti, Cagnoni, Ricci, Nini, Boncheron, and Coccia. Some of these gentlemen much deserve commiseration. What can M. Ricci do with the Recordare? What M. Boncheron with the Confutatis? To make the task more irksome and desperate, the shape, style, and method of the movements are severally cut and carved out. Bazzini is to set the first verse of the Dies Ira in C minor, as a chorus and allegro maestoso. Ricci is ordered to make a Recordare in the same key, and for the same quartet voices as those used by Mozart. Poor fellow! he should, like Mozart, have a brain fever and give up the ghost, before he writes the Recordare he is contemplating. Pedrotti promises the Tuba mirum in E flat major, as a bass solo with chorus, and Cagnoni the Quid sum miser, as duet for soprano and contralto, in A flat major. Coccia will give as an allegro accompanied, and andante unaccompanied, the Lacrymosa, in G major and minor; and Nino supplies the only tenor solo, a largo in A minor, for the Ingenium. But of all the thirteen the most to be pitied is the composer Gaspari, who is to write the new Domine in C major for a solo voice and chorus accompanying. Whatever the musicians of the Latin Church may have left undone, the Domine is not of the number. No one, we imagine, can transcend the Domine of Mozart, either for music or imagination. Mozart's Domine is like Handel's Alleluia, a thing apart—hopelessly inimitable. The Sanctus and Agnus Dei are divided between Platania and Petrella, the Sanctus as a chorus in D flat major, and the Agnus Dei as a solo for the contralto, in F major. The Lux eterna has fallen to Mahellini, and Verdi appears at the close with the Libera me set as solo for a soprano and chorus moderato, then allegro, and finally a fugue. Verdi has certainly the best of the situation, and one escaping direct comparison with the great German. The whole Requiem is not to take more than an hour and a half in performance, and each movement is limited to seven minutes. This order is perhaps the least of all the orders to be commended. The Procrustean measure must be almost fatal to the making up of the work. Why should the Domine be measured off with the Ingenium, or the Sanctus with the Lux eterna? If this direction be complied with, the success of the Mass will be greatly endangered.

The new Requiem is laid out dramatically, but there are opportunities sufficient to demonstrate the present condition of Italy as to church work and contrapuntal handling. It will be indeed a great curiosity, an entirely novel affair, if no more. What however is wanted is a service for the dead, written not in the spirit of antiquarianism, but with all that Art, as it is at present, can do, and in the tone and feeling proper to the office. There is no perfect setting of the Dirige: why should there not be? Why should a few monks or priests have this noble and pathetic service to themselves? It may be said that there is no sacrifice in connection with this office, but surely this is no valid reason against the employ of art or all its resources. The Mass, although calling for the highest forms and strongest feelings, is not to engross to itself these forms and feelings. There is no law and no reason why a composer should set the Te Deum laudamus in a lower condition than the Gloria in excelsis. Both deal with the same facts, appeal to the same emotions, afford the same opportunities, and call forth the same fervor and zeal.

Much would have been gained, had it been so arranged that these thirteen composers were set at work upon the entire office instead of upon the Mass only. There are psalms enough, portions of songs, tunes enough, to have employed every member of this little harmonical army. There is the beautiful lyric, "Like the hart pants;" the jubilant, "I will magnify Thee;" the glorious inspiration, "The Lord is my light;" the "Miserere mei," the "In Te Domine," to say nothing of the grand antiphons and the affecting little chapters. It is against rule, we believe, to set the collects to church music; but if the rule be elastic, in this indomitably unbending corporation, a fine opportunity opens in this direction.

The last great council of the Latin Church very wisely took music into its consideration, and the forthcoming one may and will probably follow its example. The Latin Church has more need of composers than priests, more call for good music than additional doctrine, and will prove of greater service to Christendom if it attempts to amend what it now possesses. The English Church made a truly noble musical service out of the old matins, lauds, and vespers; the Roman has its work to do herein. Our Burial Office is an antiquarian affair—slow without solemnity, sombre without pathos, contrapuntal without learning. We have need of a new service, but ask not for thirteen heads to be engaged in it. Our composers depart; but no one sets to work "In memoriam;" and whether wisely or otherwise, the Italians have set us a good example in their labor of love and remembrance. Some good must come out of this most singular experiment.—Orchestra.

Wilhelm Bernhard Molique.*

So do they live and die, the true and glorious sons of art! Themselves without pretension, they fill the world with works of genius; then remain quiet and retired; then burst forth once more—and then disappear for ever! And then their contemporaries exclaim: Who? Where? We did not know it: What, a man like him! So did Molique come before the world, so was he inspired by his art, as was, also, through him, his generation; so did he utter his unrivalled strains, which found their way to men's souls; so did he end, and so does the world of art, deeply moved, gaze after him. Whoever heard his violin playing, either in the compositions of others, or in his own, heard what violin playing, genial, classic, thoroughly artistic violin playing, really is; whoever listened to his compositions, felt that they sprang from the soul of a master; whoever met him in private life, said to himself: I see before me a man in the best sense of the word. On the 12th May Cannstadt witnessed his funeral—he always wished to die in Spring.—Wilhelm Bernhard Molique was born on the 7th Oct., 1802, at Nuremberg. His father, the Stadt musicus, or Musician to the Town, gave him his first lesson in music. King Maximilian I., of Bavaria, having heard of his precocious talent, sent for the boy, when he was fourteen, to Munich, in order that he might have lessons on the violin from that admirable artist, Pietro Rovelli, Court Violinist. At the age of sixteen, Molique became a member of the Imperial Chapel, Vienna, but returned a year afterwards to Munich, to fill the office of his old master, Rovelli, who had died in the interim. In the year 1824, he became acquainted, at the house of Herr Peter von Winter, the Capellmeister, with Marie Wanne, that gentleman's niece and adopted daughter, and married her a twelvemonth later. In the year 1826, having been offered it, he accepted the place of Musical Director at the Theatre Royal, Stuttgart. Not only, for a long series of years, did he command the unbounded approbation of his audiences by his violin playing, and, in his capacity as conductor, unite the greatest discretion with the most delicate ear, but he was busy also as a teacher of the violin and of composition. Though he was a master of counterpoint, he had never received any instruction in it. During his residence in Stuttgart, he made, every year, long professional trips to Holland, Russia, England and France. Wherever he went, he met with the same enthusiastic reception as in Germany, being overwhelmed with honors and marks of distinction. He was always glad to get back "to his Stuttgart-ers," by whom he was invariably welcomed with ever increasing affection. This rare artist returned the partiality which Stuttgart evinced for him, by remaining faithfully within its walls, and by resolutely refusing a most advantageous offer from Hanover, and another as professor at the Conservatory, from Prague. The political disturbances of the year 1849, however, induced him to send in his resignation, and migrate with his family to London. In that capital he lived seventeen years, honored and loved by all who knew him; and, by his unshakable adherence to what he had found to be true and genuine in art, exercising great influence upon musical matters there. In the year 1859, he received the most hearty and delighted welcome from this paper, as well as from other quarters, on his return, for a short time, to Stuttgart, on which occasion he had an opportunity of greeting once more a great many old and enthusiastic friends, especially his talented pupil, Herr Keller. He gave a concert at the Theatre Royal, and, profoundly delighted at the rapturous applause with which he was received, as well as at the faithful attachment to him manifested on so many sides, returned to London—after having given concerts, also, in Munich and Frankfurt—with the conviction that the same enthusiasm with which he had formerly met in Germany still existed for him here.—Among Molique's compositions, which all breathe a clear and thoroughly classical spirit, we would direct particular attention to his Violin Concertos; his Mass in F minor, for four voices, with orchestral accompaniment (composed in the year 1843); his Quartets for Stringed Instruments: three Sonatas for Violin and Piano-forte; his magnificent oratorio of Abraham, composed in less than three months, in the year 1860, and performed, for the first time, under his own direction, at the Grand Norwich Festival (September, 1860), producing an impression that will never be effaced, and unanimously classed by the critics with the works of such men as Handel, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn; then (1864) his Mass for four voices, with organ accompaniment, with or without chorus, a work of elevated and touching beauty, which has not yet been published. He further wrote a Treatise on Harmony, in which he presented to the musical world his own method of instruction, a method founded upon the ripest experience. His strength now began, unfortunately to break; and a violent pain, to which he was subject, in the head, caused him frequently to express the wish that, after his death, there should be a surgical examination into the cause. He now returned to Germany, and, after staying five months at Starnberg, settled with his family at Cannstadt. A paralytic stroke deprived him almost totally of the use of his limbs. There was only one thing that could have sustained his spirits under this calamity, and that was the most loving and indefatigable manner in which he saw himself tended by his wife and two of his four daughters (the two others live in England). A few days previous to his death, his vital powers appeared to be restored in a great degree; but, on the 9th May, he had another paralytic stroke, which was the more immediate cause of his death, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon. The surgeons found that the cause of his disease was a tumor, which had existed probably for years, in the cerebellum. The two surgeons who performed the post-mortem examination were greatly interested by the "unusually great beauty of the brain, as well as by the remarkable depth and completeness of that portion, in which, according to Gall, the sense of music lies."—I will here beg permission to quote some remarks from the Wiener Musikzeitung, in an article on a concert given by the Deceased in the Theatre an der Wien. "I have already," says the writer of the article in question, "expressed myself to the effect that, acting in obedience to my most profound conviction, I concede the dignity of being a true artist only to him who proves himself in his artistic efforts a thoroughly decided character, who gives the reins to his individuality; who follows his own inward impulse, not caring for what may be said by the blind multitude; nay, who considers every concession to the public an unanswerable offence, never to be expiated. On the present occasion, I have mentioned Molique, with joyful enthusiasm, as one of these rare and eminent characters in art, and set him up as the "Polar Star" to very many individuals who pursue the broad road of mere flat virtuosity, entirely sacrificing the pound or drachm, as the case may be, of intellect which they have received from above. Molique disdains utterly to make concessions, at the cost of his poetic originality, to the unthinking musical masses. His Violin Concertos and his Fantasias are by no means such compositions as correspond with the empty notions advanced in recent times: notions which the representatives of abstract virtuosity, from extravagant complaisance for the public, adopt, and carry out in their works:—no, Molique gives us profoundly considered, organically framed Symphonies, proceeding, and developed, from a virgin source (the motive), with obligato—violin. He does full justice to every separate instrument in the orchestra, giving it its full artistic importance, and understands, as very few others understand, how to unite these isolated and separate elements into one beautiful whole." So says the Wiener Musikzeitung. But the whole world of music with which Molique came in contact must have thought the same of him. This is proved by the numerous marks of honor which were conferred on him, and which it is now my duty to mention. Molique possessed the diploma as Honorary Member of the National Musical Association of Germany (1839); of the Musical Association of Austria (1839); of the Frankfort Liederkrantz (1840); of the North German Musical Association, Hamburg (1842); of the Academy of St. Cecilia, Rome (1843); of the Hungarian Musical Association, Pesth (1845); of the Mozarteum, Salzburg (1846); of the Conservatory, Prague (1847); of the Netherlands Society for the Promotion of Musical Art, Rotterdam (1851); of the Philharmonic Society, Boulogne (1852); of the Presidentship of the New Philharmonic Society, London (1860); of the Royal Academy of Music, London. The Managing Committee of the Tiedgestiftung at Dresden, also, distinguished the deceased by transmitting to him, in the latter part of last summer, a splendid present. Just as it was a blessing for the musical world, and a brilliant point in musical history, a life so glorious, whether we look upon the deceased as a man or an artist, must be a guiding star for his esteemed family, and an intellectual support never to be forgotten, for their future, while every sincere disciple of genuine art will make a pilgrimage to his grave at Cannstadt.

London.

OPERA. The Saturday Review, of June 5th, gives a resumé, to that date, of the performances at Covent Garden theatre since the "coalition" went into effect between the two rival managers,—Messrs. Gye and Mapleson,—notwithstanding the fact that meanwhile the other theatre, Her Majesty's, is built up again and ready for use. We quote some passages:

On the opening night (March 30) we had Norma, played, except in one important instance, exclusively by artists of Mr. Mapleson's company. Mlle. Tietjens was Norma; Mlle. Sinico, Adalgisa; Signor Mongini, Pollio; and Signor Foli, Orovesco; while Signor Arditì presided in the orchestra.

Bellini's hackneyed work was followed by Verdi's Rigoletto. In the cast of this opera the disparity between the resources of the two managers was less apparent, though again the director of Her Majesty's Theatre had considerably the advantage. Mlle. Vanzini, the prima donna, at any rate, was a member of the Covent Garden troop last year; and though her Gilda, compared with other Gildas we have known (not to appeal to so high a standard as the late Mme. Bosio), was second rate at the best, it was by no means devoid of merit. The other characters were allotted to Mlle. Scalchi (Maddalena), Signor Mongini (Duke of Mantua), Signor Foli (Sparafucile), and Mr. Santley (Rigoletto)—all from the old house. That the music assigned to the Court Jester would be admirably sung by Mr. Santley was anticipated; but few had looked for the extraordinary advance of our English baritone in the histrionic department of his art. Mr. Santley's Rigoletto was the most striking feature of the performance, although the splendid voice of Signor Mongini, now, in spite of manifest errors of taste and want of balance, foremost of Italian tenors, was heard to distinguished advantage in many parts of the opera, and especially in "La donna è mobile." The conductor on this occasion was Signor Li Calci, Mr. Gye's former "repétiteur," under whose direction the accompaniments were given in such a manner as to make it difficult to believe that we were listening to the Covent Garden players. Thus the inexpediency of having two directors of one orchestra was early established. That the custom obtains at Berlin and elsewhere on the Continent is true; but it is bad, all the same, and has never within the memory of two generations been tolerated at the Grand Opera in Paris, where alone performances on a par with those to which we have been accustomed for so long a period at the Royal Italian Opera and Her Majesty's Theatre can be heard. With Fidelio, which came next, the case was very different. Signor Arditì again held the conductor's stick, and, from the overture (the great Leonora, No. 3) to the finale, the masterpiece of Beethoven, in so far as orchestra and chorus were concerned, was adequately presented. The characters on the stage, with a solitary exception, were allotted to Mr. Mapleson's singers—Mlle. Tietjens (Leonora), Mlle. Sinico (Marcellina), Mr. C. Lyall (Jacquino), Signor Foli (Rocco), and Signor Bulterini (Florestan)—Mr. Gye merely contributing Signor Ciampi, as the Minister, who does not appear till the last scene, when the dramatic interest has culminated. The single novelty was the Florestan of Signor Bulterini, one of the worst we remember, just as Mr. C. Lyall's Jacquino is the very best.

Signor Bulterini has a loud voice and sings loudly—which is all we have to say of him. With Signor Mongini in the theatre, it was lamentable to hear the soliloquy of Florestan in the dungeon scene, and the tenor part of the trio and duet, thus sacrificed. Signor Mongini, however, has, doubtless, no wish to engross the entire repertory. Immediately after Fidelio, we find him singing his best as the hero of an opera that has nothing in common with Fidelio—Manrico, in Il Trovatore, about which, beyond recording that the other characters were supported by Mlle. Tietjens, Mlle. Scalchi, Signor Foli, and Mr. Santley (all Mr. Mapleson's), we need say nothing. This motley lyric melodrama stands much in need of repose; and if it were laid aside for years there would be little to regret. To Verdi succeeded Donizetti—not at his liveliest, but at his dullest. When the facile Bergamese—whose comic operas (although closely modelled on Rossini's) are perfect—wrote Linda di Chamouni for Vienna, he tried hard to please the German taste, but only succeeded in proving that the sentimental drama was not his element.

Next, in due course, came the Illeguendos, with Mlle. Tietjens and Ilma di Murka, Signor Mongini and Mr. Santley, respectively as Valentine, the Queen, Raoul, and St. Bris. Of these, beyond the fact that the voice of Mlle. Tietjens betrayed symptoms that should forbid the too prodigal use of it in such exacting operas as those of Meyerbeer, we have nothing new to say.

About the performance immediately following we are able to speak in terms of almost unrestricted praise. The opera was Il Flauto Magico, the chief characters in which were represented by Mlle. Tietjens, Sinico, and Ilma di Murka (Pamina, Papagena, and the "Queen of Night"), Signors Bulterini and Foli (Tamino and Sarastro), Messrs. C. Lyall and Santley (Monostatos and Papageno). This, with one exception, Signor Bulterini vice Signor Bertini (by no means an improvement), was precisely the same cast as during the series of performances given by Mr. Mapleson at Covent Garden Theatre in the winter—a foreshadowing, as it were, of the coalition to come. So that Signor Arditì being at the conductor's desk, though the performance was in Mr. Gye's theatre, the idea of Mr. Gye's company could scarcely once have occurred to any one, except, perhaps, when Signors Marino and Fallar, as the "two armed men," were endeavoring to sing the canto fermo, in front of the "Orrida Monte," near the end of the last act. Up to this time certainly the "coalition" had been a strange one, seeing that the most essential requirements were exclusively furnished by one of the parties coalescing. The unanimous feeling, however, seemed to be that this representation of Il Flauto Magico was calculated to raise expectations for the future.

That which Beethoven pronounced the masterpiece of German lyric drama was followed by what, although composed by an Italian, is unquestionably the masterpiece of French lyric drama—Guillaume Tell. In the earlier days of the Royal Italian Opera the appearance of this great work was always an event. But of late it has been less cared for, and there have probably been as many unsatisfactory representations of Guillaume Tell as of any opera in the repertory. With Signor Li Calci at the head of the orchestra, in place of Mr. Costa, it is not surprising that the performance on the present occasion should for the greater part have been mediocre.

The redeeming point was the superb singing of Signor Mongini, who, with the exception of Signor Tambrlick, approaches nearer to Duprez than any other representative of Arnold we can call to mind. Signor Mongini was not well supported, Signor Graziani being by no means imposing as Guillaume Tell, and Signor Baggiolo, despite his fine voice, by no means effective as Walter. In Mlle. Sinico, on the other hand, there was a really competent Mathilde; and notwithstanding all shortcomings, music so original and picturesque as that of Rossini could not fail to make its impression.

The revival of Robert le Diable appears to have been not more encouraging. But now came the re-appearance of two stars of the first magnitude for these times; and here we copy from the Athenæum of June 19th:

THE OPERA.—Since Mme. Adelina Patti and Mlle. Nilsson came, the performances at Covent Garden have been made up exclusively of repetitions of the operas of which these two ladies are the chief, it might almost be said the sole attractions. "La Sonnambula," "Lucia," "Marta," and such like hackneyed productions, have made up the cheap bill of fare provided by the operatic firm. To this dull monotony some relief has been given by the revival of "La Gazza Ladra," a work which, for some unaccountable reason, had been laid aside for five years. It was brought out last season under Mr. Mapleson's energetic management at Drury Lane, but the dozens of Traviatas and Martas who have appeared and disappeared within the past few years have elbowed poor Ninetta from the stage of the rival house. And yet the full, rich spontaneous melody that sweeps through "La Gazza Ladra" should be welcome to many who are suffering from a surfeit of Verdi. Ninetta, too, is the part in which the talent of Mme. Patti is shown at its very best. She is one of the few living artists who can sing Rossini's music with the masterly facility which is essential to satisfactory expression. It is not enough to be able to jerk out certain runs, as nuts might be shaken out of a bag. The florid passages must be articulated with such ease as not to interfere with the broad delivery of the entire phrase of which they are the ornaments. How well Mme. Patti understands this, she proved by her faultless singing of the famous sortita "Di piacer," while the prayer that interrupts the funeral march was rendered with a dignity and purity of style in the highest degree remarkable. In the well known trio "Name benefico,"—the prototype of so many subsequent concerted pieces—the effect of the unexceptional singing of Mme. Patti and Mr. Santley was marred by Signor Boltero, who is unable to firmly sustain his hard, hollow voice for a single bar. Nor has he any of the irresistible humor which, in the case of Signor Ronconi's Podestà, used to reconcile us to all deficiencies of voice. Mr. Santley's Fernando Villabella is in every respect the finest that has been witnessed for many years. Rossini's music comes as naturally to this accomplished singer as that of any other master, old or new. Mr. Lyall and Signor Tagliafico sketched the characters of Isaaco and Fabrizio in so dexterous a fashion as completely to compensate for their poverty in vocal power; but none of the other singers were at all up to the Covent Garden mark. Mlle. Grossi, despite her rich contralto, makes nothing of the grateful character of Pippa, and Signor Corsi is a very inadequate tenor. It was impossible for the amateur to see Mme. Trebelli, the best Pippa in our recollection, in a private box, and Mlle. Grossi on the stage, without regretting that their positions were not reversed. The chorus-singing was very indifferent, and Signor Li Calci's conducting quite as unsatisfactory as ever.

Passing over the more hackneyed rôles of Nilsson, we come to the sensation of the season, her Ophelia in "Hamlet," by M. Ambrose Thomas, of which opera, in anticipation, the Athenæum discourses as follows:

It must always remain a question how far it is expedient to set great dramatic poems to music. There certainly can be no canon against the illustration of one art by another. Literature has since the earliest times been illustrated by painting and sculpture, and so far from its being looked upon as a profanation, it is to this universal custom that we are indebted for the chief artistic masterpieces of the world. Were not all the precious marbles of Scopas and Phidias prompted by Greek poets? and have not all the finest paintings of Christendom been inspired directly or indirectly by the book which, as Sir William Jones said, contains, apart from all consideration of its divine origin, more true poetry than any other? If the artist has often fallen far short of the reader's ideal he has frequently surpassed it, and has made the world by so much richer. It may be that the pictorial editions which of late years have been more popular than ever, have rarely added anything to the common stock of ideas, and that the designs have more often interfered with conceptions which, right or wrong, have risen higher than the limner's imagination. But illustrations of this class are as the baby-food on which weak mental stomachs may be strengthened and fitted for the reception of solid fare. Looked upon from this point of view the most ordinary cuts serve a certain purpose in stimulating the curiosity and interest of dull intellects. But music is of a more jealous nature, and when it is married to immortal verse it insists on playing the tyrant. The words, even when they carry with them a music of their own, must give way to the imperious laws which "bind the chains of harmony." Hence the disinclination of great poets to write for music, and hence the hesitation of great composers in setting lines which already awaken a melody in the general ear. Beethoven, although in the overture to Collin's "Coriolanus" he was animated with the true Shakespearean spirit, would not have ventured to make an opera of the original Shakespearean play. In like manner, Mendelssohn broke an engagement rather than attempt to fix the "sounds and sweet airs that give delight and hurt not" in Prospero's magic island. In his wondrous music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," he has given free rein to his fancy so long as it could run side by side with that of Shakespeare; but, save in two lyrics, the least successful portion of his work, he has avoided the dangerous task of setting the original text. It is natural enough that plots for operas should be sought in dramas. The expedient is popular with librettists, for it saves them any expenditure of inventive power, and with musicians because the public, they say, are in a better position to appreciate the music when they know what it is intended to depict. In some cases the purely ideal quality of music has a refining influence upon the play. Thus Verdi's part in "La Traviata" acts as a kind of moral chloride of limo, deodorizing to some extent the nasty atmosphere breathed by the "Dame aux Camélias." But Shakespeare is not so easily improved: witness "Macbeth," travestied by the man who refined the masterpiece of Dumas the younger: witness "Othello," which, although written by a great genius and containing much fine music, is as nothing in comparison with the original tragedy. But of all unsuitable subjects "Hamlet" is manifestly the most unsuited for musical treatment. It was attempted by Francesco Gnsparini, in the beginning of the last century, but of his "Amleto" nothing remains but the name. Beethoven, with all his daring and all his colossal power, would have shrunk, we venture to think, before the task of turning "Hamlet" into an opera. "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread," is a line that comes readily to the pen. But it is not at all applicable to the present case. M. Ambroise Thomas cannot be fairly classed among the happy beings alluded to. So far from this being the case, he is an earnest, intelligent, and highly accomplished artist, who has seriously studied his grand subject, and has strained every nerve in the attempt to bring his task to a successful issue. In a theatrical sense he has achieved a triumph; as a reproduction in music of the tragedy, "Hamlet" is a failure.

It is idle to attempt to ignore the play while listening to M. Thomas's music. The characters are the same, the principal scenes follow in the same order, and the very words are paraphrased. There is no escape for Shakespeare; none, therefore, from inevitable comparison. We fear it is the example of M. Gounod which led his compatriot into this dangerous venture. Previously to the success of "Faust," still more full of philosophy as a play than "Hamlet," M. Thomas was known only as a writer of comic operas. "Le Caid" was then the best specimen of his cultivated powers. Some two years ago, however, he seems to have bethought him that "Mignon" would be as good a subject as "Marguerite," and so "Wilhelm Meister" was boldly deranged for the Opera Comique, where the heroine had the advantage of a very sympathetic voice and the work something more than a succès d'estime. M. Thomas had already treated Shakespeare after a fashion in his "Songe d'une Nuit d'Été," the story of which could only have entered a Frenchman's brain after a rapid glance through the life and works of the poet, followed by an indigestible supper. For here we find Queen Elizabeth, still a young and beautiful woman, paying a visit to the Boar's Head, in Eastcheap, in quest of Shakespeare, who has drunk himself into a state of half unconsciousness in the company of Sir John Falstaff and other boon companions. The Queen deploras the poet's inebriated condition, but manages to make an assignation with him in Windsor Park, where the pair actually meet by night and exchange ardent vows. The composer who had thus made acquaintance with Shakespeare, and had set "Mignon" to music, doubtless thought himself amply justified in taking up "Hamlet." MM. Carré and Barbier, the accommodating writers who had adapted "Faust" and "Romeo" for M. Gounod, did not hesitate to lay hands on the Prince of Denmark, taking care, however, to make Ophelia the principal character. It was hoped, not without warranty, that the Scandinavian origin of the lady would stimulate interest in Mlle. Nilsson if her début at the Grand Opera were made in the part of the heroine. Her performance seized the fancy of the spectators, and secured the success of the opera. We wrote last autumn, from experience, of the furor the clever lady caused in Paris, and it seems probable that here also Ophelia will for a time give a fictitious attractiveness to "Hamlet."

We have not at hand the Athenæum's comments after the performance of "Hamlet," but here is what we find in the Examiner:

Despite some incidental music of a pretty and taking kind, and despite the gracious charm of Mlle. Nilsson's assumption of the character of Ophelia, there can be no doubt that the new opera was regarded by the majority of the audience as a decided failure. The construction of the opera, the evolution of certain scenes, and the generally descriptive aim of the music exhibit a level of mediocre cleverness which is never broken by one of those fine impulsive passages which awaken our wonder and admiration, and betray the master hand of genius. "Hamlet"—that is, the rough outline of the play—was an excellent subject for operatic representation. The story is highly dramatic,—it abounds with opportunities for the display of all various emotions. Conscious of these opportunities, the wearied listener sits in patience, and hopes to see them taken advantage of; while he only sees them slip by, one by one, and leave no mark behind. Perhaps we ought to except the great scene of the opera, in which Ophelia, bereft of her senses, wanders down to the side of the river, sings her mad snatches of pathetic song, and is then seen to float away upon the stream, still singing. M. Thomas has spent plenty of time over this act; and yet it is apparent to a dispassionate spectator that its effect is not due to M. Thomas, but to Christine Nilsson. The Ophelia of Mlle. Nilsson is one of the most genuine efforts of poetic idealization which we remember to have seen upon the lyric stage. It is entirely her own Ophelia; a creation, in short, which almost oppresses one with its wealth of tender sentiment. It differs wholly from the Ophelias of the dramatic stage. This new Ophelia is a bright, vivacious creature, full of sudden fancies, oftentimes unconscious of her sorrows and quick to regard the objects around her with a pleased, childlike curiosity; and then, while she sings her gay carol as blithely and merrily as a bird, there comes a sudden fire into her eyes and a pathos into her face, and you see the awful spectacle of a noble woman struck down by madness and conscious of the horror of her misery. Such is the compelling power of Christine Nilsson's genius that you forget the thin and artificial music out of which she evolves this grand conception.

For the rest, the opera is not without its points. Hamlet is a baritone part, furnished with a good drinking song. Mr. Santley, dressed in a light wig and the orthodox black cloak, gives the part the full advantage of his excellent voice and careful and artistic execution; and the wine-song, especially, has a certain force and swing about it which the audience, glad to get something to admire, appreciate warmly. The ghost scene seems to us to be merely absurd. For a very corporeal ghost, dressed in a suit of mail which does not conceal the habitual features of Signor Ciampi, to stand with an outstretched baton and chant an interminable quantity of indistinguishable Italian in a sonorous monotone, may appear very impressive to a French audience which is unfamiliar with Shakespeare's play. Upon us, we confess, the effect produced was a sense of sincere pity for the unfortunate basso who had to prolong his relentless moan with scarcely a note of variation. The play scene is admirably arranged; but the action of the players is unnecessarily extravagant. At the close of this scene occurs the only piece of concerted music in the opera which possesses any effective strength and purpose. Preceding the mad scene is a remarkably long ballet, the music for which is incomprehensibly feeble and commonplace, besides showing no connection whatever with the opera. Indeed, after these young ladies, who are neither ghosts nor fairies, nor anything but unmistakable ballet girls, have danced for a considerable time to music which is fitted for the ballet of a country theatre, it offends one's sense of poetic propriety to see the mad Ophelia come down to the river's edge and introduce some by-play with them into the action of the piece. The ballet girls in "Robert le Diable" have something to do in the opera. They are spirits of unchaste nuns, who strive to entice that gloomy wanderer; and they dance alluring dances to the most beautiful and mystic music. But why should Ophelia, if her troubled intellect people the spaces around her with strange beings, see such doubtful fairies as these, with a young lady in short muslin skirts running in and out among them? By and by, however, they disappear, and she proceeds to name her flowers, singing all the while those quaint snatches of song, to which her intensely sympathetic voice gives the most perfect utterance. Then she lays herself down among the reeds, to conceal herself from her lover, whom she imagines to be coming to her; and finally we see her floating down the stream with flowers upon her forehead, and on her breast, and there is an end of a most touching scene.

Finally "Hamlet" seems to us to be an opera excellently designed for fashionable people, who do not care much for music per se. A voluble after dinner party may have plenty of opportunities to talk in the shelter of their box, and lose nothing; while a few brief moments of attention now and again will secure them all the best passages. But what "Hamlet" would have been without the sympathetic voice, the poetic face, and fine interpretation of Christine Nilsson, we need not stay to consider here.

CONCERTS. The last of Mme. Arabella Goddard's recitals was the best of three, good as were the predecessors. The most interesting piece was a fantasia by Friedemann Bach, eldest of Johann Sebastian's many sons. The piece, played from a MS. copy, had probably never before been performed in public, and it is certainly quite unknown. Each movement has its own distinctive charm; not only is there abundant strength and originality in the work, but it is also far more modern in style than the productions of Friedemann Bach's contemporaries. The number of cognoscenti present testified to the interest excited by any unfamiliar piano music. Mme. Goddard was playing her very best. Thalberg's study in E flat was a marvel of delicate and rapid staccato playing, and the four fugues chosen were all articulated with faultless skill. We would fain encourage the industrious and conscientious lady to persevere in her ungrateful task of digging out treasures from the accumulated rubbish of years. Among the more important of the benefit concerts of the last week may be mentioned those given by Signor Arditi, Mr. Ganz and Mr. Benedict. The last named is by far the longest and most imposing of the season. The book of words is a well-printed volume of thirty-six pages, and almost all the artistes now in London appeared in the course of the long morning. There were fewer novelties than usual, but a gracefully-written quartet "I Cantastorie," by Signor Pinski, and a very clever onomatopoeic trio, "Humming, buzzing," by Signor Randegger, deserve to be mentioned.

The subscription to the Oratorio Concerts in London closed with a generally fine performance of "St. Paul." Mr. Barnby's choir has made progress during the season; and the noble choruses in Mendelssohn's first oratorio were, on the whole, excellently rendered. Mme. Lemmens and Mr. Sims Reeves were the most prominent vocalists, the latter singing his best in Stephen's grand defence, and in the superb air, "Be thou faithful unto death." On Tuesday there is to be an extra performance of "Jephtha."—Nine concerts are announced for next season; and Bach's Passion music according to St. Matthew, and Beethoven's Mass in D, are among the ambitious and difficult works promised by the enterprising conductor.

VIENNA.—The new Opera House was opened on the 25th of May, by a ceremonial peculiarly German in character. A prologue written by Herr Dingelstedt, the director of the theatre, exhibited the genius of Vindobona in front of a representation of the Kärnthner-Thor, which gave its historic name to the old theatre. Vindobona descends on the improvements recently effected in the city, and in illustration of her words the scene changes to a view of the entrance hall to the new house. She calls on the various races subject to Austria to join in the national anthem; on which Poles, Hungarians, Styrians and Tyrolese, appear in their divers costumes, and join in the "Emperor's Hymn." The prologue contained a tribute to the memory of the two architects of the theatre, both of whom died before the completion of their work. The new house is said to be very commodious, both before and behind the foot lights, and presents, in spite of a strange mixture of styles, an imposing appearance from the outside. The decorations are in very good taste, and the ventilation well cared for. The opera of the opening night, Mozart's "Don Juan," was sumptuously put upon the stage, but so indifferently performed that long before the curtain fell the house was half empty. It is not only in Vienna that handsome dresses are intended to compensate for bad singing.

—NIELS GADE, of whom Mendelssohn thought so highly and from whom he expected so much, has just brought out, at Copenhagen, a work for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, entitled "Kulanus," the subject of which is taken from the history of the conquests of Alexander in India.

—Herr Joachim has become a member of the senate of the Berlin Academy, and he has also been appointed director of the school of instrumental music in course of formation in the Prussian capital.

—It has been decided that the musical festival to be held at Bonn next year, in celebration of the centenary of Beethoven's birth, shall take place in the Court of the University. It is to be converted for the occasion into a spacious concert-hall, capable of seating three thousand persons. It is hoped that the festival may rival that which celebrated the inauguration of the statue of Beethoven in 1845. In the quarter of a century that will have elapsed since then almost all the principal actors who took part in that solemnity have passed away, and all have retired from active life.

—The notion of celebrating the opening of a new railway station by a musical festival of three days' duration seems incongruous enough to English ideas.

Yet, as we mentioned some weeks ago, the inauguration of the "Gare du Midi," in Brussels, was to have been thus solemnized on the 21st of July. The festival is, however, adjourned until the September fêles, which every year commemorate the independence of Belgium. On the first day Handel's "Messiah" is to be performed; the third day is to be given up to soloists, vocal and instrumental, all to be of national origin; while the second is to be devoted to compositions by Belgians. These comprise an Overture by M. Edouard Lassen, a Symphony by M. Fétis, a chorus by M. Soubre, a Te Deum by M. Benoit, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—included under the pretext that Beethoven was of Flemish origin. Is there not something ridiculous in this limitation of art to certain accidental boundaries? And does it not recall the old story of the woman who refused to listen to the sermons of the clergyman of another parish?

—The Revue et Gazette Musicale asserts that Herr Ferdinand Hiller has been invited to write some work expressly for the next Birmingham Festival. Herr Hiller, it is further stated, has consented to remain in Cologne.

—The Opera Comique is the only theatre in Paris in which there is any activity just now. A Mlle. Fogliari, a pupil of M. Duprez, lately made a promising début as Mimi in "Vert-Vert," and the first representation of "La Fontaine de Berny," by M. Nihelle, was announced for June 2d. The libretto by MM. D'Ennery and Cormon of an opera to be written by the veteran M. Auber has been read. "Reve d'Amour" is the fitting title to be set by a composer who is ninety years of age. Let us hope it may be as fresh and fascinating as "Le Premier Jour de Bonheur." MM. de St. Georges and Sandeau have agreed to supply a three-act opera, founded on the novel of the latter author, "Vallance." M. Gounod has withdrawn his "Romeo et Juliette" from the repertoire of the Theatre Lyrique in order to transfer it to the Opera Comique. "La Juive," "Faust," and "L'Africain" comprise the bill of fare presented at the Grand Opera. Mlle. Sternberg, who has taken part in "Rienzi," has made more impression in "Violetta," as "La Traviata" is called in Paris. M. Offenbach's new opera, "La Princesse de Trébisonde," which is to be played for the first time at Baden, is now in rehearsal at the Paris Bouffes Parisiennes, where the season has come to an end. "Les Rendez-vous Bourgeois" has been revived at the Athénée, the musical reputation of which theatre is certainly on the increase. The Café de l'Horloge in the Champs Elysees, has been converted into an open air summer theatre capable of holding three thousand spectators. Operettas and elaborately got-up ballets are to form the staple attractions.

ALBERT GRISAR.—Mr. Henry F. Chorley writes (June 21) to the Athenæum:

This composer, who as a writer of comic operas for twenty years past kept a certain hold on the theatres of Paris, and who the other day died suddenly, aged sixty-one, merits a word in the necrology of musicians belonging to our year.

He was born at Antwerp in the year 1808. The idea of his parents was to make of him a man of business; and with this purpose he was sent to Liverpool, and placed in a merchant's office somewhere about the year 1830. There I came to know him, and to see completely that nothing in the shape of merchandise would satisfy the spirit of a man who craved—and would have—another life than the life of ledgers and duplicate letters. After a short period of enforced and unwilling servitude, having expressed throughout the time tendencies rather than talents for music, he somehow broke away and got home.

The next thing that was to be heard of Grisar was that he had planted his foot on the musical ladder, by his gaining acceptance, in the year 1836, at the Opera Comique of Paris (no easy matter!) for an operetta, "L'An Mil." He was thenceforward clearly looked to as a man of promise. His first operetta was followed up by other works:—"Lady Melvil," "Les Porcherons" (perhaps his best production), "L'Eau Merveilleuse," "Le Carillonneur de Bruges," "Giles ravisseur," "Bon Soir, Monsieur Pantalon," "Le Chien du Jardinier," "La Chatte Merveilleuse," and it may be an opera or two more, which have tumbled into chaos.

The music of all these operas (most of which I have heard) is of the sort which leaves not the slightest trace on the memory. I cannot recall from among the entire catalogue a melody, a touch of instrumental novelty, an indication of character or local color; yet M. Grisar had clearly a place in Paris, though it may be predicated that henceforward it is a place "which knoweth him no more."

The Past Two Musical Years in Boston.

(Concluded).

III. THE ORGAN CONCERTS.

The great Walcker Organ in the Music Hall naturally gave a stimulus to organ building and to organ music hereabouts,—though of organ music in the true sense the proportion has been too small compared with questionable organ imitations and transcriptions and show music generally, from Overtures to namby-pamby ditties in which the noble instrument descends to the rôle of a street organ. Yet there has been a great deal more of the best kind than there was any opportunity to hear before. The bi-weekly organ hours, as we may call them, from 12 to 1 P.M. on Wednesdays and Saturdays, have been kept up, as a general rule, throughout the year. We have been unable to recover the programmes of the whole period now under review; indeed we have before us only about 40 of the programmes for the past year from July to July. They are fair samples of the average work done at the Great Organ for the two years past. Of these forty programmes many, however, were repeated several times. Let us analyze them as to matter and performers.

Mr. B. J. LANG has played 9 times. Of Bach: Prelude and Fugue in C, twice; Pastorale in F; Fantasia in G, three times; Concerto in G, twice.—Mendelssohn: Sonatas No. 1, 3 and 4 (the last six times); to which add transcriptions of the Sinfonia and the "Hymn of Praise," a Chorus from "Elijah," and the Overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream."—Schumann: Fugue on the letters "B A C H."—Rink: Concerto in E, twice; Variations on "God save the Queen."—Mozart: Gloria in C.—Haydn: Chorus in Bb.—Beethoven: Chor. from "Mt. of Olives" (2); Overture to "Egmont."—Kullak: Pastorale in F, arr. by Best (2).—Also 10 improvisations.

Mr. EUGENE THAYER, seven times. Bach: Fugue in G minor; Choral Vorspiel: "Liebster Jesu" (3); do. "Schmücke dich" (2); do. "Ich ruf an Dir" (2); do. "Wir glauben all."—Handel: 5th Concerto, in F.—Thiele: Chromatic Fantasia (2); Concert Variations in Ab, (3).—Haydn: Andante from Symphony in C.—Beethoven: Andante from 5th Symphony; Larghetto from 2nd do.—Rossini: Prayer and March from "Moses in Egypt."—Meyerbeer: Transcription.—Thayer: Var. on Russian Hymn (3); do. on Old Hundred (2); do. on "God save the Queen"; Reveries (5); "Idyl of the Rose" (2); Improvisations (9).

Mr. JOHN K. PAINE. We find a single programme only, containing: by Thiele: Fantasia in Ab; Haydn: Andante from Symph. in Bb; Mendelssohn: Sonata in D minor; Paine: Concert piece on the Portuguese Hymn, Fantasia on "Ein feste Burg," and Improvisation.

Mrs. FROLOCK, five times. Bach: Fugue in Eb; Prelude and Fugue in G.—Mendelssohn: 2nd Sonata (3); Prelude in G; Song without Words.—Handel: Chorus: "Hallelujah;" do. "See, the conquering hero;" Pastoral Symph. from "Messiah."—Mozart: Transcription from a Quartet; Fantasia in F minor; Andante.—Haydn: Largo from a Symphony; Transc. from "Creation."—Beethoven: Pastorale from "Prometheus;" Transc. from a Symphony; Turkish March (2).—Rink: Flute Concerto.—Munkel: Adagio.—Meyerbeer: "Marche du Sacre."—Rossini: Pastorale from "Tell" Overture.—Auber: Ov. to "Cheval de Bronze."—Donizetti: Ov. to "Anna Bolena."

Mr. J. H. WILCOX, nine times. Batiste: Offertoires (3); Communion.—Wely: Offertoires (2);

Elevation (2).—Nava: Dixit Dominus.—Corini: from Vespers (2)... Generali: Gloria (3).—Cerruti: Dixit Dominus, &c.—Ant. Diana: Sonata.—Morandi: Sonata.—Petrali: Andante.—Hummel: Gloria.—Haydn: Introd. &c. from the Passion (5); Kyrie from Imperial Mass; Dona nobis.—Handel: Hallelujah (2); Chor. "And the glory;" Pastoral Symph.—Mozart: Andante in F.—Spohr: Andante.—Mehul: Overture to "Le jeune Henri" (3).—Herrald: Ov. to "Zampa."—Auber: Ov. to "Le Barcarole" (3); do. to "Lestocque;" do. to "Cheval de Bronze."—Meyerbeer: "Marche du Sacre;" Improvisations (15).

Mr. G. E. WHITING, five times. Bach: Toccata in F; Fugue in Eb; do. F minor.—Mendelssohn: 2nd Sonata, in C; Overture in C; March from op. 22; War March from Athalia.—Haydn: Slow movement (2).—Beethoven: Larghetto from Symph. in D.—Handel: Ov. to Occasional Oratorio; Chor. "Fixed in His everlasting seat;" Dead March in Saul.—Spohr: Andante with Variations; Chorus, transcribed by Best.—Weber: Jubilee Overture.—Rossini: Inflammatus.—A. Adam: Christmas Song.—Wely: Offertoire in Eb.—Lemmens: Fanfare (2); March.—Donizetti: Fant. on themes by.—Meyerbeer: Schiller March.—Verander: Var. on Russian Hymn (2).—Nicolai: Overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor."—Whiting: Pastorale in F (2); Offertoire in C; Postludium in C (2); Romance; Fantasia on "Faust."

Mr. JAMES PIERCE, Mus. Bac. Oxon., of Philadelphia, has played once. Bach: Fantasia and Fugue in G minor; Mendelssohn: Sonata, No. 1, and Aria "The Garland;" Mozart: from "Idomeneo;" Beethoven: "In questa tomba oscura;" Handel: Coronation Anthem.

Mr. F. H. TORRINGTON, of Montreal, once. Handel: three choruses from "Israel in Egypt," and "Dead March;" Mendelssohn: 3d Sonata; Costa: March; Beethoven: Hallelujah in "Mt. of Olives;" Wely: Offertoire in Eb; Weber: Andante from Pi-ano Duets; Smart: March.

The Great Organ has also entered largely into the periodical pupil Concerts of the two Conservatories. In four programmes of the BOSTON CONSERVATORY, we note: Bach: Fugue in G minor (2); Fugue in Bb; Preludes in C and G.—Mendelssohn: Sonata in A; Pastorale in G.—Hesse: Variations, op. 47.—Handel: 5th Concerto (two movements).—Thiele: Chromatic Fantasia.—Batiste: Offertoires (3).—Wely: Largo and Cantabile.—Sponholtz: Var. on Austrian Hymn.

In two concerts of the NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY: Handel: from the Occasional Oratorio; Haydn: Slow movement; Wely: Offertoire in C; Whiting: Postludium.

Besides so much to be credited to the account of Boston Music Hall, there have of course been many Organ Concerts given in various churches in our city, upon excellent organs of home manufacture. Many of these we have no means of enumerating. The most important were a series of six concerts given by Mr. THAYER last Spring in Hollis Street Church. These, the admission being free, were well attended, and the organist, being free himself and wishing to furnish opportunity to those who really cared for organ music, could be more choice in his programmes than has been found practicable with the Great Organ, where lion-hunters go more for the instrument as such, than for the music. In these six concerts Mr. Thayer performed: of Bach: the Toccata in F; Toccata and Fugue in D minor; Prelude and Fugue in C minor; Fantasia and Fugue in G minor; Fugue in G minor, No. 2; Prel. and Fugue in B minor; do. in A minor; Trio Sonata in Eb; and the following Choral Variations (Vorspiele): "Ich ruf zu Dir" (2), "Gottes Sohn ist kommen" (2), "Schmücke dich," "An Wasserflüssen Babylons," "Liebster Jesu" (2), "Wir glauben all," "Heut triumph, and "Nun freut euch."—Mendelssohn: Adagio and Allegro from 2nd Sonata; Andante and Allegro from 5th do.; Andante from 6th do.—Thiele: Variations in A♭ (2); Chromatic Fantasia (2).—Schumann: Adagio, No. 6, of Orgel Studien; Canon and Pastorale from do.—Hesse: Variations in A, op. 47 (2); Var. in A♭, op. 34.—Handel: Finale from 3d Concerto; Concerto in F, No. 5.

We may also mention a Concert given by Mr. LANG, last month, in the South Congregational Church, where he is musical director, which was crowded with invited listeners. On that occasion the principal organ selections were: Mendelssohn's 3d Sonata, and Bach's Toccata in F, the latter finely played by a pupil of Mr. Lang's, Mr. Sumner of Worcester.

The following analysis will show about what proportion the amount of real organ music, of the noble kind, has borne to that of things not worthy of the name. We know not how it happens that our chief representative of Bach among the organists, Mr. J. K. Paine, who in the preceding years had given us so many and fine opportunities to hear nearly all of his most famous organ works, has during the past year hardly taken his turn at all in the Great Organ concerts. The mantle seems to have fallen in some sense upon Mr. Thayer, though not so much at the Music Hall as in his invitation concerts at the church where he is organist. Still, Bach and Mendelssohn, &c., count up well in the comparison with minor gods and false gods.

Running over the programmes (not quite fifty) of the year once more, we find that the name of Bach appears 47 times, represented by 25 different works; Handel 4 times, by two of his Concertos; Mendelssohn 21 times, by his six Sonatas and one Prelude; Schumann 4 times, in 4 pieces; Rink and Hesse, 4 times each, each in 2 pieces; Thiele 3 times, in 3 pieces.

Next in dignity and true organ character, perhaps, may be reckoned organ transcriptions from the great Oratorios, Masses, &c. It appears that Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Hummel, Spohr and Mendelssohn have been represented 30 times in 18 extracts from such compositions. To which add the selections made by Mr. Willcox from Italian writers current in the Roman churches.

Of the more brilliant French school we find Basset figuré 7 times and Wely 8 times: a much smaller proportion than in the preceding years.

Elaborate Concert Variations upon Chorals, National hymns, &c., sometimes serious and contrapuntal, sometimes fantastical and foolish,—some by the organists themselves, and some by German masters, appear, to the number of six or eight subjects, in a dozen programmes.

Then come Organ transcriptions from Orchestral compositions, string Quartets, &c. 1). Under the head of movements (mostly slow) from Symphonies and Quartets by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Spohr, we find 10 such performances of 9 different pieces.—2). Of transcribed Overtures (mostly light ones and wholly foreign to the genius of the Organ) we find just a dozen, which collectively have figured 17 times.

So that on the whole, though there has been a great deal of perversion of the noble instrument to very trivial uses, and though doubtless the Organ has been played on many "popular" occasions of which our memoranda have no note, the sound, religious, real Organ music seems to have maintained its ascendancy, and Bach and Mendelssohn make the best show of all.

THE JUBILATION AFTER JUBILEE seems to have pretty much subsided, and it is best to let it rest. We had marked several more articles, containing criticisms from various points of view, impressions upon various minds, intending to transfer them to these columns, but we are convinced that it is getting rather late to still be talking of a nine days wonder in an age so full of wonders. The success of the Jubilee was unique; let it remain unique, exceptional. It were a foolish ambition that would attempt to reproduce it. To regard it as the initiation of a new order of things in music, to seek henceforth to bring such vast exceptional occasions into the regular order of the seasons with "the sweet return," &c., were a rash way to read the lesson of this singular experience. The truth is, the Peace Jubilee was entirely an anomalous occasion, ambiguous in its character and motive: not strictly musical, not strictly national and patriotic. Its success was as an occasion of an unexampled kind. The fact that it had been engineered and managed so as to interest so many in it, that such vast amount of energy had got employed in it,—that of itself made it inspiring. As for Music, the wonder was it went so well; but no really musical person undertakes to compare it as a musical experience, either for beauty or for grandeur, or for quickening appeal to heart and soul, with many a Festival or Concert on a smaller scale. Music, as such, is not helped by such vast multiplication of means and numbers. We know this now if we did not before. Exceptions, beautiful, peculiar effects noticed now and then, only prove the rule. The success of the Festival was something sui generis; it was the realization of a remarkable and memorable event, in which music played a part, but hardly the chief part. Indeed so much of the music went unheard, that it might almost be left out of the account in trying to define the marvellous experience. Probably it will be some time before any one will arrive at a clear definition of the gigantic, brilliant, singular phenomenon.

We say this, because our attempt to do full justice to the Festival has been by many quite misconstrued; our generous allowance for all the good we could sincerely find in it, musically, and for the impulse which it gives to music as a popular pursuit and interest, has been held up in taunt and triumph as a confession of error, a reluctant conversion to the policy of musical performances upon a "monster" scale of numbers. We beg to say, that we are not at all converted to that notion; that the Jubilee has not at all reconciled us to the idea that musical effects, musical edification or enjoyment, may be enhanced by the assembling of a whole Nation of performers and listeners under one roof. (For, to carry out the ambitious aim consistently, it will not do to stop at 50,000; millions must come in, must meet and sing, and hear and shout, all in one place, as one). A "National" musical Jubilee, to our mind, would be one that should extend throughout the Nation, and have its seat, here, there, everywhere, in all the towns and cities, in all the halls and temples. It is a small representation of thirty millions of people that can be concentrated in one "Coliseum," were it thrice as big as Mr. Gilmore's. Then again, musically, we are still convinced (and so we believe is every sane musical person), that twenty festivals in twenty places, each with 500 performers, would be a finer thing and give twenty times more pleasure than the congregation of 50,000 in one spot trying to listen to 11,000.

Cheerfully admitting, then, that the Festival socially was an experience worth living for; that musically, even, the result was better than the plan intrinsically; and that it did much incidental good (as all great movements do in some way) by awakening enthusiasm among singers, calling new choral societies into being, and filling thousands of people with a new respect for music,—still we must maintain, the real lesson of it is: Be not ambitious to achieve the biggest thing in music: be content with doing well that which is more easily practicable; quality before quantity, and of the latter only so much as is sufficient for the former, a limit felt for and discovered long ago. We read of threatened rival imitations, of plans in other cities to get up Jubilees on a still bigger scale, eclipsing Boston. But we presume these do not hail from serious sources. We should deprecate the fashion. Nor do we think it probable, with all the triumph, that the same thing will be tried again in the same way. Rather will it prompt to more moderate and rational experiments, to bond fide Musical Festivals, in which whole works, as Oratorios, can be performed, and no power wasted in attempts to magnify beyond the laws of nature, physical and human. The Philharmonic Society in New York, we hear, propose to have a festival. That is the right sort of body for a musical festival to proceed from; and the object which it is to serve is also musical, within the sphere of Art, namely, to build a music hall. We trust they will forego, as unworthy of a society of artists, all childish ambition to eclipse Mr. Gilmore's Jubilee; that they will enter into competition, if at all, with our last Handel and Haydn Festival, or even with the festivals of Birmingham and Düsseldorf and Frankfurt; artistic emulation, rather than sensational. We quite concur with our contemporary the N. Y. Weekly Review, in the hope that what they do will be "in strict accordance with the dictates of true musical art and modern civilization, which, in musical matters, are, not to expand, but to concentrate. Let us have an orchestra of about 200 picked men; a chorus of 750 members; only the best music, and plenty of rehearsals. This will do far more for the advancement of musical culture than large masses, insufficient rehearsals, and poor music."

We have scarcely room for a few post Jubilee notes, to bring the history of the Coliseum down. On the Sunday evening after the five days, it was the scene of an extra "Sacred" Concert, made up of the more successful choruses, solos, overtures, &c., of the festival proper. It is generally pronounced a success. A benefit concert for Mr. Gilmore followed inevitably and of right. Two-thirds of all the choral and orchestral forces rallied at the signal, full Jubilee prices were paid, some 12,000 auditors were present, and the thing passed off "gloriously," netting, they say, from twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars to the projector, as the reward for his great faith and enterprise. Verily, he, if any one, deserved it. Nor will the musical leaders, Mr. Zerrahn, Mr. Eichberg, Mr. Tourjée, fail to receive a fitting testimonial. The financial result of the Festival is not yet made public, if it be ascertained; the general impression is that the receipts will fairly cover the expenses, with possibility of a small surplus. For one week, every evening, the great building has been used for Promenade Concerts, with an orchestra of 100, led by Mr. Gilmore. On the Fourth of July the City Fathers put it to good use as the scene of the chief gathering and jubilation of the children. At present it stands silent, how long to remain we know not, but probably not long. Meanwhile the shop windows and pictorial papers are full of inside and of outside views of it, so that its aspect will not be forgotten. Of the outside pictorial reproductions the most vivid and desirable to keep is the colored lithograph published by the N. E. Lithographic Company (109 Summer St.) from the plans of the Architect and Decorator.

"THE HEROES OF THE GERMAN MUSIC" is the title of an interesting large musical picture, seen for some time in photograph in the windows of our music stores. Our thanks are due to Messrs. Koppitz, Prüfer & Co., West St., for a beautiful line engraving of the same, in which the eighty and more portraits are far more clear and spirited than in the photograph. The grouping and design are much in the manner of Kaulbach, done, we think, by one of his pupils. It shows as it were the Pantheon of German music. Lifted in the middle ground, by way of apotheosis, serenely sit or stand the mighty masters to whom all must look up. Bach is playing at the organ, while his son Emanuel looks over. Handel in big wig, with folded arms, stands erect behind; Beethoven, in deep thought, sits in front on one side; on the other, Mozart stands holding an open score to Father Haydn seated, while, behind them, Gluck, father of German Opera, leans against the organ. Schubert, Schumann and Mendelssohn form a group seated on the front edge of the platform under Beethoven and Handel. —These are the central figures; but hardly the most prominent, for below, standing in the foreground, brought into bold relief, are "the Apostles of the Newness," Abbé Liszt and Wagner, and Bülow, and the singers who have done most for Wagner (even died for him) as Johanna Wagner, Niemann, Schnorr von Carolsfeldt. Plainly the picture is drawn somewhat in the interest of the New School, the "Zukunft." The old fogies, so to say, the learned contrapuntists, &c., of the "perruque period," Marpurg, Albrechtsberger, Vogler, even Hauptmann, are put away up in a gallery in the background. Grouped on the right hand are famous singers and instrumental virtuosos; on the left, classical composers of the second or third grade, with the lyric masters, headed by Weber, coming to the foreground. Heavy Spohr is there, and calculating Meyerbeer; and prominent before them the tall figure and Mephistophelean leer of Offenbach. The portraits are all individual and clearly recognizable (there is a key to aid in the case of those less familiar), while the grouping is managed with great skill, easy, picturesque and striking.

THE GERMAN AMERICANS have been holding one of their great musical Festivals this week in Baltimore; and we are glad to see that the managers have taken measures to make it truly a musical feast, and not a mere beer-drinking excursion, a mass meeting in honor of Gambrinus. The following letter in the Philadelphia Bulletin describes the principal features of the plan:

BALTIMORE, July 5th.—The Northeastern Sängerband, of America, will celebrate their grand bi-annual musical festival (being the Eleventh National Singing Festival), in this city, on the 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th and 16th of July. The Northeastern Sängerbund (Singing Union) comprises societies from the Eastern, Middle and Southern States, numbering about 160 societies; 120 in New York and vicinity; 30 in Philadelphia and vicinity; 10 in Baltimore and vicinity; embracing about 6,000 active and about 20,000 passive members. A large majority of these societies will be present.

The Executive Committee here have been laboring for the last fifteen months to make this festival the superior of all preceding ones, and the different societies have been practicing for the last eight months. Mr. Lenschow, the festival leader, about four weeks since visited New York and Philadelphia, and there had rehearsals with the united singers of those cities.

In addition to the societies mentioned, a number of eminent composers from Europe, and representatives of European societies will be present.

The visiting societies enjoy the hospitality of the city, being required to comply with the rules of attending promptly the rehearsals, and provided they have effectually studied the festival choruses, as evidence of which the respective leaders must send a faithful report to the Festival Committee.

Invitations were given for prize compositions to the composers of the Old and New World, to be performed at this festival. Sixty-eight composers responded. The first prize, $100 gold, was awarded to Professor Franke, of Crossen, Prussia; the second prize, $50 gold, to Professor Metzger, of Vienna, Austria. The first prize composition will be sung by the Baltimoreans, with full orchestral accompaniments, on Tuesday, July 13.

For the prize-singing at the festival, four valuable prizes, consisting of two grand pianos, from Knabe's manufactory, valued at $1,500 each, and two square, ditto, from Gaehele, will be awarded.

These festivals are celebrated only in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and have taken place as follows:

First in Philadelphia, 1850; second, in Baltimore, 1851; third, in New York, 1852; fourth, in Philadelphia, 1853; fifth, Baltimore, 1854; sixth, New York, 1855; seventh, Philadelphia, 1857; eighth, Baltimore, 1859; and in 1861 were suspended on account of the war. The ninth in New York, 1865; tenth in Philadelphia, 1867, and the present is the eleventh.

At the last festival in Philadelphia the Sängerbund adopted a resolution having for its object a more strict observance and attention to the highest cultivation of vocal music. Specific and minute rules were laid down for this purpose. Among the rules is one that no society in cities where more than one society exists shall be admitted into the Sängerbund, unless it has at least 20 members.

The business of the Sängerbund is transacted by a board of seven, five of whom reside in the city where the festival takes place, and one each in the other cities.

The programme for the festival embraces on the first day a grand public reception of guests, with an imposing procession. On the second day the performance of Handel's oratorio Messiah, by a chorus consisting of about four hundred male and female voices, organized and selected from among the best talent of the city, assisted by an adequate orchestra—the solo parts to be sung by artists of acknowledged reputation, under the leadership of Prof. Lenschow; on the third day prize singing by the different societies from abroad; on the fourth day a grand concert, in which all the societies will unite; on the two following days a repetition of choruses and picnics on the ground.

A number of distinguished musicians from Europe have already arrived, among whom is the eminent composer, Capellmeister Tschirch, from Gera, a special delegate to represent the German Bund of 80,000 members. He is the special guest of the Sängerbund of Philadelphia.

Mme. Rotter, Mme. Friederici, Himmer, Joseph Hermann, and other distinguished opera singers will be present.

BALTIMORE, July 10.—The city is full of visitors and the streets wear a gala dress. The German singers from Philadelphia and New York arrived this evening and were received by the societies here. A grand procession was formed, and, illuminated by Chinese lanterns, torches and fireworks, marched to Monument square, where they sang the German welcome song, after which they were formally welcomed to the city by Mayor Banks. After the mayor's address the whole mass sang "Ecce quam bonum," and then marched to Concordia Hall, where they were again welcomed by the president of the Baltimore singing societies. Every arrangement has been made for the convenience of the visiting societies.

Sunday Evening.—The societies from New York and Philadelphia made excursions to various points in the vicinity of Baltimore to-day. The Sängerbund was formally inaugurated to-night by the performance of the oratorio Messiah at the Maryland Institute, before an audience filling the immense hall. The choruses were most effectually rendered by several hundred singers, male and female. It was a complete success. The grand procession, consisting of various singing societies and nine regiments of the Maryland National Guard, takes place to-morrow. In the evening prize singing will take place. President Grant and members of the cabinet will be present.

The Childrens' Festival at the Coliseum.— Concert by the next Generation.

Special Correspondence of the New York Sun.

Boston, June 19, 1869.—This morning all the children of the public schools were gathered together at the Coliseum. Those who are familiar with the splendid school system of Boston, know that its popularity is so great, and its method so perfect, that nearly all of the children of the city attend the public schools—those of the rich quite as much as those of the poor. The sight was the most lovely one that could be conceived. It reminded one of those pretty children whom Robert Browning tells about, and who followed the magic pipe of the piper of Hamelin:

"There was a rustling that seemed like a bustling
Of merry crowds jostling at pitching and hustling;
Small feet were pattering, little shoes clattering;
Little hands clapping, and little tongues chattering;
And like fowls in the barnyard when barley is scattering,
On came the children running.
All the little boys and girls,
With rosy cheeks and flaxen curls,
And sparkling eyes, and teeth like pearls,
Tripping and skipping, ran merrily after
The wonderful music, with shouting and laughter."

So they came across the bright green grass of the Public Garden, all dressed in white, with pretty sashes of pink and blue, flecking the lawns with a loveliness more exquisite than that of the beautiful flowers through which they passed.

By 11 o'clock they were all in their seats, looking bright, cheerful and happy—a little army of beauty and innocence such as one seldom sees. Much more attention is given to music in Boston than with us, and the children sing infinitely better. I can give them no higher praise than to say that they sang with quite as much precision and unity as the great choruses whose place they had taken. There was about their voices an effect of freshness, purity, innocence, and simplicity that cannot be described. There is no question whatever that these schools are a nursery of musical talent, of which Boston will reap the rich reward in years to come.

The exercises were quite long, and after about two hours the little ones showed signs of great fatigue. The day was a very warm one, and the sun beat down upon the thin roof of the building, and heated it like a great conservatory. The little flowers began to wilt under it, and at least fifteen or twenty were carried fainting to the open windows. It was as though there had been a battle of the fairies and the wounded were being carried to the rear.

The excellence of the concert was materially increased by the assistance of Mme. Parepa and Miss Phillips. The children welcomed them after a pretty fashion of their own—not with clapping of hands or noisy demonstration, but with the flutter of myriads of handkerchiefs—the white caps of a noiseless sea of applause.

I said in a previous letter, speaking of Miss Phillips' singing on Wednesday last, that she entirely failed to fill the great building. Subsequent hearings have convinced me that this was the fault of an unfortunately selected song, and not of any lack on the part of Miss Phillips. It is not every song that is adapted by its structure for hearing in so large a building, and the Mozart aria was one of these exceptions. Handel's great aria, "Lascia ch' io pianga," on the other hand, has a breadth and amplitude and nobility about it that is in consonance with the requirements of the great Coliseum. It lies in broad monotones, and extends in all its compass only a tone beyond the octave, and it told superbly.

These two great artists, Mme. Parepa and Miss Phillips, stood side by side in excellence in the "Quis est Homo" from Rossini's "Stabat." The thousands of children who heard it on Saturday, and who waved their handkerchiefs in such an ecstasy of admiration, will remember it long, and may become fathers and mothers and gray-haired men and women before they hear it better sung.

4. Humoresque. 4. A. 30
5. Mazourka. 4. E. 30

Characteristic pieces are not always so full of character; but these are, and are also very original and pleasing.

Gentle Zephyr. Waltzes. 4. Knight. 40
Brillancy, rather than gentleness, is the striking feature of this set of 4 lively waltzes.

Murmuring Brook. (Was sich Wald-bachlein erzählet). 4. D. Jungman. 60
"What the Forest Brook said" is the translation of the German title. A very pretty story the rivulet tells, and well rendered by means of the delicate music of Jungman.

Souvenir de Carouba. Quadrilles. 3. Brauneisil. 40
A brilliant souvenir of an agreeable watering place in the new dominion. Try the dancing qualities of these quadrilles.

La Belle Canadienne. Polka de Concert. 4. E. Brauneisil. 40
Better than the average of polkas, and a fine tribute to the beauty of some fair lady of Canada.

The Danube River. Transcription. 4. G. Liebig. 40
An elegant transcription of a beautiful melody.

Venus Reigen Waltzes. 3. Gung'l. 75
Up to the mark of merit in dance music, and full of life.

On the Blue Danube. Waltz. 4 hrs. 3. Strauss. 1.00
An unusually pleasing duet, wide awake throughout.

71st Regiment. Galop. 3. B. Wellman. 30
The 71st Reg't. will probably not gallop to this pretty air, but it will be just the thing for soldiers in the ball room.

Romance from "Joseph." 4. C. Kuhs. 40
A very graceful rendering of a favorite melody in "Joseph and his Brethren."

Among the Hills. Idyl. 4. B. Wilson. 60
Another of Mr. Wilson's musical thoughts, very well expressed, and suggestive of the cool hill-tops now so longed for.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, E flat, &c., a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). ## The Musical Drama and the Works of Richard Wagner.

FROM THE FRENCH OF EDOUARD SCHURE.

For a period of more than twenty years Richard Wagner has carried on in Germany an open warfare against the established opera. The strife endures to this day, and has never ceased to excite profound interest in the literary and musical world. The ardor and the perseverance of the composer, the growing reputation of his works, the very storms that have assailed them, prove to the impartial spectator that there is at work there not only an impetuous personality and an extraordinary talent, but also an Idea. If this were not so, how is it possible to explain the stormy enthusiasm which, nineteen years ago, at Weimar, greeted the appearance of "Lohengrin," and the war cries which rang at the same instant from all the camps of criticism? In the lofty regions of Art the attempts of impudent charlatany perish speedily before the cool indifference with which they are received; it is the privilege of ideas truly new and precious to draw down upon themselves all forms of opposition, and to meet in fierce conflict the most implacable animosities. Richard Wagner, let us own frankly, is, towards the opera, a revolutionary radical. This every one knows, but friends and enemies alike ignore, or but vaguely suspect what is the object the artist has in view in this revolution, what the mother idea, be it true or false, which presides over his works, for which he strives as poet and as composer, as chef and as author, for which during thirty years he has lavished all the energy of a fiery and masterful temperament, so that this Idea, this reformation is embodied in himself and his name is its banner. The presentation on the stage of "The Master-Singers," in every point of view an original and interesting work, gives us new occasion to look fairly in the face a man too often rashly judged, and who should command our serious attention by these rare merits of his, the love of high art, carried even to the point of fanaticism, the courage to maintain his opinion to the end,—finally, a life consecrated to an Idea. Let us judge this Idea by the last work which he has brought forward in Germany, let us examine the sentiments of this work, its characters, the thought which animates it, the rôle which the music plays in the development of character and the unfolding of the plot. We may then inquire if we are in the presence of a hesitating, unequal, uncertain work of art, lighted only with flashes of genius, or of a true musical drama, free and fearless, sure in every footstep, and going straight forward to its intended end. Before speaking of "The Master-Singers," it is desirable to glance back over the road which the composer has resolutely followed from his début to the present hour. In a brief sketch of an artist-life, one of the most adventurous and characteristic of our times, it is our intention not only to paint the living man, but to bring his works into full light. Richard Wagner is, as we have said, the champion of an Idea. One only judges an Idea fairly in watching it spring into existence one judges a combatant by seeing him fight.

I.

If ever a musician's career was stormy, his was; if ever a dramatic poet pursued his ideal through obstacles and snares, he did. Richard Wagner is one of those passionate, imperious, absolute natures, which carry with them, in the energy of their instincts, the secret of their future fate. Along his destined way he has walked steadily, with unalterable conviction and ever-increasing faith. Hence the dramatic interest which attaches itself to this militant artist-life; hence also, in his works, a strict sequence, a certain remarkable progression, which is vainly sought in the works of contemporary masters.

Richard Wagner was born at Leipsic in 1813. So his youth fell upon the vexed days of 1830. At that epoch, all young heads were seething with the thousand ideas that filled the atmosphere. There was a tumult in literature, an effervescence in arts; painters, poets, musicians, desired to make innovations, to return to first principles, to create anew from the beginning. In France there were two camps, the classic and the romantic. In Germany, you might count ten, twenty, a hundred, as many schools as there were men, but of all, not one master who, conquering, could stamp the age as his own; for Goethe was now eighty years of age, and Time, in the words of Mme. de Staël, had made him only a looker-on. On the stage, a decline is apparent, the public has come to prefer the melodramas of the school of Kotzebue and of Iffland to the masterpieces of Schiller and Goethe. In music, tastes vary, but above all novelty is desired. Beethoven is admired side by side with Bellini; Weber along with Auber. Imagine the tumult of sensations which must seize upon the mind of a sensitive child, born just in the midst of this whirlwind. He grew up in this burning atmosphere, and the fever of the age entered into his veins. All manner of currents acted upon him, but, wonderful to observe, no one swept him away. At the age of six months he lost his father, and his mother, leaving him much to himself, he was very early given over to his own control. The child, self-willed, odd and unruly, would endure no master. At school he would only study when a thing interested him; but then, with what enthusiasm! He was to learn the piano, but shortly sent off his teacher, saying he would learn music his own way. The theatrical performances of Dresden gave him no pleasure; only painted comedians, he said, not men at all. But the tragedies of Æschylus and Sophocles, which he translated at his gymnase, moved him deeply. This vision of the ancient theatre, with its heroes and demi-gods, its chorus of religious majesty, its vast amphitheatre and nation listening attentive, struck his imagination and remained indelible in his memory. From that time his vocation for the drama was distinctly evident, arising not from observation of the actual world, but from an intense poetic emotion, a passionate impulse towards an ideal, and the desire to make manifest this ideal in all its splendor.—in one word, to give it life. With him there was no trace of sentimental languor, of sickly song-singing. Before the dreaming eye of the youth floated wondrous creatures, radiant fairies, sublime heroes, souls overflowing with love. The contrast of these dazzling visions with reality did not reduce him to despondency, but waked in him a haughty revolt and defiance. These visions became his reality; he believed in them, he talked of them, and even then saw them take actual form. Intense aspiration towards an ideal world, and the irresistible need of making others see it also, nervous force, ardor of soul in conception and savage energy in bringing into form, these are most striking traits in this artist-organization. At fifteen he wrote drama upon drama, and his comrades, one and all, acknowledged the future poet.

One evening he heard a Symphony of Beethoven. He listened, fascinated. The music astonished, troubled him, moved him intensely, transported him out of himself; indeed, to a musical temperament, these symphonies are the most astounding of revelations. A young sculptor who had seen but the timid creations of modern art, and who should be suddenly brought before the tragic marbles of Michael Angelo, would scarcely experience such violent emotion. What tongue, even that of Homer, has given utterance to the voices of nature with more seductive spell than the Pastoral Symphony, from the whisper of the brook to the wild uproar of the sudden storm? What poet has sung of liberty with more enchanting eloquence than the composer of the Symphony in C minor where the soul of a Prometheus seems by turns to weep and to roar, to console his brethren, or to break their chains? The poet of fifteen was not alone taken captive by these prophetic accents; he saw opened to himself a new world, the world of music, where man, freed from the fetters of any individual language, finds expression with all the energy that is in him, in a speech common to all. He seemed to hear human voices in these instruments whose despairing complaints, whose cries of joy called out to each other, made answer, strove together, or rushed forward with a common impulse; he seemed to see a vast heroic poem unfold itself in each Symphony. Henceforth, he felt it at once, poetry was not enough. Compared with these brilliant and victorious vibrations of the soul which make the power of music, poetic diction appeared to him poor, cold, incomplete. To give utterance to the grand emotions of his soul, nothing less than the language of Beethoven would suffice. The change was like a thunder-stroke, a gracious, yet terrible coming of the new Muse who henceforth took possession of the youth. "One evening," he says himself, "I heard performed a Symphony of Beethoven; in the night

I had an attack of fever and became ill; after my recovery I was a musician." He now throws himself into music as heretofore into poetry; for two years he is given up to it body and soul. Harmony, contrepoint, instrumentation, he studied all with passion that is almost frenzy. "Should one be able to compose a fugue?" he said one day to his teacher. "Do not do it often, but know how to do it," said the wise musician. Three days later, his pupil brought him one of the most complicated of fugues, and the old kapellmeister was filled with amazement. At seventeen Richard Wagner had composed a crowd of Sonatas, many Overtures, and a Symphony. The poet seemed changed and forever into the composer.

This was by no means the case; in an unexpected manner the poet re-appeared. This occurred upon hearing Der Freischütz. This first truly popular and bravely national German opera would be sure to make a profound impression upon a nature eager for emancipation and the eternal verities! But who can be insensible to its charm? The breath of the wild woods blowing through it must refresh and strengthen every heart. Agatha's songs, combining native frankness and maidenly purity, fired all the youth of that day with admiration. That which in this masterpiece of Weber was especially attractive to Richard Wagner, was the wonderful unanimity of musical effect and poetical effect in certain passages. Nothing surely exists more dramatic than the repetition of the motif of Samiel each time that the seducer appears. When the red spectre of the Demon of the Woods passes behind Max along in the sombre edge of the forest, and the violoncellos take up their phrase, tempting as desire, rampant and haughty like Satan, it seems as if all the powers of darkness laid siege to the troubled soul of the hunter. This effect and many others revealed to the musician the dramatic power of his art. Directly he also must write an opera, and he shortly planned, wrote and composed Les Fees. Verse and music flowed from his pen as from a common source; this has ever been characteristic of Wagner. From this moment the poet and the composer, coming into life in the same individual and developing separately, were united to each other, never more to separate. An irresistible instinct, a magnetic charm drew them together; advancing side by side they grew into one, and were united forever to the same ideal. This is the great originality of Richard Wagner; this it is which gives him a place apart in the history of the opera. We are not in the presence of a composer pure and simple; those who look at him in this light see him only from one side, and judge him falsely. To appreciate his value and the boldness of his conceptions, it should never be forgotten that he is at the same time a true poet and a true musician. Had he written only the words of his operas, the first of these titles could not have been denied him. On the other hand, had he composed only his Overtures and his Preludes, the second would have been his by right; but in him the poet and the composer dream, labor, create, together. It is impossible to say where one ends or the other begins. Richard Wagner, when he writes a verse in the glow of inspiration, hears already singing in his brain the melody which shall be joined to it, and as he sketches a symphonic fragment, sees clearly in advance the scenic tableau of which it shall be the accompaniment. An exceptional organization, unique in its kind, where two ruling faculties, poetic invention and the need of musical expression, instead of acting in opposition to each other, converge by their own energy, and unite to the same point, the musical drama.

At twenty-three, Richard Wagner became chef d'orchestre at the theatre in Riga. It was necessary to gain a livelihood, and to advance in his career. From a brilliant centre of literary and musical life the young composer found himself suddenly sent away to the shores of the Baltic, to a foreign city, and a dull, monotonous existence. Here, amid the labors of his profession and the trifling broils of a petty theatre, he commenced, following the novel of Bulwer, his first grand opera, Rienzi, which has just been performed at the Theatre Lyrique in Paris. A proud Tribune, dreaming of the old austere Republic, while the corrupted Rome of the papal time surrounded him; a great character filled all full of a great thought; a great heart glowing with patriotism, at war with its brutal and vulgar surroundings, encouraged in his hopes and faith only by his brave enthusiastic sister, like himself, Republican to the heart's core, borne for an instant by the popular wave to the possession of power, then struck down in the height of his triumph by the pontifical thunders, betrayed by a selfish nobility, flouted by the populace who had applauded him, and falling dead upon the threshold of his burning house, the last of the Roman Tribunes:—this was truly a subject for a mind attracted by grand and stately themes. Rienzi is the work of a young man, very unequal indeed, but full of fire and passion, of bold and brilliant compass. The reformatory ideas of the author do not appear in it; it is strictly in accordance with the traditions of the opera. Full choruses, resounding marches, trios, septuor, ballet, nothing is missing. In writing the text, the author thought only of making a good opera libretto. Now and then an energetic verse, a rapid dialogue, a striking scene, answers keen as a knife-blade, denote dramatic talent. The music reminds one of Italian and of French models; still the individuality of the composer shines in the heroic pride of his grand melodies as well as in the warmth and richness of his instrumental coloring. In fine, Rienzi is the work of an independent master, without being that of an innovator upon the established rules of the musical drama.

How then to bring out suitably an opera such as this, Richard Wagner asked himself impatiently, at his desk in the shabby theatre of Riga, with its second-rate performers and its patched-up scenery. Rienzi required an extensive stage, well-trying singers, splendid decorations, in fact all the resources of a first-class theatre. Where to find such, and how, being found, to obtain it? The eyes of the composer turned to that brilliant centre which dazzled all Europe, toward Paris. He resolved to go thither and try his fortune. His friends accused him of folly and all tried to dissuade him. Useless task! Richard Wagner was not a man of subterfuges and half measures. The same vital force which ruled his artistic creations, impelled him in the decisions of actual life, and armed him with a will of iron. What will people say, and what will become of me? These questions, which hold back the majority of men on the brink of dangerous ventures, never with him were able to stifle the inner voice more powerful than all, which said at the destined moment, it must be. In this case it was no sooner said than done. He gave in his resignation at Riga, and embarked for Paris, scarcely able to speak French at all, without letters of introduction, almost without resources. This rash enterprise was sure to overwhelm him with bitter disappointments, but these very disappointments brought him to the knowledge of his own strength.

The voyage was stormy. It was a sad foreshadowing of the fate threatening the audacious artist in the grand capital. A violent storm drove the vessel upon the Norwegian coast, and it was necessary to put into a fjord for shelter. It was in the flashes of the storm, in the cries of the sailors, in the roaring of the waves against the rugged Scandinavian sea-coast, that the idea of The Phantom Ship first arose in the poet's mind; but the sombre ship itself, with its blood-red sails and its sad captain, passed before him, rapid as an arrow's flight, revealed for an instant in the glare of the lightening. It came back to haunt him, three years later, when bitterly deceived, alone in a land of strangers, he felt himself also lost upon a shoreless sea, with no other horizon than misery and despair.

In 1839, Richard Wagner, then twenty-six years of age, arrived in Paris, with the firm resolution of bending himself to all the necessities of his precarious position, and the varied demands of Parisian society. First of all, it was needful for him to make acquaintances in the musical world. He presented himself frankly, without introduction, related his story and explained his plans. Without doubt many were surprised at the naïve simplicity of this course of action. However this may be, many warm friends he found, but nowhere a powerful patron. The directors of the theatres advised him, in a friendly way, to seek a librettiste to translate his Rienzi; the librettistes, on their part, advised him to seek first a favorable director. Months passed. Wearied out, he began to translate himself, with the aid of a friend, his Novice of Palermo for a third-rate theatre. When all was finished, revised, and corrected, it was found that his subject was not sufficiently amusing, and so the piece was refused. Without yielding to discouragement, he began to compose romances for public singers, hoping thus to get a footing in the Parisian musical society; but it was hard to match his free, large melodies with the words of French songs, and so that failed. Driven by absolute need, he went so far as to offer to compose the music for a boulevard vaudeville; the jealousy of others deprived him even of this last resource. But one must live. He resigned himself to arranging opera-airs for the cornet à piston. At the same time he wrote for the Musical Gazette various critiques and romances, especially a "Pilgrimage to the home of Beethoven," and "The Fate of a Musician in Paris," where he described his own misfortunes, not without humor. His hero finished by dying of hunger; he himself scarcely escaped this tragic dénouement.

One can well imagine how bitter all these humiliations were to an artist full of the loftiest aspirations. How many noble and generous natures have been used, degraded, broken, in these enervating struggles! One might suppose that Wagner lost somewhat of heart and energy in it all. But no! he dipped himself therein, and bronzed himself for life. After the painful and often merely mechanical labor of the day, in a situation without hope of advance, weighed down by solitude so melancholy to the stranger in a gay and busy city, he went on with his own work for entire nights. His enthusiasm was never extinguished, his courage redoubled, and to preserve still his allegiance to the noblest kinds of music, he composed an Overture to Faust and also finished his Rienzi. The work finished, he made a last attempt to succeed with it at the Opera. It was useless, all the doors were closed to him. Two years of desperate effort had come only to this.

At such a moment many artists yield to despair and blow their brains out. The greater number abandon the cherished idea and become the obedient slaves of fashion. It was a wonderful thing in this man, need we hesitate to say it, it was to his honor beyond the power of words to express, that at this fateful moment he did not yield. Instead of lamenting to his friends, who were more cast down than himself, he withdrew quietly into the solitude which his misfortune made for him, and, alone in the profound night from which so many brilliant stars had faded one by one, he swore to the ideal within him a faith still more ardent, a devotion more absolute. The legend of the Phantom Ship reappeared before his eyes, fascinated him as if it were the spectre of his own destiny, and seized upon his imagination with a tyrannical force. Having broken the links which held him to his native land in the intoxication of boundless hopes, a wanderer among strangers who were almost enemies, not knowing whither need might drive him, or into what sombre future chance would carry him, how naturally it came to him, this recent sympathy for the gloomy sailor, wandering accursed of God! At this moment the dazzling vision of fame disappeared before the imperial Genius of Inspiration. He must give to the world this idea which filled his mind, he must give life and speech to this sad hero, unhappy, but unconquered, whom he already loved as a brother. No matter for the rest. Alone, obscure, without further thought, without hope of success, he began his work. Music came to his aid, he felt himself a free man and a poet for the first time; free, because he broke loose from the conventional forms of the opera under the inspiration of a ruling sentiment; a poet, because he gave himself unreservedly to his idea, and was absorbed in it.

By this work, more spontaneous, more fiery than all the others, the artist entered into a new sphere; he touched land and came into his kingdom; after having long sought a region favorable to the drama of which he dreamed, he finally found it in the popular myth. Let us recall briefly the legend of the Phantom Ship, and let us see how it reappears in the opera. The story made itself up among the sailors of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, in their dangerous expeditions over unknown seas. A captain was determined to get round a certain cape in spite of wind and sea. A hundred times he was driven back, and a hundred times he returned to the charge, swearing in his anger that he would persist in his attempts, were it to all eternity. The devil heard him, and took him at his word, and he was condemned to wander from one pole to the other over the stormy ocean, accursed of God, terror of man, messenger of shipwreck to vessels in distress. This tradition exists among all sea-faring people, and it is called in Germany Der fliegende Holländer, because the ship flies forever like the storm wind over a boundless and shoreless sea. Wagner taking up this myth has colored it with his own emotions, has given it a shape more dramatic, and a more elevated meaning. According to his conception, the flying Dutchman is a second wandering Jew, scudding across the seas towards a country that he seeks vainly, with untiring desire, a land of home and peace, his own hearth stone, his own fireside. The fatality of his restless soul weighs upon him as a curse. No nation will receive him, all shores cast him out, the very corsair flees from him, making the holy sign. He has defied the ocean, and ocean will never again let him go; he has evoked the spirit of the abyss, and Satan has condemned him to live in his human form forever. One night an angel of God comes to him in the storm and promises him deliverance if a woman will love him even to death. Every seven years he is suffered to land, and to ask the hand of some maiden of the country. Alas! no one of them all will consent to follow him to his black ship; each in turn at the last moment plays him false; so his faith in human pity and love goes out entirely. One desire alone remains to him, to rush into annihilation; one hope only, that the world itself may one day be destroyed. "The time expires: again seven years are passed like a storm. Wearied of me, the sea casts me back upon the earth; alas! fierce ocean, thou shalt again receive me! I can endure and master thine anger, but eternal is my suffering. Never shall I find the salvation which I seek upon the earth. O wild waves, girding the earth, I shall remain yours till your last billow is shattered, and your last drop is dry." There is, however, one heart that beats for this unhappy sailor; one woman will devote herself to him; it is Senta, daughter of Captain Daland. By a secret affinity of the soul, this young Norwegian girl loves this man whom all fear, before she has ever seen his face. All the world fears him and hates him because he is unfortunate and the bringer of misfortune; but just because he is thus miserable, she loves him with all the powers of her soul. It is a bold and striking scene where Senta, a prey to prophetic frenzy, sings the ballad of the Dutchman in the presence of her alarmed companion. She sings it in a sort of wild sympathy, and devotes herself to him in an outburst of sublime pity. At this moment he arrives, brought by the father of Senta. She recognizes him and swears to him eternal fidelity. The marriage approaches, but at the last moment he finds her with Eric, the hunter, who is seeking to detain her. The Dutchman believes her faithless, as all the others have been; doubt and despair again take possession of his soul; he rushes to his ship crying adieu forever to the land; but Senta, seeing him fly, casts herself into the sea to go to him. At this moment the fatal vessel goes down, Senta dies with her lost lover, and the love which unites them is so grand, so heroic, that the spectators are not too greatly surprised to see the two, henceforth inseparable, rise above the stormy waves radiant with glory, while the orchestra, changing from the fury of the sea, triumphs in the redemption which the love of Senta has wrought.

It is easy to see much that is unusual and much that is incomplete in this embodiment of an Idea. The hero is in such fantastic surroundings that one scarcely guesses at first the deep humanity of his nature; likewise, the passage from the real world to that of symbolic mystery is exceedingly abrupt. For all that, the idea is beautiful, the situation pathetic, and the inspiration harmonious and genuine. As to the music, it contains as yet no remarkable innovations. There is often a lack of clearness in the meaning of the orchestra, the declamation is at times monotonous, and hesitations occur between the recitative and the air. The novelty of this music is in the effect it produces. If ever the gloomy rhythm of the implacable sea has been expressed with terrible truth, it is in the first act; it is heard like the voice of the Styx, the eternal growl of the waves that will never relent nor forgive. And on the other hand, what inner peace, what infinite gentleness in the song of Senta, a melody of angelic sweetness and trust, always accompanied by the harp, and unveiling to us every instant the heart of the heroine! This violent contrast between the despairing sailor under the eternal ban, and the young girl, loving, eager for self-sacrifice, who will save him from his misery; this strange, magnetic sympathy between boundless grief and woe on the one hand, and boundless love on the other; these two souls which attract each other, which cling together and find in death the supreme blessedness, this is the drama itself. In most operas the words are only to furnish a pretext for the music; here the music exists solely to bring out the drama. Refusing every hint to wander, it attaches faithfully to the words, accentuates by characteristic motifs the master-passions of the characters, gives color to the scenes and fills out the tableaux. And this is as it should be; if the musical drama is to be consistent with itself, music must add itself to acting only to strengthen the emotion, to sustain the action, to vivify the poetry. It was the idea of Gluck; Wagner has brought it forward again and strengthened it. The Phantom Ship is his first step in this path. He will arrive at Tannhäuser and Lohengrin by no system whatever, solely by the force of his dramatic instinct.

The Piano in the House.

[From The Pall Mall Gazette.]

The manner in which the British public, "which moveth all together if it move at all," adopts en masse this or that novelty in time killing by a system of mutual imitation, is not more remarkable than the constancy of its favor for certain articles, fashion and custom turning them into absolute necessaries. It is the correct thing to have a piano in your drawing-room, as much as to have an armchair. The furnishing is incomplete without it. You may have no ear for music, you may even regard with horror, as did Elia, the measured and apporportioned concatenation of noises called by that name, but you must have a piano nevertheless. Fashion in a town mansion, respectability in a suburban cottage, alike demand it. Hence the immense and increasing outlay upon these instruments, from the modest twenty-five guinea "cottage," warranted (to disappoint you in every way), up to that noblest of its species, the hundred and eighty guinea "grand." Hence, also, innumerable prancings thereupon, carried on especially at our evening re-unions with a regularity, an absence of interest, and a futility of meaning, which must surely be puzzling to visitors from other climes. One can imagine the court circles of Siam or Java enlightened by their ambassadors in this wise: "These people in the North have another most singular custom. In all their dwellings we found a cunningly devised framework of polished wood, the abode of strange and indescribable sounds, called forth upon applying the hands violently to certain black and white levers systematically arranged in groups, having apparently some symbolical signification. When these people meet to entertain each other, rational discourse is continually interrupted by one or other of the guests being compelled by the rest to operate violently upon this machine. We often felt for those (and they were chiefly females) who were so treated. There was evidently some disgrace attached to it, as they always hung back with many pleadings and excuses, until absolutely forced to the machine; when the rest of the company, apparently from motives of delicacy, turned backs on the victim, and talked loud and cheerfully to distract attention from her. In vain we endeavored to discover the origin and the meaning of this singular superstition, which probably has a religious origin," etc.

Englishmen are sometimes conscious of a similar bewilderment when their attention is distracted by the current kind of "drawing-room music" with its conversational accompaniments. More or less we have all writhed under the fantasias of the young lady with a brilliant left hand, have shuddered at the advent of the person (generally a curate or a young person in the civil service) who "plays a little," and have wondered at the hostess's "thank you, that is so charming." And in moments like these, most of us have pondered why it is that this peculiar form of musical art should be degraded into a wretched clap-trap exhibition, to be wreaked upon unoffending people who accept invitations given with apparent kindness and good faith. Why is the piano, of all other instruments, to be a corpus vile for all persons, with or without musical organization, to play fantastic tricks upon? A man does not learn to play upon the organ or the violin unless he feels moved thereto by some special faculty, some innate yearning. With the piano, we begin by making it a necessary article of furniture; and when we have got it, of course we must show that we know what is done with such things. It is the pride, the ambition, the business of ladies to be agreeable and entertaining in the drawing room; music is agreeable; therefore the manipulation of the piano must be part of a "finished" young lady's education. A boy may have a sincere love and an obvious taste for music, and find under our present system of school and university education scarcely any encouragement for his taste or opportunity for his talent; rather it will be stigmatized by grave and reverend seignors as a mischievous temptation, incompatible with serious aims in life. But let a girl betray the most hopeless incapacity for comprehending either harmony or melody—it is all one, learn she must. It is part of her education, of her duty in life, that she should be able to play a rattling fantasia at least as vigorously as her neighbors, the Misses Brown and Jones. Hence the murderous sounds which go up to the gods from a thousand academies daily; and thus it is that countless young girls, to whom we look for the maintenance or the elevation of the tone of society in England, spend a large part of their youth in what to many of them is but a dreary mechanical exercise, and to all is a sacrifice of time and trouble quite disproportionate to the end attained. The time which might be employed in gaining real knowledge and cultivation of mind and character is employed in achieving a talent for debasing a beautiful art into a showy mechanical display distasteful to themselves and wearisome to others.

But it is not a law of nature that the piano in the house should be merely an instrument of wood and wire for the exhibition of digital dexterity. Of itself it is the portal of an ideal world, an "ivory gate" of dreams, affording to the jaded spirit easy refuge from the work-a-day world. And the very causes which have combined to make it so popular an instrument—namely, its facility of manipulation and its versatility of effect—are just those which render it so peculiarly happy a means for bringing musical art into our homes. The powers of the instrument are restricted, it is true; nevertheless, it is capable to a great extent of imitating and recalling effects only to be attained through more ample and costly media. The many-voiced symphony, the chorus which has awakened the echoes of Exeter Hall, the organ and anthem which shook "the prophets blazoned on the pines" at the Abbey, may all be recalled on the piano in a manner bearing somewhat the same relation to the original effect that an engraving bears to a painting—giving form and outline, and leaving the colors (and much besides, alas!) to imagination.

One of the most renowned pianists of the time told the writer of this article that when he played for his own pleasure he never played piano-forte music; his delight was to take an orchestral score and try how much of its effect he could reproduce from his single keyboard. To do this well is not given to everybody; but something may be achieved in that way by a true player, and another pleasant form of domestic art and study is found in the endeavor to represent on a piano the combined effect of voice and accompaniment; a kind of performance which demands concentration of mind as well as delicacy of finger, and which certainly appeals to higher artistic faculties than the execution of clattering fantasias on popular airs. Above all, if we look at piano-forte music proper, such as has been written by true masters of their art, who did not work for show, what a world of beautiful things do we find—"sounds and sweet airs that give delight, and hurt not" either the instrument or the listener's ears. The Sonatas of Beethoven alone contain a response to almost every mood of mind; and what is it that we want of music more than that it should harmonize with our humors and provide our minds with a refuge from uncongenial everyday surroundings? Perhaps there is no more striking exemplification of the beneficence of this art than the fact that in many a dull room in a dull street, where life seems tied down to the mean and vulgar and commonplace, the bare presence of a piano does then and there furnish means for instantaneous flight from such mundane annoyances, bringing at once light into the gloom, and kindling the mind with noble and beautiful ideas. And, looking at the matter from this point of view, may we not be pardoned for feeling contempt for that kind of prostitution of music in our drawing-rooms which modern education has created and fostered? Musical education, for the most part, goes merely to the attainment of a certain routine mechanical dexterity. Among those who make music their profession, it is of course desirable that a high standard of executive power should be maintained; though Beethoven declared that all public performers seemed to him to lose expression and feeling exactly in proportion as they gained in execution. But nothing can be a more silly waste of time than for amateurs to attempt those showy difficulties which are the best stock in trade of too many professional pianists. They can rarely be really successful; and if they do succeed, the game is not worth the trouble; for the end attained is only at the expense of valuable time which might have been much better employed. What we want in our social meetings is, not to have the piano kept going, like a mill, against an opposing torrent of conversation, but to have music that is worth listening to well played, if people wish for it, and will listen to it, and not otherwise; and if half the time spent by young ladies at school in excursions up and down the key-board were occupied in learning something about music as an art, some of us might have less reason to dread the sight of "the piano in the house."

Handel at the Jubilee.

Concord, Mass., July 11, 1869.

MR. EDITOR:—In one of your articles on the late Boston Jubilee you say: "Generally the grave, slow Chorales sounded best. Strange to say, and contrary to all we could have looked for, not Handel's choruses, not even the great Hallelujah, still less the choruses by Haydn, made the great effects;" &c., &c.

Reading these words, I am prompted to offer for your consideration some reasons why, in my opinion, the choruses of Handel and Haydn could not be effectively rendered at the late Jubilee. And I believe that few experienced chorus singers could have looked for a result different from what occurred.

Among those who generally form a chorus there are, comparatively speaking, but few who are self-reliant and capable of taking up promptly their points. And even of these, it is too often the case, that many are too careless and indifferent to give a conscientious attention to their duties in a public performance. The majority of a chorus are, generally, but poor readers, who lean and depend on others, rather than themselves. I had many years experience in chorus singing and always found it to be so; and any competent singer of experience will testify that it is so. Even in England, where Handel is sung more correctly and effectively than in any other country, I question if the chorus would be what it is were it not for the Cathedrals, which are always educating singers, not only to sing Handel, but, in a certain sense, to love his music. To bring together, therefore, ten thousand of such voices, and expect them to sing the choruses of Handel and Haydn, in any manner that could be called effective, was to me an impossibility; and I was not, therefore, disappointed in the result.

The most effective chorus I have heard in this country, was that under the late George Loder, in New York. It was small, comparatively speaking, but it sang with great intelligence, giving effect to all the lights and shades, so much needed in chorus singing, and taking up the points with a precision rarely surpassed. Jenny Lind and Benedict paid this chorus a great compliment when it sang in their performance of the Messiah in Tripler Hall. Much was due, however, to Loder for its great excellence, who was not only an excellent drill and good conductor, but he had also,—externally vulgar as he was sometimes,—an appreciation and love of Handel rarely excelled and not often equalled. He had too, that rare faculty, a power of infusing his own love into those under him, of inspiring them into that unity which, in such performances, can alone insure success.

The choruses of The Messiah, though very simple in construction, while grand and majestic in effect, are not easy to sing, unless by good readers, who will be conscientiously attentive to their duties. On the other hand the Chorales, and even the choruses you name of Mendelssohn as being the most effectively performed, are easily read, and more easily followed by those who cannot readily read; hence an effect could be and was given to these, which could not be given to Handel and Haydn.

Again Handel's choruses, especially those of The Messiah, depend altogether on the vocal effect; if failure takes place here, the instruments cannot make it up. The late Doctor Chard, who was organist at Winchester Cathedral, England, was of opinion that Mozart's accompaniments in the choruses of the Messiah destroyed, rather than added to their grandeur; indeed he thought the less instrumentation they had the better, their construction being such that they did not need it. He may or may not be right here; I do not presume to say, further than that I do believe they were written especially to be sung, and that they will be sung in the future, by immense bodies of voices. The choruses of Mendelssohn, on the other hand, are aided immensely by instrumentation, without which they would lose, in a large degree, their beauty and grandeur; by the instrumentation any weakness on the part of the voices is, in a measure, covered up. Yet I could name choruses of Mendelssohn—as for instance the finale of Elijah—in which, I think, that body of ten thousand would have been no more effective than they were in Handel and Haydn.

Last winter I attended some of the performances of the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston. In the Elijah the effect produced was, in some of the choruses, very fine; in others, especially in the finale, not so good. From the status of this society I anticipated a great treat in The Messiah. In this I was greatly disappointed. Here I discovered that, like all choruses, it consists of a great many who cannot read, or who were too inattentive to their duties on that occasion; and that the chorus depended for the prompt taking up of points on a few voices on each part. The Basses, in that great point: "For the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it," and also in "And He shall reign for ever and ever," failed entirely to give the effect called for. The chorus "For unto us a child is born" was more badly sung than I ever remember to have heard it. It may have appeared so from the fact of their changing, certainly in very false, unscriptural and bad taste, the word given to that of giv'n, which changed the character of the entire chorus.

I cannot believe that Handel's Messiah has performed its great mission. To me it is a work that has yet to be performed and appreciated as never before. It is related of Handel that he said, he seemed to have heard it all before he wrote it; hence it would seem to have been a work of a very direct inspiration; and he may not himself have then had but a faint foreshadowing of its great mission. I believe the time will come when it will be sung, not by ten thousand voices only, but by hundreds of thousands.* This cannot be, however, in an age like this an age of no faith. Can the Painter put on canvass what he has not in his mind ideal? Can the Sculptor mould the marble to a form of beauty of which he has no conception? How then can singers interpret and give expression to a work like Handel's Messiah, unless they have the living faith, of which it sings, embodied in themselves? Who can sing "For unto us a child is born," unless they inwardly believe such a child was born? Who can sing "Comfort ye my people," without a living faith? Who can sing "For the Lord God omnipotent reigneth," unless he does reign within the soul? And who can sing the song—the climax of the great work—"I know that my Redeemer liveth," unless he knows, of himself,—not because Priest, Pastor, or Church has told him,—that his Redeemer liveth? And more, who can take baton in hand and conduct such a work, who has not a living faith in the Lord as his Redeemer? How can God's inspirations flow through the eye or the hand, gathering to the owner thereof not only the eye but the inspired heart of each individual singer or performer, uniting them into oneness, unless that eye and hand belongs to one who can say: I know that my Redeemer liveth! Who can conduct, even, one of Beethoven's master works, unless he can form a conception of the great master's idea, and inspire his orchestra with the same? Handel's melodies are too pure for a sensuous age; hence there are but few who can really appreciate and love them; and if they cannot appreciate, how can they interpret and sing? How simple, yet pure, is that song of his: "Holy! Holy! Lord God Almighty!" I recollect Malibran singing this in Manchester, England. It was the last thing she ever sang in the body. She sang it conscious that her end was near; when all the outward was fading from her sight, and when, as it was said, cruel treatment and great suffering had thrown her to seek Him who alone can give peace and rest; and so her singing this simple but pure song was as if Heaven opened to her, and she beheld the glory of which she was singing. And Jenny Lind told the people of New York that in fifty years or more they would begin, perhaps, to appreciate Handel, but that she perceived at present they could not appreciate or love his music.

But I have extended my letter beyond all bounds and must stop. If I have given you any thought worthy of reception, and you can pass it to others, I shall be repaid for my trouble.

Appreciating what you say in general touching the great Jubilee,

I remain very truly yours,

GEO. LEACH.

The Jubilee and Church Music.

BY REV. JOSEPH P. THOMPSON, LL.D.

Several of the religious newspapers have derived from the Boston Jubilee an argument for congregational singing—the union of the whole assembly in sacred song—as not only practicable upon a vast scale, but as the most appropriate and effective music for religious worship. But, however much one may desire the participation of the entire congregation in this part of public worship, the legitimate inference from the choral singing at the Jubilee seems to lie upon the other side. The term congregational singing, as used in this country, denotes the inartificial, unscientific singing of the mass of the congregation, in distinction from the practiced rendering of music by a select quartet or a trained choir. But the choral singing at Boston, with its grand effects of volume and harmony, illustrated in a high degree the advantages of thorough and scientific musical training above that vocal enthusiasm of numbers that passes for congregational singing. The chorus of ten thousand voices at the Coliseum was a picked choir upon a scale of unprecedented magnitude. Each individual singer in that chorus was a member of some local choir or musical society and accustomed to read music at sight and to sing in public. But such previous training in the science and practice of music was not enough to secure admission into the Jubilee chorus. Every applicant for that honor was obliged to undergo an examination, in quality of voice, in reading at sight, and in the execution of difficult test passages from the selected choruses. Notwithstanding these precautions, this vast choir, composed of hundreds of average excellence, occasionally failed in time and expression, particularly in fugue passages. To argue from the exceptional success of this carefully selected and well-adjusted chorus, that the miscellaneous members of an ordinary congregation could render the service of song acceptable and edifying, in a musical point of view, is utterly without weight or reason. Moreover, the picked chorus at Boston was sustained by an orchestra of professional musicians, whose skillful accompaniment, supported by the magnificent tones of the organ, kept up the voices in pitch and time, and so filled the interstices of vocal sound, that minor faults of execution were lost in the broad sweep of harmony. Of course no such musical effects can be hoped for in ordinary congregational singing, nor can there be any valid reasoning from one to the other.

Some imagine that in order to have congregational singing, it is only necessary that all the people shall sing, without regard to the question whether they know how to sing or have been trained to sing together in proper time and tune, or, as Mr. Beecher once put it, they shall "make a loud noise unto the Lord." But mere loudness of sound, or the noise of numbers without regard to rhythm, is far from ministering to edification in worship. It is this that renders the liturgical responses of the Episcopal church services so distasteful to persons of cultivated ear and refined devotional feeling. One sharp voice is curvetting about, in advance of his neighbors, another with halting tones is lagging far behind, here and there a voice moving with proper cadence is marred by a dozen hurrying to overtake it, and finally the whole comes in pell-mell, like rowers or racers striving for the goal, so that a devout mind is ready to exclaim,—We beseech thee, incline thy servants to worship decently and in order, according to the requirement of thy holy word. The ritualists have at last discovered that, in order to render a responsive liturgy effective as a devotional service, they must take it out of the mouths of the people, and have it worthily rendered by trained choirs. In like manner congregational singing by untrained voices resembles the tumultuousness of the waves of the sea, without their majestic cadence.

True congregational singing requires a basis of musical training either in the whole people, or in certain prominent voices set apart to lead in this service. The general training is much to be preferred, but in this our American congregations are sadly deficient. Singing is seldom taught nowadays, as it was formerly, for the benefit of a congregation, or even of its children and youth. In Sunday schools children are not taught to sing intelligently, but their faculty of imitation is exercised in learning by rote the jingle of paltry airs that can never help them to the understanding or the appreciation of music. It is pretty much so in the public schools; and hence as a rule, but few persons in any mixed congregation can sing by note, or read even simple music at sight.

The writer has the privilege of worshipping with a congregation in which for ten years the practice has been for the people at large to sing the hymns, tune-book in hand. Not long ago Luther's famous Reformation hymn was appointed to be sung, and the music—not as enfeebled in the Sabbath Hymn and Tune book, but in its original simplicity and majesty as a chorale—was printed with the hymn and distributed in the pews. But though the air was led by a fine quartet, singing in unison, and the harmony was sustained by a powerful organ, it was estimated that not more than one in ten of the congregation joined tunelessly in this sublime hymn of praise. Yet with the trained chorus of ten thousand, and the accompaniment of orchestra and organ, this was one of the finest things in the Boston Jubilee. It is always impressive in a German congregation; but, we alas, are not educated to sing.

For lack of musical qualification in the congregation at large, we must have recourse to a choir or quartet to lead the congregation in the act of praise; otherwise there is only a confused medley of sound. A good organ, fitly handled, is a great help in congregational singing, by giving steadiness and volume to the tone, and marking the time. But more effective than choir or organ would be a well-balanced corps of trumpeters—such as one sometimes hears in the royal churches of continental Europe. The Trumpet, of the old Temple service, is pre-eminently the instrument for the accompaniment of Psalmody. Once the writer introduced this, in a memorial service for our fallen soldiers. A grand choir sang Mendelssohn's magnificent chorale in St. Paul, "Sleepers Awake." Behind them, unseen by the congregation, were the brass instruments of Dodworth's band; and never was a more solemn and elevating effect witnessed in a church service, than when those invisible trumpets sounded forth their majestic strains. Of course such an accompaniment could be obtained only in cities, and at large cost; but with congregations trained to sing together, and led and sustained by organ trumpets, trombones, tubas—in a word, with "everything that hath breath"—we should have music worthy of the Jubilee of the world's redemption.—Advance.

Music Abroad.

London.

Mlle. NILSSON has given a couple of concerts in St. James's Hall, of which the Musical World says:

That sacred music of the highest class was within the range of Mlle. Nilsson's powers had already been proved at the Birmingham Festival of 1867, and the Handel Festival in the Crystal Palace of the year following. As, however, she is not one of those artists who care to rest upon their laurels, but rather one whose motto is "Excelsior," we are hardly surprised at the great advance she exhibits, both in her delivery of the music and in her pronunciation of the language. In the first and second parts of the Creation, at the first concert (when she enjoyed the advantage of being associated with such experienced masters of the sacred style as Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Santley), she showed herself thoroughly conversant with the text of Haydn, achieving in the great airs, "With verdure clad," and "On mighty pens," both of which she gave in perfection, a legitimate triumph. At the concert on Monday she repeated the first of these with equal success, besides adding "Angels ever bright and fair (Theodora), and "Let the bright Seraphim" (Samson)—showing herself therein quite as much at home with Handel as with Haydn. "Let the bright Seraphim," in which the trumpet of Mr. T. Harper was a worthy partner to the voice of Mlle. Nilsson, was enthusiastically encored and repeated. The concert was in other respects one of great and varied interest. A first-class orchestra, led by Mr. H. Blagrove and conducted by Mr. Henry Leslie, played the march from Mendelssohn's Athalie, the Pastoral Symphony from the Messiah, and the overture to Oberon; Mr. Leslie's Choir sang, among other things, the "Sanctus" from J. S. Bach's mass in B minor, Mendelssohn's "Judge me O God," and "Wretched lovers," from Acis and Galatea—how, we need not say; Mr. Santley gave, in his best manner, M. Gounod's "Nazareth" (with chorus), "O ruddier than the cherry," and Mr. J. L. Hatton's "Wreck of the Hesperus," besides joining Mlle. Nilsson in Mozart's "Crudel perche"; and Mr. J. M. Welsh played one of his most showy pianoforte fantasias (Rigoletto) in his showiest manner. Last not least, Mlle. Nilsson sang, in Italian, a new scena, by Herr Meyer Lutz, entitled "Xenia, the Slavonian maiden" (two of the themes in which have all the graceful flow and quaint charm of national melodies), and being unanimously encored substituted one of her own popular Swedish airs, accompanying herself on the pianoforte. The concert was altogether as attractive as a concert of the kind could possibly be.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. (From the Pall Mall Gazette, June 29).

The final concert was given last night "by special desire," and worthily closed a season described in an official summary as "perfectly successful." No better programme could have been chosen. It opened with Beethoven's matchless Leonore overture, the emperor of overtures, quite as much as his concerto in E flat is the emperor of concertos. Mr. Cusins's orchestra, to the improvement of which we have again and again testified, played it in admirable style, and left nothing whatever to desire. The next important selection was Spohr's "Dramatic Concerto," or, giving its full title, Concerto Drammatico in modo di Scena Cantante, one of the best known, as it is one of the most masterly works ever written for the composer's instrument. The soloist was Herr Straus, an artist who can not only lead the Philharmonic orchestra with thorough efficiency, but fulfil a yet more important duty—as in this case—with thorough success. The whole concerto—a really grand production—made the effect well nigh inseparable from it, and led to Herr Straus's recall amid unanimous applause.

Next came Dr. Sterndale Bennett's pianoforte concerto in C minor (op. 9), third of the six we owe to his brilliant talent. It forcibly asserts the English musician's precocity. In 1834, the date of the concerto, Dr. Bennett was a lad of eighteen, who had previously written two other such works. Moreover, the C minor is memorable as having, at a Leipzig Gewandhaus concert, in 1837, under Mendelssohn's direction obtained for its composer and executant a genuine triumph, and given to Robert Schumann the text for one of his ablest and most genial criticisms. Much might be said of the work—of its abundant fancy, charming melodies, and masterly treatment; but we must be content to speak about it generally as among the greatest productions the English school can boast. It was fitting that such a composition should be played by Mme. Arabella Goddard, who has during many years kept Dr. Bennett's pianoforte works before the public. Her right to be his expositor was never more conclusively proved than on this occasion. Whether it was the alternate gravity and sweetness of the first allegro, the charming ideality of the romance, or what Mr. Macfarren calls the "wild energy" of the finale, each feature of the concerto was brought out with consummate skill. That every note was played it would be superfluous to say. Mme. Goddard was deservedly recalled at the close of her task.

Mr. Cusin's clever and striking though somewhat fantastic overture, Les Travailleurs de la Mer, brought the first part of the concert to an end. In Part II. Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony was the chief item, and the whole ended with Weber's Jubilee overture. The vocalists were Signor and Mme. Bettini.

MR. CHARLES HALLE'S RECITALS. With the month of June, Mr. Hallé completed the purpose proposed at the commencement of these recitals—which was to include the miscellaneous pianoforte pieces (variations, rondos, &c.) of Beethoven, and all the solo pianoforte works of Schubert. Both these objects had been compassed in Hallé's recitals of last year; but the present repetition involved the addition of some recently published works of Schubert not then available, the most important being two complete movements of a grand sonata which, had the other portions been forthcoming, would have equalled if not surpassed any of the eleven great works of that class which Schubert has left completed. The interest of these recitals has been great in the variety and intrinsic importance of the selections, and the highly-finished execution and thoughtful study brought by Mr. Hallé to their performance.

—We learn from the Musical Standard that English opera is to be given at the Princess's Theatre, London, under the direction of J. L. Hatton. The season is to open in August, with "Acis and Galatea."

—A Metropolitan Choral Festival of five thousand voices was held at the Royal Horticultural Garden, London, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Martin, on the 3d inst. The choir consisted of three thousand first and second sopranos, one thousand tenors, and one thousand basses.

—No less than forty-three operas have been submitted to the commission appointed to examine works offered to the Theatre Lyrique. The members of the commission have met twice a week for nearly seven months, and their choice has at length fallen upon an opera entitled "Le Magnifique." The fact that this favored work is in one act is significant of the average merit of the compositions. Another opera, "La Coupe et les Lèvres," in five acts, founded on Alfred de Musset's poem, is also recommended, provided certain modifications be made.

—The results of the music examinations by the Society of Arts, which have just been made known, show that the Tonic Solfa-ists have repeated their successes of former years. In the examination in the theory of music, which Mr. John Hullah conducts, both the prizemen and half those who receive first class certificates have been trained under Tonic Solfa teachers. Mr. G. A. Macfarren's examination in elementary musical composition, the exercises for which may be written either in Tonic Solfa or established notation, is almost exclusively used by Tonic Solfa-ists, although open on equal terms to others; but the two prizes and fifty-five certificates which have been granted are records of positive and not comparative attainment. This last examination was instituted last year at the request of the Tonic Solfa-ists, who pay the expenses and the prize-money.

The Past Two Musical Years in Boston.

(Concluded).

IV. ORATORIOS, &c.

The period under review includes the Triennial Festival of the Handel and Haydn Society in May 1868, when, with a chorus of between seven and eight hundred voices, an orchestra of 100, and, for principal solo singers, Mme. Parepa-Rosa, Miss Adelaide Philipps, Miss Houston, Mrs. Barry, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Rudolphsen, &c., the following choral works were produced:

HANDEL. Samson, and The Messiah.

HAYDN. The Creation.

MENDELSSOHN. St. Paul; Hymn of Praise; 95th Psalm.

BEETHOVEN. Choral Symphony.

NICOLAI. Festival Overture, with Chorus on "Ein feste Burg."

Besides which, the same Society, at their usual seasons of Thanksgiving, Christmas and Easter, in the two years, performed:

HANDEL. Samson; Messiah (3 times); Judas Maccabæus.

MENDELSSOHN. Elijah (3 times); St. Paul; Hymn of Praise.

COSTA. Naaman (for the first time).

ROSSINI. Moses in Egypt, quasi Oratorio.

"The Creation" has been given also by the Choral Union (South Boston). We may further add the following works performed, without orchestra, in concerts of private clubs (Mr. Parker's, and Mr. Kreissmann's, Brookline):

SCHUMANN. Portions of Mass.

GADE. Cantata: "The Crusaders."

HILLER. Cantata: "Easter Morning."

MENDELSSOHN. Prayer: "Da nobis pacem."

DURANTE. Magnificat.

PERGOLESE. Stabat Mater.

The German Saengerfest.

On the 16th of July the eleventh national singing festival of the North-eastern Sängerbund was brought to a close in the city of Baltimore. This association holds its festivals every alternate year. They take place in succession in the cities of Philadelphia, Baltimore and New York, those being the principal eastern cities in which the largest number of Societies of the Bund exist. The next Festival will be held in New York in 1871.

At present there are about two thousand active singing members comprising the Bund, of whom some fifteen hundred were present at Baltimore. The city of New York sent twenty-nine Societies, Philadelphia twenty-two, and Baltimore eight. A few others were present from neighboring cities. So much for the statistics of the affair.

The purpose of these festivals is easily stated. It is purely and simply to have a good time. It is the German holiday. The promotion of art in the abstract, if it has any place in the scheme, holds a very secondary one; certainly the honest Teuton makes no parade of any such intention even if he has it. The conspicuous thing is his down-right, flat footed intention of forgetting all about work and care for a good long week, and using every minute of the time in enjoying himself as fully as he can, not after the fashion of his American cousins, but after the good old traditions of his fatherland, from the days when Wolfram of Eisenbach, and Ulric of Lichtenstein and Tannhäuser, and all the Minnesingers of Germany, gathered together at the Wartburg to contend before the Landgrave of Thuringia for the prize of song, to this day and generation.

In this national enjoyment music is the most important element, and during the week that the Festival continued in Baltimore that city was a city of song. Not only was music heard in the halls where their concerts were given, but everywhere, about the streets and at all the great hotels, bursting out at the most unexpected times and places; and far on into the night it came from the open air gardens, brilliant with lanterns, where the sons of song were gathered, and the citizen, as he turned for his second nap, heard floating through his open window the pleasant strains of far-off melody and composed himself to sleep regretting, doubtless, that he too was not a German.

We propose to review briefly the events of the week, giving our readers a general idea of what took place without entering into any special or critical detail of any part.

In the first place it was immensely warm; everything took place at blood-heat and under a broiling sun. Apollo certainly beamed with fervent regard upon his disciples. In view of this fact, it may seem a little singular that so much of their time was taken up in marching over the heated cobble stones of Baltimore.

But the Teutonic mind seems eminently contented when it is a procession, and they walked about for miles upon miles during their stay, carrying their heavy eiken banners with an enthusiasm and happiness most charming to witness—from under an umbrella.

The programme of the week was briefly as follows: On Saturday evening (July 10th), a public reception by the city authorities. Sunday night, "The Messiah." Monday morning, a procession of singers escorted by all the military of the city. Monday evening, the contest of the societies for the prizes. Tuesday morning, a rehearsal, and in the evening a concert, in which all the singers present joined. On Wednesday and Thursday, pic-nics at the park and the national out-of-door sports. A most rational and wisely constructed programme.

As to the performance of the "Messiah" there is not much to be said; it was sung by the Baltimoreans only. The chorus was small and the orchestra was small, but it was a brave little chorus and orchestra and did as well as it could. A certain novelty was imparted to the oratorio by hearing the old familiar airs and choruses in their German dress. "Er wird sie reinigen" sounded very curiously to one whose ear expected "And he shall purify;" and "Lift up your heads" hardly seemed itself as "Hoch that euch auf."

Mmes. ROTTER and FREDERICK and Messrs. HEMMER and HERMANN were the soloists. Our friend Hermanns had identified himself so completely with the satanic role of Mephistopheles that he seemed oddly out of place in his semi-ecclesiastical part, and in fact did not take at all kindly to the long Handelian passages, through which he lumbered and jolted after a queer fashion of his own, and was inexpressibly relieved (as indeed was his audience also) when he got finally to the end of one of them. In a word, the performance was indifferent, though the Baltimore papers thought the next morning that it was "the finest ever given in the country." If ignorance is bliss, what supreme happiness that writer must have enjoyed!

Next day came the sweltering procession, with its military, half-rebel, half-union, formerly in deadly contest, now all marching peaceably under the old flag; its societies, each with a banner, of wonderful embroidery; its throngs of citizens lining the sidewalks and filling the windows; its triumphal arches spanning the streets; and its gay flags hung everywhere, prominent over all the flag of the new German confederation, red, white and black.

In the evening came the grand event of the Festival,—the prize singing. Eighteen societies entered the contest. They were divided into two classes:

those of less than forty-six voices having assigned to them the first half of the programme, those of more than forty-six the last half. There were nine in each class. To both classes were to be awarded two prizes, the first in each being a grand piano, the second a square. As it may be, in these days when male voice singing is so much cultivated, a matter of interest to our readers to know what was sung, we append the programme:

PART I. (Smaller Societies).

- 1 Sunday Morning. (Sonntagsfrühe).....Becker. Philadelphia Concordia Gesang-verein.
- 2 Spring of love. (Liebesfrühling).....Zech. Philadelphia Liedertafel.
- 3 Let me roam the woods. (Im Walde).....Abt. New York Mozart Verein.
- 4 Warriors' Song. (Reiterlied).....Oberboller. Brooklyn Sängerbund.
- 5 Greeting to Spring. (Frühlingschor).....Abt. Washington Sängerbund.
- 6 My bark is swiftly sailing. (Mein Schifflein treibt). J. Meschnitt. Poughkeepsie Germania.

- 7 The Emigrants. (Die Auswanderer).....Abt. Columbus (Ohio) Männerchor.
- 8 Spring and love. (Frühling und Liebe).....Veit. N. Y. Beethoven Männerchor.
- 9 The Poet's Grave. (Das Dichterggrab).....Mochring. Hoboken Quartet Club.

PART II. (Larger Societies).

- 1 Pretty Roth Raut. (Schön Roth Raut).....Veit. Arion of New York. 52 Singers.
- 2 Love and Grace. (Liebe und Gnade).....Otter. N. Y. Schillerbund. 59 Singers.
- 3 A merry song in the Forest. (Ein Frisches Lied).....Abt. Philadelphia Männerchor. 58 Singers.
- 4 How came love. (Wie kam die Liebe).....Frel. N. Y. Liederkranz. 74 Singers.
- 5 The Midnight March. (Der Gang um Mitternacht). F. Liszt. Philadelphia Junger Männerchor. 62 Singers.
- 6 The Morning Dawn. (Morgen wird).....Rheinthal. N. Y. Sängerbund. 67 Singers.
- 7 Sacred Evening Song. (Geistliches Abendlied)Reincke. Philadelphia Sängerbund. 67 Singers.
- 8 No sun brought the day. (Keine Sonne brachte der Tag).....Reiser. Philadelphia Liedertafel d. F. Gemeinde. 50 voices.
- 9 Geibel's War Song. (Kriegslied).....Hartwig. N. Y. Teutonia Männerchor. 54 voices.

The smaller societies opened the concert. It was at once evident that the hall was too large for them, and that they could do themselves no justice. The Baltimoreans made the mistake of building their music hall on the model of their clipper ships. The Maryland Institute, though it might rate A 1. as a vessel, must certainly be marked Z 26 as a concert room. It is absurdly long and ridiculously narrow, and its sides are in great part open windows. Of course the little societies had to suffer for these defects; their pianissimo passages in fact were inaudible in the middle of the hall. The larger societies fared better and their voices told splendidly. The Judges were five in number, and sat score in hand carefully noting all the points of excellence and all the defects. The points upon which they were especially required to give their critical judgment were understood to be the following:

- 1st. The difficulty of the composition sang.
- 2d. The correctness of the intonation.
- 3d. The precision in execution.
- 4th. The distinctness of pronunciation of the words.
- 5th. The holding of the tone.
- 6th. The balance and equality of the voices.
- 7th. The comprehension shown of the music.

As to the latter point, it did not require any great degree of comprehension on the part of the various societies to get at the meaning of the several composers. A glance at the programme will show how completely it is given up to little bits of musical sentiment, pretty ballads versed off and harmonized in four parts. Most of the themes were little love ditties, or else descriptions of roaming in the woods, the delights of love, and kindred subjects. Even the great Arion Society could find no fitter theme for their manly powers than the lackadaisical little "Pretty Roth Raut," and the Liederkranz exhausted the powers of its seventy-four members upon the inquiry "How came love?" A tender inquiry, in fact, which has puzzled much subtler brains than those of these honest singers; what wonder then that, though they shouted the question in the most frigid accents of their seventy-four stalwart lungs, no answer came. But something dropped at their feet in response to their exertions, much more to the purpose than the acutest analysis of the divine passion,—the first prize in fact.

While it was conceded on all sides that the Liederkranz sang their song with the utmost finish; that every accent and mark of expression, and breathing point and hold had been studied and polished to the point of perfection, it was doubted by many whether the society should have been allowed to take a prize for the second time with the same composition. The song is the same with which they bore away the first honors at the Philadelphia Festival in 1867. We should certainly have thought, even if no positive rule of the Sängerbund prevented the society from entering the lists a second time with the same song, that a sense of delicacy, or their self respect, or at least a spirit of enterprise would have spurred them on to learn another.

The second prize in this class was taken by the Junger Männerchor, of Philadelphia, with Liszt's "Midnight March," a piece which, whatever we may think of its merit, is at least of the first difficulty, and with the elaborations of which it is an honor to a club to have successfully grappled.

We are inclined to think that, had the Arion Society selected a composition of larger scope and dignity than the somewhat juvenile "Pretty Roth Raut," with which they chose to content themselves, they might have taken one or other of the prizes; as it was they sang the little song perfectly under the judicious direction of Carl Bergmann; but it fell entirely short of the first of the requirements we have above referred to.

The first prize in the second class was taken by the Hoboken Quartette Club, facile princeps; the second by the Washington Sängerbund. None of the societies in this class, however, were heard to advantage, owing, as we have said, to the size of the hall.

On Wednesday evening all the singers came together, and this time with the accompaniment of an orchestra. This was the programme:

- |   |                                |
|---|--------------------------------|
| Overture to Robespierre.....Litoff.           | The Chapel.....Bocker.         |
| By the 29 New York Societies.                 |                                |
| Sunrise.....Hamma.                            | By the United Singers.         |
| Zum Walde.....Herbeck.                        | By the Philadelphia Societies. |
| Fast Overture.....Hohnstok.                   |                                |
| Hymn.....Mohr.                                | By the United Singers.         |
| Prize Composition.....Hermann Frank.          | By the Baltimore Societies.    |
| Song of Victory of the Germans.....Franz Abt. | By the United Singers.         |

There were about a thousand in the chorus. The pieces had been very carefully rehearsed for months, and went finely. The effect of this great body of male voices, where the harmonies were so close and rich and massive, was very great. The gradations of time were splendidly managed, and in the description of "Sunrise," the transition from the quiet movement when silence brooded over the earth, through the gradual awakening of Nature, and up to the final outburst of the Sun suffusing everything in his glow, was fitly translated into tone. The grand climax at the close, where the thousand voices flung themselves fortissimo upon a fine dramatic chord, contained in it a strange element of nervous excitement sufficient to stir the most sluggish blood.

The succeeding days, Thursday and Friday, were devoted to merry-making, speech-making, open-air singing, and every festivity that the Teutonic mind could devise.

And so ended the eleventh Sängerbund. The time will perhaps one day come when Americans also can join together and enjoy themselves in a like genial manner. The great bond of sympathy and consent was music. It united them all in one great brotherhood of feeling. It is a happy sign that more and more attention is every year given among us to this class of music. Already very many of these part-songs have been translated. The old Orpheus collection, and more recently the "Arion," and the "Amphion," contain many of the best of them and have had a wide circulation. The mine however is an inexhaustible one, for nearly all the later composers have turned their talents in this direction: Mendelssohn, Schumann, Schubert, Franz, Kücken, Abt, and a hundred others.

It is but fifty years since it began even in Germany. Mendelssohn's old teacher Zelter, and Flemming gathered about them at Berlin a little club of amateurs who met but once a month. It was a renewal of, but a great improvement upon the old Meister-Sängerguild. The pieces sung were composed by the members themselves. Flemming, for instance, contributed his well known music to the Horatian Ode "Integer Vitæ." From this little germ came all these great societies that cover Germany and our own country.

Professor Tschirch was present at Baltimore, as delegate from a single Bund in Germany that consists of eighty thousand members.

In view of these facts and of the evident increase in musical taste among us, we are encouraged to hope that, at a time not remotely distant, some of this healthy German spirit may be infused into our own people, and festivals may become common among us in which song shall be the dominant element, and social intercourse and the virtues of good feeling and good fellowship be fostered under its gentle and refining influence.

Mr. F. L. Ritter in Cincinnati.

CINCINNATI, JULY 17.—In midsummer no report of concerts is expected of your correspondents; but let me chronicle a very pleasant musical episode in our life here—as a sort of Midsummer Night's Dream,—on the occasion of Mr. F. L. Ritter's visit to this his old home. Mr. Ritter is kept in very warm remembrance among a host of intimate friends here, and his genial nature readily makes new friends wherever he goes. But the intercourse with him is not only pleasant, it is instructive, elevating. He is a thinker, as well as a musician and an artist, and his thoughts are fine and discriminating. Great as his field for usefulness is in New York City, it is desirable, for the development of Music in the country at large, that his influence should extend, and his merits be more generally known and appreciated.

At the close of Mr. Ritter's visit, which has been so much enjoyed by his particular friends, the active members of our Cecilia Society, although many of them were away on summer excursions, made an effort to arrange a gathering for the purpose of meeting the founder and old valued leader of the Society. Mr. Ritter found there some old friends, but many more new faces. In introducing him to the members, the President, Mr. Garlicks, in a few words referred to Mr. Ritter's great merits in founding the Society and leading it with energy and many personal sacrifices for a number of years. He quoted Goethe's lines in "Tasso," that the place trodden by a good man is consecrated for all time, and added, that the introduction into a Society of noble principles, as in this case, the cultivation of music under its best auspices—not as a mere trifling amusement of the hour, but as a communion with the heaven-born Goddess,—is an act which must long continue to bear fruit.

Since Mr. Ritter had left Cincinnati, the Cecilia Society, in this ever changing Western community, had seen many ups and downs; but, notwithstanding all other changes, up to this very day it had continued in harmony with Mr. Ritter's musical ideas and convictions. The speaker expressed the hope, that this sympathy between them might continue to exist. He concluded by saying, that Mr. Ritter a short time ago had founded in Vassar College, on the Hudson River, among the students a "Cecilia" Society. From this he ventured to infer, that the name was dear to him; and he hoped when Mr. Ritter in his present field of activity went to meet the new "Cecilia," on the beautiful banks of the Hudson, he would remember the old "Cecilia Society," on the Ohio.

In response, Mr. Ritter in a very pleasant manner expressed his pleasure in this impromptu gathering. He said he supposed it would be of no use denying, even if he desired, his tendre for "St. Cecilia," and enjoined upon our Society to continue in their endeavors for the cultivation of good music.

The Society then sang a few Choruses; among them, as novelties, a Chorus from the German Requiem by Brahms, and two French People's Songs from the 17th Century, interspersed with solos; and at the close the intimate friends of Mr. Ritter enjoyed for many more hours happy recollections of the past.

The Organ.

[From the New York Weekly Review].

PLYMOUTH ORGAN CONCERTS—1869.

With the twenty-second concert, the last Saturday in June, closed the season of weekly organ concerts at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, whereof, as everybody knows, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher is pastor. On this occasion Mr. S. P. Warren presided. It was an overwhelming success, musically, and the house was completely crowded. These concerts have been given every Saturday, at 4 p.m., since the 30th of January. Each concert lasted about an hour. Admission prices of ten and fifteen cents, to cover expenses, were charged. The concerts were projected, to promote the taste for good organ music, and to offer to the public an opportunity of listening to the works of the best musicians—embracing the classic and romantic—performed by the most eminent organists, on one of the finest of organs. They have already done a great deal of good, and have proved, from first to last, a great success. Large, elegant, and fashionable audiences, in which ladies greatly predominated, have received them with respectful attention and favor. The following organists have performed: Messrs. John Zundel, Max Braun, F. F. Müller, V. W. Caulfield, Mrs. Marion Christopher, Messrs. Robert Elder, G. W. Morgan, Dr. P. H. Van der Weyde, Messrs. S. P. Warren, Henry G. Thunder, Dr. Clara W. Beames, Messrs. J. P. Morgan, Eugene Thayer, of Boston, and Mrs. Lillias S. Frohock, of Boston. Some of these have appeared two or three times. The programmes have generally been very fine, including classic, romantic and popular music. The popular has ranged from the popular-classic to—in a few instances—the popular-trash; but in the main the selections have been excellent. It is interesting to note how they have improved from the commencement: the classic has had a noble representation. Eleven performances of music by J. S. Bach, the great, have been given. One piece by his son, Emanuel Bach, has been performed. Beethoven, the mighty, has been heard nine times; Mendelssohn, the much loved, eleven; Handel, the grand, four; Schumann, the intellectual and imaginative, four; Father Haydn, twice; Mozart, the illustrious, once; and Weber twice. Rink, Heise, Scarlatti, Rossini, Meyerbeer, Schubert, Liszt, Wagner, Franz, Chopin, E. F. Richter, A. G. Ritter, Thiele, Herold, Auber, Suppe, Wely, Batiste, with a few others, have all been heard. Here are the programmes:

First Concert, Jan. 30th.—Organist, Mr. John Zundel, of Plymouth Church. Overture to Zampa, Herold; Trümmerli, for the soft stops, Schumann; Andante Pastoral—exhibiting the various stops and compass of the organ—Zundel; Introduction, variations, fugue, and finale, Rink.

Second, Saturday, Feb. 6th.—Organist, Mr. John Zundel. Overture to Otello, Rossini; Adagio from Sonata Pathétique, Beethoven; Solo violin, Miss Matilda E. Toedt; Allegretto, from the symphony in B flat, Haydn; Original Theme, variations and finale fugato, Zundel.

Third, Feb. 13th.—Organist, Mr. John M. Lorets, Jr. Overture, Fra Diavolo, Auber; Romanza, Symphonic, in D minor, Schumann; Selections from Trovatore, Verdi: Prelude and Fugue on Bach, Krebs; Overture, Der Freischütz, Weber.

Fourth, Feb. 20th.—Messrs. Max Braun and John Zundel. Mr. Braun performed numbers 1 and 5. Grand offertoire, Wely; Dreams, Schumann; Fugue, with three subjects and pedal obligato, Zundel; Adagio from the Fifth symphony, Beethoven; Sortie, Wely.

Fifth, Feb. 27th.—Mr. F. F. Müller, organist of the Church of the Ascension, New York. Preludium and Fugue, C minor, Bach; Rhapsodie, Spindler; Theme and Variations, Rink. Home, Sweet Home, Müller; Selections from Il Trovatore (Verdi), arranged by Müller; Overture to William Tell, Rossini.

Sixth, March 6th.—Mr. V. W. Caulfield, organist of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn. Overture, Zanetta, Auber; Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets (from St. Paul), Mendelssohn; Offertoire pastorale, Batiste; Introduction, Air and Variations, op. 47, Heise; La Carità, Rossini; Overture, Martha, Florenz; Coronation March, Meyerbeer.

Seventh, March 13th.—Mrs. Marion Christopher, organist of the Broadway Tabernacle, and Mr. G. W. Morgan, who assisted only in the four-hand piece, No. 6. Overture, La Solitaire, Carafa; a. Song without words, Mendelssohn; b. Melody, Franz; c. Fragment of Allegretto from the Eighth Symphony, Beethoven; a. Fugue, b. Toccata in D, Bach; March Solennelle, Ketterer; Parts of the Adagio from the Third Symphony, Mendelssohn; Overture to William Tell (4 hands), Rossini.

Eighth, March 20th.—Mr. Robt. Elder, the blind organist of the Sixteenth street Baptist Church, New York. Adesotes fideles, with variations, by R. Elder; Le Desir, Schubert; Prayer from Moses in Egypt (with pedal obligato), Rossini; Fugue in D, R. Elder; Organ Symphony in three movements; a. Andante Pathetic, b. Allegro Brillante, c. Tempo di Polka, R. Elder; Rondo on Theme from Allegro in William Tell, (Rossini), R. Elder; Home, Sweet Home, with variations; K. Elder.

Ninth, March 27th.—Mr. G. W. Morgan. Offertoire, Wely; Grand organ Fugue in E flat, J. S. Bach; Miserere, Verdi; Ballad, with extempore variations, G. W. Morgan; Overture to Semiramide, Rossini.

Tenth, April 3d.—Mr. John Zundel. Variations on an original theme, Köhler; Song without words (4th Book, No. 4), Mendelssohn; Larghetto from the Second Symphony, Beethoven; Grand Fugue over the name of Bach, Rink. Song without words (5th book, No. 6), Mendelssohn; Adelaide, arranged for the organ by Mr. Zundel, Beethoven; Overture to Poet and Peasant, Suppe.

Eleventh, April 10th.—Mr. Max Braun, organist of St. Francis Xavier's College, New York. Overture to Alexander's Feast, by Handel; Selections from Tannhäuser, Wagner; Scene Pastorale, Wely; Popular Melodies versus Fugue (Medley), Max Braun; Scene Funebre, Meditation Religieuse, Satter; Grand March in E flat, Wely.

Twelfth, April 17th.—G. W. Morgan. Movement from Handel's Lessons, Handel; Grand Organ Fugue in D, J. S. Bach; Miserere, Verdi; Pastorale, Kullak; Variations on a popular melody, G. W. Morgan; Overture, Der Freischütz, Weber.

Thirteenth, April 24th.—Dr. P. H. Van der Weyde, organist of the First Reformed Church, Brooklyn. Overture, Così fan tutte, Mozart; Fantaisie, E. Bach; Andante and Rondo in E, Haydn; Flute concerto, a. Allegro, b. Andante, c. Rondo, Rink; Fragments from the Fifth Symphony, Beethoven; Festival March and Trumpet Fugue, Van der Weyde.

Fourteenth, May 1st.—Mr. S. P. Warren, organist of Grace Church, New York. Sonata in E flat—Allegro Moderato, Adagio, Allegro, J. S. Bach; Toccata in F, J. S. Bach; Andante and Allegretto, Mendelssohn; Variations on an Original Theme, Thiele; Nachtgesang, Vogt; Overture, Tannhäuser, Wagner.

Fifteenth, May 8th.—Mr. H. G. Thunder, organist of St. Augustine Church, Philadelphia. Prelude and Fugue in C major, J. S. Bach; Andante and Variations, Heise; Sonata in F (in four movements), Mendelssohn; Improvisation, H. G. Thunder; Overture to Rossini's Stabat Mater, Mercadante.

Sixteenth, May 15th.—Dr. Clara W. Beames, organist of Grace Chapel, N. Y. (late of St. Bartholomew's). Andante from the first Symphony, Beethoven; Overture, Poet and Peasant, Von Suppe; a. Nocturne from Midsummer Night's Dream, b. Scherzo from Reformation Symphony (Penthamons), Mendelssohn; Selections from the Messe Solennelle, (transcribed from the score), c. Contralto Solo—O Salutaris, b. Trio—Gratias Agimus, c. Tenor Solo—Domine Deus, Rossini; Fantasia, I Puritani (transcribed from the score), Bellini; Fest March—new—Emil Naumann.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Siren Bell. 3. C to G. Weld. 30
A very charming romantic song, the words being from "Our Mutual Friend."
- Bright Eyes for me. 2. Eb to G. Rogers. 30
A very pleasing tribute to the starry eyes of "Little Daisy." Just the kind of song to be popular.
- The Old Cottage Clock. 2. F to f. Molloy. 40
Fine cozy ballad, in which the "tick, tick" of the old timekeeper said "go to bed!" which was welcome, but also in the morning, "out of bed, out of bed!" which was not so fine.
- Put it down to me. Gatty. 35
The doings of a young swell who goes everywhere "on tick," quite amusing to him and the audience, but not so much so to his victims in the story.

Instrumental.

- Twelve Drawing Room Studies. Kake, et. 40
These are admirable instructive pieces, combining useful exercises in such a way as to ornament the transcriptions of popular melodies, all of which, thus arranged, are quite taking as pieces. Of these, in the present issue, are to be noticed:
- Study on Staccato. Ellis d'Amore. 4. F.
" Legato. Oft in the still night. 4. Bb.
" Repeated Notes. 'T were vain to tell. 3. G.
" the Shake. Robin Adair. 3. F.
" the Scales. Blue Bell of Scotland. 3. G.
" Grace Notes. My Lodging is on. 3. Bb.
All show good taste in the arrangement. Quite a treat for teachers and learners. The Romance from "Joseph" noticed last time, also belongs to the set.
- Idylles Elegantes. Ingraham, each. 40
Bird of the Wilderness. (L'Oiseau des Bois).
4. Eb.
Mountain Song. (Chanson de la Montagne).
3. C.
The last has a light flowing style, and does not call for much exertion to play it; a good quality in hot weather. The first is an elegant bird song. Both have pleasing melodies.
- Carnival of Venice. For Guitar. Hayden. 25
Well-known air, well-arranged.
- Shooting Star Redowa. 3. A. Sanderson. 35
Very neat and pretty.
- Up in a Balloon Schottisch. 3. G. Roe. 40
The Balloon does not yet seem to come down from its elevation in popular favor. A fine schottisch.
- Sounds from the Vienna Woods Waltzes. 3. Strauss. 75
Unusually good set of waltzes, introduced by music appropriate to the woodlands; bugle sounds, &c.
- Potpouri from La Dame Blanche. Wels. 75
Melodies from this very favorite opera.
- Rippling Waves Polka. 3. F. Thurston. 30
Remarkably sweet melody. Don't fail to hear it.
- Les Folies. Allegro Galop. 3. Ab. Ketterer. 60
May almost be called a young Tarantelle, it is so rapid and full of life. It is, however, too sweet and gliding to merit the title fully.

Books.

- THE CHORAL TRIBUTE. By L. O. Emerson. A Collection of New Music for Choirs, Singing Schools and Conventions. 1.50
Stress is laid on the word new in the advertisement. There is really no old music in the book, with the exception of the few Congregational tunes at the end. It contains the usual elementary course, a large number of tunes, and good collection of new anthems and set pieces for practice. Its sale will no doubt immediately mount up among the forty or fifty thousands, like that of its predecessors.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c., A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MEMO BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four copies, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

The bubbles break to kiss her feet,
She sits and combs her yellow hair,
And sings, whose song is all too sweet;
And smiles, whose face is all too fair.

For some have said: "Though cold the Rhine,
O love, my heart had colder been,
Craved not my lips the touch of thine,
Despite the wave that slips between!"

So, dreaming still of life and light,
They die: The siren sings the while,
And faces drifting dead and white
Bring no regret unto her smile.

And still serenely bends the blue
O'er hills that blossom all around;
But never blossoms life anow
Unto the souls that she has bound.

The Musical Drama and the Works of Richard Wagner.

II.

FROM THE FRENCH OF EDOUARD SCHURK.

At last the artist's perseverance was crowned with success. Good news in two forms reached him; Rienzi was accepted at the Theatre in Dresden, the Phantom Ship at Berlin. He left Paris and hastened to Dresden. Rienzi obtained a brilliant success, and brought to the composer the position of Kapellmeister of the court. The victory was as unexpected as brilliant. In a single day the young composer, obscure and solitary up to his twenty-eighth year, had become famous. Here is an established reputation, a fortune secured, the new friends thought, who crowded about him. They were greatly deceived, the real struggle was about to commence. Ah! doubtless, if he had been willing still to walk in the beaten paths as he had done in Rienzi, actors, directors, the public, and the critics, would have all been on his side; but to attack the theatre with his radical reforms, to revolutionize the opera, to insist that the singers should also be capable of acting, should be more enthusiastic over their rôles than over their solos, to demand of the public to take more interest in the work itself than in its accessories, in the characters than in the Prima Donna's voice, in the idea than in the ballet, this was to quarrel with everybody at once, for it was running a tilt against all previous opinion; it was to make an attack upon Fashion, and to undermine her temple at its very base. Naturally war at once broke out. The unfavorable reception of the Phantom Ship at Berlin would have discouraged any artist less conscientious in his reforms; but Wagner neither acted from theory nor from plan. The enthusiasm which drew him to a new subject, dictated to him the form which his work should assume. Let us do him justice; success in itself he has never sought; and if he has at times defended his ideal with too great harshness, he has never under any temptations deserted it for a moment.

At this period he composed the work in which his peculiarities are most strongly exhibited. I refer to the Tannhäuser. It was not accident which led him to the choice of this legendary subject. He had already discovered in the popular mythology the real domain of his art, and he went on conquering. For most people the knightly poet of the Wartburg, beguiled into the grottoes of Venus, is but a phantom of the middle ages, revived they know not why. Thus to judge of this creation, is to see but its outside shell. To the attentive listener this personage is far other than a Primo Tenore singing sweet solos and successful in the cavatina. Tannhäuser, who, out of the enervating pleasure which entralls him, yet aspires upward to the pain and the bliss of Love in its purity, Tannhäuser, who breaks away from the snares of Venus to find again his heaven in Elizabeth's presence, this fiery poet lover, who takes captive and fires with love the innocent maiden, but who fatally betrays himself in the musical contest, when, carried away by passion, against his will he extols the heathen divinity, this man with heart divided between the madness of passion, and the pure ecstasies of sentiment, is he but a legendary creature drawn from the dusty pages of an old chronicle? Ah no! under the knightly mantle is a living man, one who is of ourselves and of our own time. He is one of those creatures of the popular imagination which, now transfigured by the double magic of poetry and music, is destined in its grand and simple outlines to remain one of the great types of human life and action, which all can understand and which is eloquent to all. Nor does the intense life which animates Tannhäuser himself flow with any less vivid reality in the veins of Venus and of Elizabeth. These two figures represent the two contrasted forms of feminine nature; on one side all the seductions of passion in its most subtle and tempting forms; on the other maidenly purity, heroic tenderness, love, rejoicing in self-devotion and self-sacrifice. Tannhäuser bears in his heart these two emotions; he would gladly live in these two distinct worlds, and the strife which at last destroys him is the theme of the drama. Grand figures broadly sketched, powerfully dramatic effects, the interest concentrated upon the action, the catastrophe not growing out of an intrigue, but out of the character of the hero, finally, a charm of poetry flooding all the story:—in this consists the originality of this opera, and its claim to be regarded truly as a great musical drama.

In being thus subordinate to poetry, music, far from losing anything, acquires a new force of persuasion. The novelty consists especially in a dramatic declamation, so to speak, equally removed from ordinary recitatif, and from the traditional air with its unfailing ritournelle and the inevitable final cadence. Composers have felt themselves obliged to represent the different steps of a scene in lyric form by a series of airs, cavatinas and duos. The lover declares his passion: first air; he becomes sentimental: romance; he becomes excited: bravours; he is heard and answered: duo. So many detached morceaux. The musician expresses only the culminating points of action. The series of intermediate sentiment, the flux and reflux of soul which drives man to speech or action is quite neglected. Thus lyric effects are frequently admirable, but there is little unity. Richard Wagner, on the contrary, is persuaded that music joined to poetry has a power of expression as varied and infinite as poetic thought itself. These are two things, he says: the lyric composition, where the soul returns upon itself, rests and is cradled in a single sentiment; and a scene upon the stage, where many souls strive together and act and re-act upon each other. There should then be expressed the very movement, the irresistible progression of sentiment and passions from their mysterious genesis to their most intense manifestation. So the melody goes on, free from any restraint, but striking and rhythmic according to the degree of emotion. Instead of a cadence at the end and falling back upon the tonique, it is developed, is unrolled and broadened to suit the words; sometimes it is broken up in the heat of dialogue; at each new phase of ideas and sentiments which may possess the dramatis personæ, it is thrown into a new tone, rapid and free as thought itself.*

* In this, Wagner is the faithful disciple and intelligent follower of Gluck. "I sought," says Gluck, "to bring music into its true place, that is, to come to the aid of poetry, to strengthen the expression of sentiments, and the interest of situations, without interrupting the action or retarding it by superfluous ornament. I believe that music ought to add to poetry exactly what color and the effects of light and shade add to a correct and well-constructed outline, animating the figures without at all altering their contours." Is Wagner then a copyist of Gluck? His adversaries have not left it unsaid: but to hear one of his morceaux is to be convinced of the contrary. By himself, by his own efforts, he has arrived at the musical drama, and he has gone far beyond his predecessor. Nothing in his music recalls the methods of the author of Iphigenia. The two composers are alike only in accepting as their rule the principle above named, they differ widely in the results they draw from it. To name one, Gluck retains the recitatif and the air in their strict form; Wagner frees himself from both and replaces them by the mi-loupé, dramatic, rhythmic, and strengthened by characteristic harmony. Hence this capital difference exists: in Gluck's compositions each air forms a complete whole; in those of Wagner, the musical unity is in the entire scene, and that itself is but a part in the great unity of the drama.

The Female Voice of the Period.

(From the Evening Bulletin, Philadelphia.)

An excellent thing in woman is a voice soft, gentle and low. Shakespeare said so, and it is repeated here boldly and defiantly, in the very teeth of those of the sex who would claim the right to a barytone along with the right of suffrage. The subject of the cultivation of the speaking voice has not been sufficiently considered in any part of the United States, and the consequence is that American women, and especially the existing young American girls, are most of them, talking with a hard nasal twang that is torture to a fine ear for the best of all music, that of a pure, good, refined woman's voice. In old times the nasal quality was attributed especially to New England women, and the consequence has been that New England women have been educated out of the vicious habit of their mothers and grandmothers, and now there is no sweeter voice heard than that of a cultivated, refined woman of Boston or of any of the larger Yankee cities.

The "twang," exiled from Yankee land, seems to have taken up its abode in Pennsylvania, and is conspicuous in Philadelphia. The manner in which many of the young women, and some too of the young men, talk about walking "deown teown," and of going "he-er" and "they-er," is so dreadfully shocking, that the New Englanders, purged of their faulty provincialisms, turn the laugh on us. There are many mere vices of phrase, of pronunciation, of accent and of inflexion, that educated strangers visiting Philadelphia are apt to remark in the conversation of the young women. But the worst vice of all, and the hardest to correct, is that of the metallic, rasping, high-pitched voice, which is heard even among the school-girls, and which is aggravated in maturity. The one redeeming trait of some of the English burlesque actresses that have visited this country lately, is said to be the delicious quality of their voices in speaking. A student of language and the voice mentions in a magazine article one of them "whose speech is vocal velvet." It may be something in the climate, but it is more probably something in the education, that makes an Englishwoman's voice in speaking more musical than an American woman's. The improvement of the voice of the New England women, however, shows that there is nothing in our climate to destroy the best qualities of the voice. The bad voice all results from bad habits and careless training.

There is a certain vulgarity about the ordinary tone of most of the young women of the period in America that is very repellant to a sensitive ear, a custom to a different tone. Words of encouragement, of hope, of consolation, uttered in such a voice, sound like a burlesque. As for words of love, it does not seem possible that, in such tones as are the habit of the time and the place, they could ever create a good impression. Mothers, fathers and school teachers in Philadelphia should unite in an endeavor to reform the bad tone and the bad inflexions of the voices of their growing young girls. If they do not, the satirists and the playwrights of other cities will take up the Philadelphia woman's peculiarities of speech, and will ridicule them, as the peculiarities of the Yankee have been ridiculed. This will eventually effect a reform; but it is much better that the reform should begin before it becomes sufficiently established to create a type for ridicule on the stage. The culture of the voice in speaking ought to be made a part of the training in every girls' school in the country. In that way our women will soon come up to the standard of voice of the educated New England woman, and eventually to the higher standard of the educated woman of old England.

German Fiction.

(From the American Booksellers' Guide.)

Longfellow, writing in 1845, remarks that what Thomas Fuller said of the Bible may also be said of German literature: "Wherever its surface does not laugh and sing with corn, there the heart thereof within is merry with mimos affording hidden mysteries." But it must be confessed, as the same author adds, that until recently a great portion of the English speaking public have perceived only the hidden mysteries and not the laughing corn of German literature.

From 1770 to the present time, the last hundred years is the most important period of German literary history; illustrious with the names of Herder, Wieland, Goethe, Schiller and many others. This period is usually divided into three subdivisions, the third of which, the period from 1825 to the present, in Germany, as elsewhere, may be termed the period of the novelists.

Roscoe, in the introduction to his work on the earlier German novelists, says: "It is well-known, indeed, that no nation is more attached to this class of compositions, both in a poetical and prosaic form, while no country can boast of writers who have more abundantly produced, or more zealously treasured them up." In his work, Roscoe includes sketches of Gotschalk, Eberhardt, Busching, Grimm, Lothar, La Motte Fouqué, Musaeus, Schiller, Tieck, Langbein and Engel. These, with the author of Wilhelm Meister, and Wieland, constitute the early writers of fiction in Germany. With the works of La Motte Fouqué, the American public have long been familiar. Undine and Sintram were published by Geo. P. Putnam more than twenty years ago; and Thiodolf, the Icelanders, by John Wiley, about the same time. In various forms they have passed through many editions. When first published they were among the most popular books in America, and by their purity, power, and delightful fancy, they have kept a high place in popular estimation up to the present moment. The tales of Musaeus, Tieck, and the Brothers Grimm, have been translated in many languages, and have achieved a world-wide reputation. They please old and young alike. In a style that is simple and natural they mingle the sweets of pleasing narrative and fanciful romance. In tales for children these German writers are rivalled only by their Danish brothers, Hans Andersen and Bjornson. Schiller and Goethe are the great names in the literature of Germany of this period. Goethe's Wilhelm Meister has had probably a greater influence upon modern German novelists than any other work. It is familiar to English and American readers in the translation of Thomas Carlyle. It is chief among the class, if not the progenitor of the class, of modern novels less interesting as stories, than as vehicles of information and reflections on the various subjects that come within the compass of the term Art. Mr. Lewes says, very justly, that no writer with a wholesome fear of critics before his eyes, would have dared to mystify the public as Goethe did in his Wilhelm Meister. The German critics think a novel an occasion for philosophizing, and they go so deeply into its inner meanings that they have no time left to consider the execution, the artistic value, and the incidents of the story. So we find that German novelists too frequently become involved in theories at the expense of action. But, in the later novels, there is great improvement in this respect. As the practical realistic spirit which characterizes the public life of the English and the French becomes diffused in Germany, writers of fiction abridge more and more their metaphysical and philosophical theorizing and substitute that life-like delineation of character and manners which constitutes the particular excellence of the best modern romances.

Of the later novelists of Germany, whose works have been translated and published in America, the first whom we shall mention is Sealsfield, whose Takeah; or, The White Rose, was translated and published in Philadelphia in 1828. Sealsfield afterwards visited the United States, and upon his return published several novels of American life and character, somewhat in the style of Cooper. Of these, Life in the New World; or, Sketches of American Society, was translated and published by J. Winchester in 1844. Flirtation in America and Sketches of Life in Texas were also translated and published here, but they did not enjoy the same popularity as in Germany.

A volume of tales by J. H. D. Zachokke was translated by Parke Benjamin and published by Wiley & Putnam in 1844. D. Appleton & Co. have published a translation of one of his tales entitled The Dead Guest, within a few weeks. This writer is very popular in Germany, where J. Ross Browne says his works are read by all classes.

Frederick Gerstaecker was in the United States last year for the third time. He has travelled extensively in other countries, and the results of his experience and observation he has embodied in his novels, which have been translated into several languages. A translation of his Wanderings and Fortunes of some German Emigrants was published by D. Appleton & Co., in 1848; Wild Sports of the West, by T. B. Peterson, in 1851; A Journey Round the World, by Harper & Brothers, in 1853; Pirates of the Mississippi, by Robert M. De Witt, in 1856, and How a Bride was Won; or, a Chase across the Pampas, published by D. Appleton & Co. in January of this year, is fresh in the minds of our readers.

Jean Paul Richter was first introduced to American readers by a translation of his Flower, Fruit and Thorn Pieces, published by J. Munroe & Co. in 1852. Walt and Vult; or, The Twins, was translated and published about the same time. In 1862, his great work, the Titan, was published by Ticknor & Fields, and was followed by his Lerana in 1863, Campaner Thal in 1864, and Hesperus in 1865. We shall not dwell upon the superlative merits of Jean Paul. His imagination, eloquence, intensity, humor, tenderness, and withal his strong individuality have given him a unique place in German literature.

L. Schefer's Artist's Married Life, Being that of Albert Durer, was published in a translation by James Munroe in 1848. In the year 1851 Burgess & Garrett published in New York a translation of Carl Spindler's novel, The Invalid; or, Pictures of the French Revolution. The Nun, by the same author, was then published by R. M. De Witt, and The Jew by Harper & Brothers. Heine's Pictures of Travel, translated by the author of Hans Breitmann, was published in Philadelphia in 1852. Hoffmann's wild tales were translated and published under the title of Strange Stories in 1855. Fanny Lawald's Lake House was translated by Nathaniel Greene, and published by Ticknor & Fields in 1857. William Hauff's Arabian Day's Entertainments was published in Philadelphia in 1859. This delightful writer died young, but not before he had gathered several sheaves of ripened grain from the rich fields of his imagination. One of these is the Arabian Day's Entertainments; another will soon be presented to the American public in a collection of his tales, translated and published in the Tauchnitz edition, by Leypoldt & Holt.

We come now to F. W. Hackländer. "Hackländer," Alison, in his History of Europe, says, "unites in himself several of the most striking qualities of our great contemporary novelists. His most celebrated work, the Europäische Sklavenleben, is intended to exhibit a picture of all stages of society, from the cellars through the saloon to the garret, in order to prove that all classes have their own fetters, that the conventional claims of civilized life are even more galling than the rude fetters of the African. His picture of the ballet-dancers, and their fearful subjection to the caprices of the public; of the ardent and impassioned baron; of the restraints, dullness, and etiquette of the grand ducal courts, and of the licentious life of the robbers, cannot be exceeded in fidelity and force of drawing." This work was translated and published in England, and the English translation was republished here by Harper & Brothers under the title of Clara; or, Slave Life in Europe, in 1856. A translation of another work by Hackländer will soon be published by Harper & Brothers, entitled Behind the Counter.

Gustav Freytag ranks even higher than Hackländer. Chevalier Bunsen, in a preface to the English translation of Freytag's Debit and Credit, published in 1858, by Harper & Brothers, speaking of the enthusiastic reception of this novel in Germany, says: "The favor of the public has certainly been obtained in great measure by the rare intrinsic merit of the composition, in which we find thoroughly artistic conception, lifelike portraiture, and highly cultivated literary taste. The author, a man about fifty years of age, and by birth a Silesian, is editor of the Border Messenger, a highly esteemed political and literary journal, published in Leipzig. Growing up amid the influences of a highly cultivated family circle, and having become an accomplished philologist, he early acquired valuable life experience, and formed distinguished social connections. He also gained reputation as an author by skillfully arranged dramatic compositions—the weak point of the modern German school." The strong point of Debit and Credit is its vivid realism. Almost all the characters have something to do, and they never let the reader fall asleep when they are really in action. A new edition of this novel was published by Harper & Brothers in 1868, and The Lost Manuscript by the same author has been published by D. Appleton & Co. within a few days.

The first translation from the works of Berthold Auerbach was published in America by Harper & Brothers. It was one of his shorter stories entitled The Professors' Lady. One of his village stories was published in Philadelphia, by F. W. Thomas, in 1858. The Barefooted Maiden and Joseph in the Snow were published by James Munroe in 1859. From this time until the publication of On the Heights in the Tauchnitz edition by Leypoldt & Holt in March 1867, nothing appeared in English translation from the works of Auerbach. In March 1868, Roberts Brothers, of Boston, issued the first American edition of On the Heights, which was a reprint of the Tauchnitz edition then before the public. In this novel Auerbach bridged over the chasm between village and town life, to the former of which he had previously principally confined himself. Although On the Heights is generally regarded as a political novel, and the tyranny of court etiquette is unmercifully satirized, and the sin which he attacks is placed upon the shoulders of royalty, yet in reality it deals with universal human nature. He has always looked on the world as more or less out of joint, and he has always shown the opinion when he has left the villages of the Black Forest for a more animated life. And even in describing the village life of the Black Forest he is neither contented nor idyllic. Julian Schmidt, the historian of German literature, says of Auerbach: "The effort of his village stories is not particularly cheerful. He does not present country life in its quiet enjoyment but in its internal discussions. The atmosphere in which we breathe is not thoroughly healthy, and it is a question, if poetry has a right to represent exceptional cases, as if they formed the rule." These Black Forest village stories have been recently published in a translation by Leypoldt & Holt. Despite the criticisms we have quoted, we find these stories of very happy life, entirely fresh and original, and told in a perfectly unaffected manner. Edelweiss, another of his village stories, has been published by Roberts Brothers. Still more recently we have Auerbach's latest work, The Villa on the Rhine, complete from the press of Leypoldt & Holt, and from Roberts Brothers, Boston. In this work Auerbach may be said to give a complete philosophy of life. In order to set this forth clearly, the author introduces two or three characters who illustrate his conception of a noble humanity, and others who serve as foils. The idea of character and life which Auerbach thus develops is one of lofty morality and reason. His hero is a young man, who, through many temptations and failures, approaches perfection by being always true to himself—one of the chief ends of a philosophical being. Auerbach, Bayard Taylor informs us, was born in poverty and obscurity, in the little village of Nordstetten, on the Suabian side of the Black Forest, on the 28th of February, 1812. His parents, being Jews, were inspired by the signs of the active and impressive intellect which he showed as a child, and devoted him to the study of Hebrew theology. This he gradually neglected for philosophy, history, and literature. Although but little known to American readers before the publication of On the Heights, his has been a favorite name in Germany for thirty years. He is one of the small number of authors who have risen prominently above that dead level of elegant mediocrity which has been the affliction of German literature in our generation. Auerbach was unable to find a publisher for his first novel, and had to issue it finally at his own expense. He has still in his possession the rather disdainful letters with which the publishers to whom he sent the manuscript of his work returned it.

The first of the Muhlbach novels were published by S. H. Goetz, in Mobile, Alabama, and bore the notice of copyright, secured in the "Confederate States." The particular works thus published were Joseph II. and his Court and The Merchant of Berlin. They were printed on very coarse paper, with wall-paper covers. One or two copies of these works slipped through the blockade, and were brought North and shown around as curiosities. The works were first offered to Sheldon & Co., and not accepted by them, to D. Appleton & Co., who republished them, and fourteen other works by the same author, in English translations, with brilliant success. D. Appleton & Co. have sold upwards of three hundred thousand volumes of the Muhlbach novels. It is stated that the author has not reached her enviable position by any adventitious circumstances, but by a course of long and arduous study; and the success of her books in America is mainly due to their historical character, gratifying as they do our Republican curiosity as to the private life of kings and queens. In Carlyle's estimate of Sir Walter Scott's novels, he said that he thought that the ultimate judgment of the world would be that the Wizard of the North had breathed the breath of life into history. This, in a measure, is applicable to Louisa Muhlbach. Harper & Brothers have published one novel by Miss Muhlbach, and one or two have been published by other houses; but the supply is not yet exhausted.

Before mentioning Dingelstedt, Spielhagen, and Herman Schmid, we must refer to a number of translations of excellent German novels, by various authors, that have been published in the United States within a year or two. John Milton and his Times, by Max Ring, recently translated into Italian, and published in Milan; Baumarchais, an historical novel, by A. G. Brachvogel; and Count Mirabeau, by Theodore Mundt, husband of Louisa Muhlbach, all published by D. Appleton & Co. Ida Hahn-Hahn's Eudoria, a novel of strong Catholic tendency, published by Kelly, Piet & Co.; Mulame de Saad, by Amely Boelte, published by George P. Putnam & Son; Joseph Von Eichendorff's Memoirs of a Good-for-Nothing, a naive and charming book translated by Charles G. Leland; In the Year '13, by Fritz Reuter; Immen-See, by Theodore Storm; and L'Arabiata and Other Tales, by Paul Heyse, all published by Leypoldt & Holt. The Old Mamselle's Secret and Gold Elsie, by E. Marlitt, published by J. B. Lippincott & Co., in 1868, enjoyed a very great popularity in this country. A recent Paris paper says: "Miss John, whose nom de plume is 'E. Marlitt,' is now the most popular female novelist in Germany." A new work by this writer is announced by both J. B. Lippincott & Co., and George P. Putnam and Son. We are informed that Putnam & Son will publish the work by arrangement with the author.

Franz Dingelstedt is a German name, new both in England and America. The publication of a translation of his work, The Amazon, by G. P. Putnam & Son introduced the author to both countries. Shortly after its publication, the book was reviewed in the North British Review, in an elaborate article of over twenty pages in length. It has also been the subject of favorable notices in the London Athenium and the best American literary journals. The North British Reviewer says of it: "The events of the story occupy only three days; but in that brief period there is compressed enough of variety and excitement to satisfy any reasonable taste. And with all this, there is nothing sensational or spasmodic. We meet absolutely no villains or reprobates, only pleasant and cultivated society, with just enough of frailty and unheroic qualities to give reality and the piquancy of contrast. We find strong and natural feeling, contending interests and passions, delicate and difficult situations, sparkling dialogue, graphic description, all irradiated by the light of genuine humor and wit." It belongs to the same class of novels as Wilhelm Meister—the Art novel—but the author's knowledge of the world in addition to his special experience in the world of Art, has enabled him to give breadth and tone to his pictures, which add greatly to their truthfulness and interest.

Frederick Spielhagen's Problematic Characters, recently published by Leypoldt & Holt, in a translation by Prof. Schele de Vere, appeared in Germany in 1861. It was the author's first large romance, and immediately gave him a great reputation. The following motto from Goethe, placed on the title-page, gives an idea of the character of the work: "There are problematic characters who are not equal to any situation in which they are placed, and for whom no situation is good enough. A fearful conflict results therefrom, which consumes life without enjoyment." With this central thought, Spielhagen has written a tale full of poetry and psychological interest. Psychological truth is never violated. The principal personages live before us, and fix our interest. He makes no use of improbable coincidences; nor is the reader kept on the tender hooks of suspense whilst the intricacies of a plot are unravelled. A writer in the Westminster Review for October, 1868, says: "To Spielhagen's glowing descriptions of nature a true poetical charm is given. In this respect, they may be said to occupy a happy position between the vague and shadowy pictures formerly met with in German romances, and the photographic realism or word-painting, so wearisome to readers of taste, in many of our modern English novels. With a skillful hand he paints the tender emotions and longings of the heart. Throughout, the interest in his stories is generally well sustained. In agreement with German critics, we consider Problematic Characters to be the most interesting and poetical of the author's productions." From the same critic we gather that Spielhagen was born in Magdeburg, in 1829, and is the son of a Prussian functionary of considerable rank. His youth was passed in the romantic old town of Stralsund. In 1847, he went to the University of Berlin, but subsequently removed to Bonn. Whilst at these Universities, he appears to have studied a variety of subjects, but discursively, as his poetical vein and thirst for observation of actual life seem to have disqualified him for any regular profession. In 1860, he went to Hanover, where he married; and the following year he removed to Berlin, where he has since resided, displaying great activity in connection with a leading periodical, and as a romance writer.

The latest German novel published in English translation in America is The Habermaster, by Herman Schmid, issued, within a few days, from the press of Leypoldt & Holt. Herman Schmid is very popular in Germany, especially in Bavaria, of which country he is a native. His subjects are chiefly drawn from Bavarian life and history. From a German newspaper correspondent we learn the following interesting particulars of Schmid's history. He was born in 1815, in Waizenkirch, where his father occupied the position of County Judge of a Bavarian circuit. After an excellent education at the Gymnasium, Schmid studied law at Munich, and became a Doctor of Laws, and Secretary of the Police Court. He was afterwards promoted to a judgeship, from which he was displaced in 1854, on account of his political and religious opinions, which had rendered him obnoxious in 1848. Speaking of the circumstance to the correspondent before mentioned, he said: "I am not the only one whom the flood of 1848 has raised and cast aside. They have torn me from a noble career, and set me aside in the ripened powers of manhood; but I do not let my wings droop on that account. I thought it better to make use of the leisure to which I was enforced, and it has turned out that what was intended for an evil has resulted in good. Every man has his 'storm and stress' period; mine has taught me to be circumspect and to work." His industry is very great, and he at one time had the idea of representing the history of Bavaria in a connected series of novels and dramas, which it seems that he has abandoned; for he says: "What I have written may serve as honorable fragments of what I intended. I can well say that I wrote them from my heart; that I set down in them what I hoped the people, the whole German people, might attain—liberty in life and estate, intelligence and energy of spirit, wisdom and culture for the dissipation of prejudice."

Some few other German novels have been published in translations, and some have been imported in sheets from Germany and England, as Dr. Goethe's Courtship, by George Routledge & Sons; but our review includes all the more important works and writers of German fiction with which the American public is familiar. Although in other departments of literary activity the Germans hold a first position, in novel writing they do not appear to the same advantage. The novel has not enlisted the same class of writers in Germany as in some other countries; nevertheless, a good number of the German writers we have mentioned would rank high in any land.

Tonic Sol-Fa Pretensions.

(From the "Musician," London.)

A request boldly put to the Government by the promoters of this system of printing and teaching music called the Tonic Sol-fa method—that their plan should be admitted in National Schools and recognized as a teaching of music for the purposes of the Educational Code—deserves a notice which is not often given to the claims put forward from the same quarter. The musical profession in England are too little conscious of any inroad made upon the standard notation to have troubled themselves hitherto with the assertions of the earnest and able but fanciful men who imagine that a complicated art language is to be learnt more easily in one alphabet than in another; when, however claims are put forward in official quarters such as those urged by the recent Tonic Sol-fa deputation on the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, it seems time to abandon a policy of silent disregard.

The Tonic Sol-faists, many of our readers may know, are a body of men, chiefly connected with Nonconformity and the education of the lowest classes, who adopt, as a means of printing and teaching music, a series of symbols in which pitch is ignored, and scale relationship expressed irrespectively of the gravity or acuteness of the key-note. Thus, "God save the Queen" would be shown in five or six different keys, by the same signs, the actual pitch or key being indicated by a preliminary intimation, "Key A," "Key G," or, "Key F," as the case may be. Various advantages are claimed for this method by its supporters, who usually allude to the system so familiar to the rest of the musical world as "the old notation," and not unfrequently disavow a belief that this "old notation" has been seriously encroached upon by the growth of their own plan, and is certainly destined, in time, to be superseded by it. In this happy confidence we might be content to leave them without remark, were it not quite within the bounds of possibility that silence on the part of the musical profession might be taken, in the presence of such a prominent self-assertion as the Tonic Sol-faists have just made, to imply acquiescence in the pretensions they put forward.

A first question asked in dealing with this matter ought to be: In what respect does the standard notation fail in its purpose? Its immense prevalence, its coincidence with civilization itself, ought to give it a claim, at least, not to be lightly disturbed. The main charges brought against it, we believe, by the Tonic Sol-fa, and other ists—for musical dissent, as well as theological, is many-headed—are two. There is first the theoretical objection, that it is not based upon key relationship; and secondly, it is averred as a practical consideration that children cannot be so easily taught to sing by it as by a tonic notation.

As regards the idea that the tonic system of notation is truer to the facts of music, in having itself upon key relationship, we may remark that it seems to have been lost sight of by the Tonic Sol-faists that, if key-relationship is a fact, pitch is another. A notation which ignores pitch is surely open to the charge of theoretical imperfection. The standard notation, moreover, not only definitely, by its every jot and tittle, expresses that actual pitch which is so paramount an element in musical effect, but it expresses, whatever may be said to the contrary, the same facts of key-relationship as the notation which is put forward as theoretically superior. It seems to be assumed by many adherents of the new method, that singers from the standard notation read music by intervals from note to note. There may be those who do this, but we believe that ninety nine out of every hundred of a chorus, say at the Handel Festival, read as much from mental reference to key as any Tonic Sol-faist. And in doing this they are not hindered, but helped, by the fact that the key-note falls in a position on the staff which indicates its pitch, and thus serves to keep alive the mental reference to

it. Certainly no thoughtful choralist, capable of mentally grasping the relationship of sounds to their tonic, fails to feel out key-relationship in the end; we think, indeed, it would be difficult to go through the first part of Mr. Hullah's book of instruction without acquiring, consciously or unconsciously, the same habit of mental reference to the tonic as is more directly taught in the Tonic Sol-fa system.

As regards the claim that youthful learners find a tonic notation easier than the standard method, we are at a loss to conceive its possibility. In one case we have a series of seven symbols standing as a line of print, and indicating the various degrees of a scale by difference of shape: in the other we have one symbol placed in seven different positions on a ladder, and indicating the degrees of the scale by difference of position. That the former should prove more comprehensible than the latter is simply incredible.

Let us pass on to another stage. Having mastered the scale in a tonic system, the learner, it may be assumed, can sing simple tunes in any key equally well, the notation he follows being absolutely irrespective of key. At a corresponding stage, the learner of the ordinary notation stands, it may be thought, at a disadvantage. Not in the least. Express in the key of C, with standard notation, all the tunes which the Tonic Sol-faist can sing, and it is obvious that the ordinary pupil will render them just as easily, having been given the pitch which may be required to place the tune in its actual key. The one, in fact, will find no possible difficulty which will not occur in the path of the other, and both have acquired precisely the same power.

There is coming, however, a time of trouble for both. In the standard notation the pupil must learn to substitute other notes than C for the foundation of his scale, while the follower of the new method, at the first piece of music which takes a decided turn in modulation, must also shift his standard, or lose sight altogether of that key relationship which is supposed to be his special pole-star. Much is made by the adherents of the Tonic Sol-fa system of their success in teaching small people a quantity of small music; but there is a skeleton in the cupboard; let those who doubt it call for and duly scan for a few minutes the contrivance called by the followers of the new method a "modulator." We challenge any competent person to say whether the difficulty in the standard notion of learning to look upon other notes than C as keynotes is or is not greater than that of mastering the many complications which come into requisition in tonic systems directly the learner has to grapple with music which involves modulation.

The truth of the whole matter is probably this. The mental effort of learning music thoroughly is equal on any system of notation, taking it all in all, but it may be possible in some measure to discount progress by a process which has to be paid for afterwards. Under this view it may be admitted that to give a stupid boy a smattering of music there is perhaps nothing like the Tonic system. In saying this we would guard ourselves emphatically against being supposed to imply that a smattering is a characteristic of the Tonic Sol-fa teachers. So far is this from being the case that we believe more thorough graspers of the significance of musical notation than the leading men who have gathered round Mr. Curwen are not to be found. They teach with a zeal and completeness which we have more than once had occasion to mention with admiration. More of their success is due to these qualities, we think, and to the admirable methodical way in which their curriculum has been laid out, than to anything which may be found in the system they use.

Much has been said of the typographical convenience of the Tonic Sol-fa tongue. It is, however, generally overlooked that the specimens of the new symbols which we see are for the most part representations of simple compositions. In presenting four-part voice music to the eye, no doubt the new alphabet has the advantage in conciseness; but how will the matter stand in representing music for the orchestra? Possibly there may still remain a saving of paper to be placed to the credit of the innovators. In connection with this point, we admit, we are not prepared to state how far towards the complete representation of instrumental music Mr. Curwen and his supporters have succeeded in carrying their plan: we have, however, grave suspicion that the difficulties which gather in this direction are practically insuperable, and that in this point as in teaching, if anything is gained at first by the new notation it has to be paid for in the end.

To give an official sanction to the Tonic or any other than the catholic method of noting music we do not hesitate to say, then, would be a most uncalled-for step on the part of the Educational Committee. We utterly doubt its alleged simplicity, taken as a whole; and we believe that the results so emphatically claimed for it are the results not of a superior system, but of the zeal of neophytes, and the wisdom with which that zeal is directed by the leaders of the movement. But even if we grant that the method which has just taken so aggressive an attitude is an effectual contrivance for discounting progress in learning to sing—this being open, as we have already said, to more than doubt—the Vice-President of the Committee of Privy Council on Education should pause, we think, before, for the sake of a supposed gain in giving National schoolboys a smattering of psalmody, he assists in inflicting the curse of Babel on the only existing language which has the slightest claim to be called universal.

Albert Grisar.*

The death of this musician has cast quite a gloom over the musical world, and the heart-rending circumstances which marked the end of his life render still more painful the impression produced. We think it becoming not to make ourselves the echo of everything which is said on the subject, and shall limit ourselves simply to such facts as are duly substantiated. On Tuesday morning the 15th June, Albert Grisar was found dead, from the effect of an apoplectic stroke, in the small furnished room which he occupied at Asnières. Some of his friends saw him the previous day on the Boulevard des Italiens, when, as they say, he was in good spirits.—He may have been so, for an instant, perhaps, but we know that, for some years, he had led a life of disappointments and of shattered hopes, a life which had at length culminated in deep distress. He frequently had recourse to the kindness of his friends, and the non-success of L'Eau Merveilleuse, when revived at the Athénée, ruined his pecuniary calculations at the same time that it inflicted a mortal wound upon his self-esteem as an artist.

Grisar was without family here, if we except a god son, whose uncertain future was only an additional cause of inquietude for the old artist. Can his relations have still been angry with him, after the lapse of forty years, for the feeling which caused him to give up commerce for art? Albert Grisar was born at Antwerp in 1808, his father being a native of Burgundy, and his mother a native of Normandy. His father, a shipowner, sent him to Liverpool, to learn trade in the best school; but all Grisar's dreams were of music, so, one day, he escaped, and took refuge in Paris, the asylum of so many foreign artists. He began studying music very seriously, but before making his appearance as an artist he first came out as a patriot. At that period, Belgium had risen in insurrection. Grisar enrolled himself under the colors as a volunteer. Having paid his debt to his first country, he returned to his second, and resumed his pen as a musician. He often told his friends that his first work worth anything, "La Folle," was extemporized in one evening, with M. de Morvan, the author of the words, and that the publisher, to whom he gave it, allowed it to remain forgotten for several years in manuscript. One day the unknown artist had a chance of submitting his poor romance to Adolphe Nourrit, then starring at Brussels; the great singer adopted it, sang it at the theatre with great success, and it speedily became the fashion everywhere. It was first published at Brussels, and went through twenty editions in Paris alone. Grisar took advantage of the opportunity to get a little work in one act, Le mariage impossible, played at Brussels. He then returned to Paris, with a pension of twelve hundred francs from his own government. His whole soul was centered in the stage. M. Bernard Latté, the publisher from whom we have learnt many interesting details about the commencement of Grisar's career, had the greatest possible trouble to extort from him an album of new romances. The first he did obtain included the air, "Adieu, beau rivage de France!" another great success. The following year, while still waiting for his turn on the stage, Grisar composed a second album of six romances, with a little song thrown into the bargain, as he said; this song he advised his publisher not to publish, so dissatisfied did he feel with it; but this song, which the composer almost disowned, was no other than "Les Lavanduses du Couvent," which, also, was destined to become popular, and of which more than fifty thousand copies were sold. Most people are not aware that the words of this trifle were written by M. Ed. Thierry, then a poet of the romantic plaid, and now director of the Theatre Français.

At length, M. Crosnier consented to bring out Grisar's first comic opera Sarah, but not without having it considerably altered; reduced to two acts, a form that is generally unfortunate; and omitting several pieces, among others a very brilliant chorus of soldiers, that the Orphéons have since then well avenged; at that period, however, they were still afraid of music at the Theatre Favart, and gave as much prominence as possible to the dialogue. The principal parts were created by the handsome Jenny Colon, then coming out, and by Couderc, then a ténor de force, for he had not yet become the charming discur whom we now admire in La Fontaine de Berny. Grisar produced also at the Opéra-Comique, Les Travestissements, and L'An Mil (libretto by M. Paul Foucher); at the Theatre de la Renaissance, L'Eau merveilleuse, which was the beginning of his fortunate collaboration with M. Th. Sauvage, and Lady Melril (in three acts), subsequently revived under the title, Le Joillier de Saint-James.

Suddenly, Grisar disappeared. He stopped eight years in Italy, and it was from Rome that he sent Gilles ravisseur, that charming musical miniature, which, with M. Pantalon and Les Porcherons, constitutes his best claim to be remembered. Gilles was stupid enough to be played for the first time on the 22nd February, 1848, but M. Perrin restored him subsequently to the hills. In 1850, Grisar obtained his brilliant success of Les Porcherons. This raised the happy musician very high in public favor. He followed it up successfully by Bon soir Monsieur Pantalon; Le Carillonneur de Biuges; Le Chien du Jardinier; Le Voyage autour de ma Chambre, all these latter works at the Opéra-Comique, and furthermore, at the Theatre Lyrique, Les Amours au Diable, revived four years ago at the Opéra-Comique, and Les Bègues mentis de l'Amour, in one act—by MM. de Najac and Deulin—charmingly played by Mlle. Faure Le Fevre. Finally, at the Bouffes-Parisiens, he produced a trifle, Les Douce Innocentes.

We have limited ourselves to a rapid enumeration of his latter works, as well as of the productions of his prosperous and happy period, nearly all of which are known to the present generation. Without wishing to diminish the sympathy excited by his sad end, we must be permitted to remark that his career, taken as a whole, cannot be represented as an Odyssey of disappointments. More than one musician, of equal talent, would have been contented with so many successes, and if the composer of Les Porcherons, and of Gilles ravisseur, fell off lamentably, in the latter part of his life, the fact must be attributed more especially to his domestic troubles, which at last discouraged in him even his inspiration. His later collaborators confess they had great trouble in prevailing on him to finish a work. On the other hand he was fond of beginning a good many. He has left six, nearly completed.

1. Riquet à la houppe, four acts, book by Sauvage, "asked for by M. Perrin, for the Opéra," says a note in Grisar's handwriting, in the margin of the list; 2. Rigolo, comic opera in one act, words by M. Pellier; 3. L'Oncle Salomon, in three acts, libretto by M. de Najac; 4. Les Contes bleus, by MM. Lockroy and Cogniard, three acts; 5. Afrasia, serious opera in three acts, libretto by M. de Najac; and, 6. Le Pira-pluie, three acts and nine tableaux, book by MM. Deulin and de Najac.

The poor musician, it is said, offered to pledge the six thick manuscripts all for a loan of a few thousand francs, but could obtain only a very small sum. This is, certainly, very sad! Could not a performance be got up at which we might hear some of his posthumous compositions, mixed with a few airs selected from his most celebrated ones?

Whatever may be the result of this wish, Grisar will leave behind him the reputation of a charming, delicate, and natural musician, and some of his works, such as Les Porcherons; Gilles ravisseur; Le Chien du Jardinier; and Bon soir, Monsieur Pantalon, will remain to attest the rare excellence of his talent.

Grisar's funeral service was solemnized on Thursday morning the 17th June, at the church of Saint André d'Antin (Cité d'Antin).

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. The Athenæum, July 24, thus chronicles the conclusion of the season:

"Le Prophète" has never been so badly represented in England as on Saturday last. A difficult opera to give with due completeness, its two most important characters needing exponents possessed of dramatic power as well as of musical capability. Meyerbeer's over elaborate tragedy has too frequently been inadequately rendered. But it was reserved for the coalition-season, during which we were promised casts of unexampled completeness, to witness the worst performance on record of an opera which, more than any other, has in past times given distinction to the Covent Garden establishment. Mile. Tietjens' ambition is insatiable. She has not hesitated to attack any character in the soprano repertoire. Medea and Marta, Fidelio and Lucia di Lammermoor have been accepted by her with equal readiness. Whether or not she was fitted by nature for a character, she has not scrupled to attempt it, if only it was sufficiently prominent. Having exhausted all the treble heroines of opera, she now seems disposed to seize the contralto characters. Fides, it is true, invades the soprano register, but the tessitura of the part is contralto—in other words it tries Mlle. Tietjens just where her voice is weakest. This she evidently felt on Saturday last, and therefore over-exerted herself in the effort to make every note tell. We must give her full credit for her indomitable determination in wrestling with the difficulties of her task, but we are bound to say that her rendering of Meyerbeer's music was a failure. Were she often to repeat the experiment she would infallibly destroy a voice which, once magnificent, has already been irreparably injured by reckless wear and tear. Mlle. Tietjens' acting was more earnest, more emphatic, freer from self-consciousness than in any impersonation of hers we can call to mind, and in the cathedral scene, where the "False Demetrius" of Leyden disowns his mother, there was an approach to real tragic power. Nevertheless, we have no wish to see Mlle. Tietjens a second time in "Le Prophète." Signor Mongini did not know his part, having probably not taken the trouble to learn it for the last night of his engagement. But to oblige him to appear in the character on the Saturday, announcing Signor Tambrlik for the succeeding Thursday, was surely discourteous as well as impolitic. The part of Berta is almost as unsuited to Mlle. Sinico's voice as is Fides for an opposite reason to that of Mlle. Tietjens. The band and chorus were frequently out of time, and the concerted music was throughout unsteady. Only in the mise-en-scène was there anything to recall the memories of Covent Garden in its brighter days.

As usual, there has been a desperate attempt to make up by fidgetty restlessness in the final fortnight of the season for past inactivity. On Wednesday, Mme. Adelina Patti appeared for the first time in England in a part which she ought long ago to have sustained here, and which she certainly ought to have had an opportunity of repeating before the end of the season. As "Rigoletto" was one of the earliest operas produced this year, there was no reason why it should not have been brought out weeks ago for Mme. Patti. No Gilda of recent years has dalled our keen remembrance of Bosio. Many have sung the music passably well, but not one has been gifted with a voice so sympathetic as that of the still lamented lady who died in the Russian capital. For the first time she has now been efficiently replaced. Mme. Patti's singing is simply faultless; and the ready quality of her voice renders it still more susceptible of expression than that of Bosio. Compared to hers, it is as an oboe to a flute. It is, moreover, full of warmth, and it faithfully translates every shade of feeling suggested by the singer's fervid nature. There was little to call for special notice in her singing, but every phrase was so forcibly accented as to convey a meaning new even to those most familiar with Verdi's best opera. Gilda's touching description of her wooing was made more dramatic than usual, and the excellent quartet was benefited by the brilliant quality of Mme. Patti's high notes. Signor Tambrlik's voice has become more tremulous than ever; in other respects the cast was good, Mr. Santley's Rigoletto being quite worthy of the Gilda.

The opera season is announced to conclude to-night with "Il Barbiere." Rarely has a season, opened with pompous promises, been carried through to such a lame and impotent conclusion. The management must not be charged with the non-arrival of Mme. Lucra, as this is due to the lady's indisposition. Nor can they be held accountable either for the accidents that kept Mmes. Patti and Tietjens some weeks from the stage, or for the terrible weather that at one time invalidated half the troupe. But the directors are responsible for having advertised casts which men of their experience must have known to be impracticable. It was easy enough to put down three prince donne for one opera—impossible to induce them to keep promises not of their own making. As a matter of fact, the casts of some works have not been so strong as they were at Drury Lane last season. Our surmise made at the beginning of the season that Her Majesty's Theatre would be absorbed into Covent Garden, was verified even more completely than we anticipated. Until Mme. Patti came, scarcely any artists but those of Mr. Mapleson's contingent were employed. Since her arrival, she and Mlle. Nilsson have alternately filled the house. The old star-system has, in fact, been revived in all its harmfulness. Everything has been sacrificed to some one singer, the subordinate, and often the principal characters being generally feebly represented. The material of the orchestra has been as good as of late years, of the chorus better; but both have been disorganized by the perpetual change of conductors. Signor Li Culi has been found incompetent, and not all the care of Signor Arditi has at times availed to restore order in the forces committed for the nonce to his charge. The novelties of the season have been the weak "Hamlet," half redeemed by Mlle. Nilsson and the weaker "Don Bucefalo," wholly unredeemed by Signor Bottero. "The rest is silence."

The operatic monopoly contrived this spring by a coup d'état cannot be continued a second season. A strong opposition has already been formed, and the most useful as well as the most attractive members of the Covent Garden troupe—including Mlle. Nilsson, Signori Mongini, Gardoni, Foli, Gassior and Mr. Santly, have actually been engaged. Mme. Trebelli, the most accomplished of living operatic contraltos, Mme. Volpini, Mme. Monbelli and Signor Bettini, have also agreed to join the troupe. Signor Arditi is to be conductor; and it is promised that the chorus shall be exceptionally good. Drury Lane Theatre has been taken for next season.

English opera continues to "draw" at the Crystal Palace; "Maritana" and "Lurline" have been among the latest revivals there. No music, whatever its class, seems to be unwelcome at Sydenham.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.—The Pall Mall Gazette says:

Last season there was a glut of pianoforte recitals. From Mmes. Schumann and Goddard, MM. Hallé and Rubinstein, down to the ladies and gentlemen who belong entirely to the "gymnastic school," every pianist was possessed with a desire to recite. In this matter the present season shows a falling off; the field having been left to Mmes. Schumann, who occupied it early; to Mr. Hallé and to Mme. Goddard, who recently brought their performances to a close. We are not sure that the public are losers by the reaction. Only a pianist of the highest executive and intellectual power can give recitals to an audience of amateurs with either credit to himself or profit to them; and it may be that last year's experience enforced this truth in a very practical manner.

In the course of his series Mr. Hallé played over again the pianoforte works of Schubert, and the miscellaneous compositions for the same instrument of Beethoven. He rightly judged that such a programme would bear repetition. To everything that Schubert wrote there now attaches an increasing interest—an interest, in some cases, tending to exaggeration; while the penes fugitives of the greater master cannot be heard too often by those who know their beauty. As regards Beethoven no novelty could be expected. There is nothing left of his to discover, and, happily, there is little unfamiliar. With Schubert the case is different. The possessors of his manuscripts have but recently learned the value of their treasures, and every year brings additions to the long-neglected master's published works. In the matter of pianoforte music two such additions have been made since last season, both of which had a place in Mr. Hallé's programme. The first consists of Drei Clavierstücke, not mentioned in the laboriously compiled Catalogue of Dr. Kreissle von Hellborn, and, therefore, presumably a recent discovery. Apart from their relation to the composer they excite no particular interest, and assuredly add nothing to our esteem for his genius. We have little doubt of Schubert's ability to improvise such music to any extent. The second is a far more important novelty. Dr. Kreissle describes it as "Reliquie, an unfinished sonata (1825), published 1861-62 by Whistling at Leipzig, to whom the manuscript belongs." The year 1825 was by no means the most prolific of Schubert's life. A batch of songs, the A minor sonata (op. 42), two marches, and some pianoforte music to a forgotten melodrama, are nearly the whole of his finished works bearing that date. Why the Sonata in C was left incomplete, is, however, no mystery. Schubert just then had come upon one of the few oases in the desert of his life. With an intimate friend (Vogl) he spent a good portion of the year in happy wanderings through Upper Austria, writing now and then enthusiastic letters from among mountains which suggested to him the idea of a world "nailed up with boards." Without grudging poor Schubert his pleasure, we wish he had found time to complete his sonata. There was but little more to do—the minuetto and rondo finale alone remaining unfinished. But even as it is we have something for which to be thankful. The opening moderato is of large proportions, elaborate design, and eminently characteristic style; while the andante is full of that tender sentiment and exquisite beauty peculiar to the master's slow movements. * * *

When planning her series of three recitals, Mme. Arabella Goddard indulged a favorite taste. No artist has done more to enlarge the repertory of accepted classical music by producing meritorious forgotten works than our English pianist. She has made it, in some sort, her mission to be the resurrectionist of buried treasures, a mission for which no one possesses higher qualifications. We fear that the reward is hardly in proportion to the labor. However good the music brought to light, it is valued only by a few, all popular applause being reserved for those who best render that which is familiar. Such considerations, however, little affect the true artist, and Mme. Goddard has this season eclipsed all her former efforts, not only in the number but also in the character of the works produced. Moreover she has done a special act of justice to a class of composers treated by fortune with singular harshness. A creative musician just short of the highest rank has a less enviable lot than he who is far below. * * *

At the head of the list stands Dussek, who, unlucky while living, has, since death, been unfortunate through the neglect into which his works have fallen. Of the thirty-two pianoforte sonatas written by the gifted Bohemian, only Op. 70, in A flat, the so-called Plus Ultra, is familiar to modern programmes, and even this was but little regarded till Mme. Goddard played it at the Monday Popular Concerts. Nevertheless, they contain a mine of wealth which those may estimate who know but the elegiac Op. 61, the Invocation, Op. 77, and the earlier sonata, Op. 44, dedicated to a yet more prolific if not more brilliant composer, Muzio Clementi. These works are in some degree familiar—by name—but Mme. Goddard preferred to introduce the absolutely unknown, choosing as her examples the sonata in A major, Op. 43, and that in B flat major, Op. 46. She could hardly have better illustrated the delicate and piquant grace of Dussek's style, a grace in which, it has been said with truth, "Mozart scarcely excelled him." Both sonatas met with thorough appreciation, and the result must have been a higher estimate of their composer's genius.

Of Woelfl, a master whom the Ne Plus Ultra so inadequately represents, Mme. Goddard produced one example only, but that was sufficient for her purpose. The grand sonata in C minor is worthy a composer far more illustrious than he who now lies in an unknown and unhonored grave. It is suggestive even of the most illustrious, so great are the science, invention, and feeling displayed. A capital fugue precedes the first allegro, and after it comes an adagio which might, in many respects, pass for the work of Beethoven, this, in turn, being followed by a charmingly piquant finale worthy of Mozart for melodic beauty and clear treatment. The revival of so admirable a composition should direct attention to other productions of the same hand.

Mme. Goddard was not at all likely to overlook Clementi, the composer of sixty published sonatas for her instrument; and a writer who, notwithstanding mannerism and pedantry, deserves high rank. It is true that Mozart, no bad judge, thought little of Clementi or his music.

* * * From the "charlatan's" pianoforte works Mme. Goddard selected Op. 50 (in A major), dedicated to Cherubini. Without ranking this in the same category with Didone Abandonata, or No. 8 (in G minor), the adagio of which is one of the loveliest slow movements ever written, it may be accepted as a worthy representative of the composer. The opening allegro is dry, but the adagio and finale have much beauty—even the well-nigh inevitable canons being ingenious enough to charm.

A greater novelty than either of the foregoing was selected from the unpublished works of W. Friedemann, eldest of John Sebastian Bach's twenty children. With much of his father's genius, Friedemann possessed traits of character certainly not inherited. He was lazy, for example, and eccentric to a degree which almost incapacitated him for the duties of life. What he might have done is, however, made clear by the comparatively few things inclination prompted or necessity compelled him to write. The Grand Fantasia (so-called, though really a sonata in form and proportion), played by Mme. Goddard, is one of a set only existing in the original manuscript. All its four movements, but especially the second and third, startle by their anticipation of effects we call modern; while, throughout, the music runs on with masterly ease and all the confidence of assured resources. The work was a thorough surprise, and, should it become widely known, will do much for the reputation of the morose old Halle organist. In addition to this and the other sonatas above mentioned, Mme. Goddard played Hummel's Op. 106, an excellent specimen of Mozart's accomplished pupil.

In the course of her recitals Mme. Goddard brought forward eleven fugues—three by Handel, and two each by Sebastian Bach, Scarlatti, and Mendelssohn. All these are, of course, more or less known to amatears of fugal writing; so that we need only remark specially upon the interesting novelties by Albrechtsberger and Eberlin, which completed the tale. That of the former master (the master of Beethoven) is constructed with great clearness upon a flowing diatonic subject, and worthily represented the famous old contrapuntist in Mme. Goddard's programme. Ernst Eberlin, a voluminous writer and celebrated organist, who flourished immediately after Bach, and was Capellmeister at Salzburg in the time of Leopold Mozart, contributed one of nine fugues which are, perhaps, all of his music now obtainable. Ushered in by a capital prelude, and closing with a pars secunda, combining a new subject with the old, it is a fine example of a writer who ought not to be wholly forgotten. Here, again, we are compelled to differ from the master who styled Clementi a charlatan. In a letter to his sister, Wolfgang Mozart said:

"I would speak with all due respect of his (Eberlin's) four-part writings, but his pianoforte fugues are nothing but interludes drawn out to a great length."

Against this judgment we are satisfied to appeal to that of the amateurs who lately applauded an example of the Salzburg musician's skill.

The other works played by Mme. Goddard must be dismissed (though a good deal could be said about them) in briefest terms. They were twelve studies by Steibelt, Potter, Moscheles, Ries, Hiller, Sterndale Bennett, and others, as well as the same number of classical drawing room pieces, nocturnes, valse, &c., by Mendelssohn, Schubert, John Field, and Chopin.

MUNICH.—After the last performance of Herr R. Wagner's Tristan und Isolde, the King sent a message, expressing his perfect satisfaction, to the management, principal artists, and chorus. Besides this, he presented Mme. Vogl with a bracelet, and Herr Vogl with a breast pin.—By an order of the King, the birthdays of Gluck, Mozart, Weber, and Beethoven, will in future be celebrated every year at the Theatre Royal by gala performances. The Theatre Royal is now closed for the first time "in the memory of the oldest inhabitant," as the performances in summer have always proved more advantageous for the treasury than those at any other season, on account of the great number of strangers visiting the city. But Herr Wagner's ambition disregards such petty considerations, and consequently the building is closed for the alterations in the stage which are required by the musician of the future. Everything is to be ready by the 25th August, the King's birthday, when Das Rheingold, the prelude to the Nibelungen trilogy, will be produced, no matter with what efforts or at what expense. Our readers may imagine how utterly sick the singers are of this Wagner worship. On the 28th August, the statue of Goethe will be uncovered, and three of his pieces, Iphigenia, Turquato Tasso, and the first part of Faust (the latter as a gratuitous performance) will be played on three successive evenings. In order that the members of the band may not find their leisure time hang too heavily upon their hands, Gluck's overture, with Herr R. Wagner's conclusion, will be given with Iphigenia, and Liszt's respective "Sinfonische Dichtungen" to the two other pieces. This will be done at the particular recommendation of Herr von Bülow, for which, of course, the members of the band bless him. It is true that the "Sinfonische Dichtung," Faust, was composed expressly to Lenau's poem and not to Goethe's, but what does that matter, if Herr Hans von Bülow sees a chance of glorifying his friend the Abbate? It appears, however, that Herr von Bülow has really and truly made up his mind to resign his official position here, despite all the efforts of his Royal patron to dissuade him from his purpose. It is said that he intends settling in Wiesbaden.—Mlle. Virginie Gung'l (daughter of the well-known composer of dance music), who appeared successfully last year in Der fliegende Holländer, is engaged at the Theatre Royal from next September. Since her debut she has been studying singing very hard.

WEIMAR.—Professor Hartung-Müller has given a performance of Bach's Matthäus-Passion, in aid of the funds for the Bach Monument to be erected at Eisenach, the composer's birthplace. The solo singers were Mme. von Milde, Mlle. Schmidt, Herren Milde and Walters. The chorus consisted of the members of the Singacademie, of the church choir, and of the Academic Vocal Association of Jena. Dr. Naumann, also from Jena, presided at the organ. On the day after the performance here, the performance was repeated for the same object at Jena.

ROTTERDAM.—The annual festival of the Society for the Promotion of Musical Art went off very successfully. On the first day the work selected for performance was Handel's Samson, the solo singers being Mmes. Lemmens-Sherrington, Schreck, Dr. Gunz, and Herr Hill. On the second day, the proceedings commenced with Mendelssohn's overture to St. Paul, followed by fragments from his incomplete oratorio of Christus, it being the first time the latter had ever been publicly heard in this town. The programme also included M. Bargiel's Medea overture, and a "Festival Chorus," by M. Verhulst, besides several pieces of less importance. Altogether, the festival went off exceedingly well.

STUTTGART.—The Association for Classical Sacred Music recently gave a performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus. The solos were sung by Mmes. Marlow, Marschalk, Herren Jäger and Schütty.

OPERATIC ACTIVITY IN ITALY. It is related of Abernethy that, on one occasion, when he had to deliver the inaugural lecture at the opening of the medical session at one of the London Hospitals, he cast his eyes, before commencing, on the large number of students before him, and exclaimed, unconsciously, aloud: "Poor devils! what will become of them?" Some similar remark might be applied to the mass of new operas produced during the first three months of the present year of grace, 1869, in Italy. "What will become of them?" What, indeed! The great majority will probably never be heard beyond the walls of the theatre where they were produced, though, may be, not one of the composers was called on less than twenty or thirty times in the course of the first night. However, to leave philosophizing, here is a list of them, together with the names of the composers and of the towns where they (the operas, not the composers) were brought out. Mario, serious; composed by Count Sampieri; first produced at the Teatro Contavalli, Bologna. 2. Chatterton, serious; Signor Mancini; Cingolo. 3. Piccolini, serious; Mme. Grandval; Italiano, Paris. 4. Una follia a Roma, comic; Signor Fed. Ricci; L'Athénée, Paris. 5. Graziella, serious; Signor Decio Monti; Teatro Doris, Genoa. 6. Giovanni II. di Napoli, serious; Signor Petrella; Teatro San Carlo, Naples. 7. Il degonda, serious; Signor Melesio Morales; Teatro Pagliano, Florence. 8. Valeria, serious; Signor Ed. Vern; Teatro Comunale, Bologna. 9. Fieschi, serious; Signor Montuoro; La Scala, Milan. 10. Ruy Blas, serious; Signor Marchetti; La Scala, Milan. 11. La Martire, serious; Signor Perelli; Teatro della Pergola, Florence. 12. I Tutori e le Pupille, comic; Signor Dechamps; Teatro Pagliano, Florence. 13. Caterina Howard, serious; Signor Vezzosi; Catania. 14. Alba D'oro, serious; Signor Battista; Teatro San Carlo, Naples. 15. Gorilla, semi-serious; Signor San Germano; Teatro Re, Milano. 16. Armando e Maria, serious; Signor Carlo Alheri; Teatro Fiorentini, Naples. 17. Le due Amiche, serious; Signora Seneca; Teatro Argentina, Rome. 18. Matilde d'Inghilterra, serious; Signor Zecchini; Teatro Brunetti, Bologna. 19. La Serva Padrona, comic; Signor Tancioni; Teatro Alfieri, Turin. 20. Eleonora d'Arborea, serious; Signor Enrico Costa; Cagliari. 21. Gulnara, serious; Signor Libani; Rome. 22. Un Marito in traccia di sua Moglie, comic; Signor Vitt. Grondona; Milan.—It must be observed that in the above list are included operas written by foreign composers—not Italians, that is to say—for the Italian stage, and operas written by Italian composers for the theatres elsewhere than in Italy. It must furthermore be stated that Matilde d'Inghilterra, though new for Italy, was first represented in Athens; and that Gulnara and Un Marito, etc., were not produced on the public stage but in private society, the first at the Palazzo Pamphili, Rome; and the second at Count Filippo Bologni's, in Milan.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 14, 1869.

How they Pass Away!

The past year has been remarkable for the number of stars, of greater or lesser magnitude, which have disappeared from the musical firmament. And yet that is a bad image by which to express the numerous deaths of notable musicians which we have had to chronicle of late; for the real stars are those who, no longer present in the body, live and shine in the immortal creations of their genius. Such stars as Bach and Handel, Mozart and Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Schubert, Weber and Rossini, so long as what may be called a musical firmament encompasses our life, will never disappear from it, except by temporary obscurations. The artificial glare of poor and short-lived fashions, the rockets and blue-lights of enterprising shallow thaumaturgists and masters of claptrap effects, may hide from time to time these pure, perpetual lights, but only enough to show how inextinguishable they are. In this sense, there are more musical stars that disappear during their own life time in the flesh,—stars which culminate and set and are forgotten before death, than there are that rise into the firmament upon the dissolution of the natural man. Many a composer once thought much of has survived his fame, and it is only by the announcement of his death that the world is again reminded of him. In many instances we read with melancholy wonder the obituary notice of some once famous musician, whose name has long since almost ceased from men's mouths, and are forced to reflect how brilliant may have been one's vogue and promise, how much one may have written and produced, bringing into play great forces in repeated public presentations, themes of admiring criticism for how many years, and yet long since has his very name relapsed into obscurity, until at length a feeble momentary ray is cast upon it by some dark lantern of "Necrology" which goes wandering about in musical and other newspapers!

During the year we have read obituary notices of an unusual number of men who have achieved a name in music, including some who will not fade from memory. Besides Rossini, type of genius and success (and even he outlived his inspiration, although not his fame or influence), and Hector Berlioz, a great man in his way, but who studied arts of effect rather than intrinsic quiet power, and was forced with sad sincerity to own his musical life a failure; we have lately chronicled the death of Molique, the high-toned classical violinist and composer, and of Albert Grisar, one of the minor lights, but near, and still regarded with fresh interest, of the current light French opera, about whom further notice will be found in another column of this week's Journal. We propose now to go back a little and recall two or three names of some importance, to which, in the press of other matter, we omitted all allusion at the time we saw their deaths recorded in our foreign exchanges. Of these the most important is that of LOEWE, best known by his Ballads and Legends (though never sufficiently well known in this country)—works full of imaginative genius; some of them of the highest order, others mystical, romantic, darkly mediæval to a fault, besides a large percentage out of the great number of them which, musically, must be accounted commonplace, Philister-ish and manneristic; once, too, equally well known in Germany by his half-a-dozen Oratorios, of which the principal are "The Seven Sleepers," "John Huss," "Gutenberg," &c.,—works highly commended by good critical authorities in the day of them, and certainly containing (at least the two first named, which we have examined) not a few striking, admirable instances of composition and poetic conception, but on the whole justly complained of for their mysticism, and not possessing musical vitality enough to keep them before the world; it is long since we have read anywhere of a public performance of any one of them. Yet in Loewe died much more of a musical character, than scores who have lately filled ten times as much space in the world's attention. The Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, Leipzig, publishes a notice of this master by one of his friends, from which we translate.

"On the 20th of April died, in Kiel, at the age of 73, the well-known composer, Dr. JOHANN KARL GOTTFRIED LOEWE, who in relation to the Ballad occupies the same unique position with Franz Schubert in relation to the German Lied. He was born on the 30th of November, 1796, in Lobejan near Halle; and he received from his father, who was Cantor, not only a severely pious bringing up, but also the foundation of his musical education, which he continued from his tenth year as choir boy in Köthen, and completed in the Orphan House at Halle as a pupil of the celebrated old Türk, who took a fond interest in the talented boy. After the prospect of a purely musical career, with a salary from the king of Westphalia, was cut off for him by the revolution in political affairs, he accommodated himself to the favorite wish of his father and studied Theology in Halle, where he was matriculated at Michaelmas in 1817.

"As his clear, but somewhat sharp soprano had done for the boy, so now his exceedingly delicate tenor, of great compass, and his pure, intelligent delivery, won for the youth a great many friends. Moreover, the composition of his best Ballads ("Treurschen," "Wallhaide," "Erlkönig," &c.) falls within this student period. His acquaintance with Weber and Hummel resulted, after the completion of his Triennium in the year 1820, in a call to Stettin as Cantor at St. James's, and teacher in the Gymnasium. After one year's discharge of these duties, his salary was doubled, and he was appointed musical Director in the church, gymnasium, and seminary. He married a lady, with whom, while a student, he had formed an intimacy on the common ground of song,—Julie von Jacob, but in a little more than a year after had to mourn her loss, which later was fully and lastingly made good by his second wife, Auguste Lange. In Stettin he established a singing society, and achieved a highly meritorious position in the musical life of that city, while his Ballads and Oratorios were making him world-famous.

"He was less successful with his serious and comic operas, which in their time perhaps would have filled their place alongside of Spohr and Marschner, if the composer had been willing seriously to meet and overcome the difficulties and annoyances which are always connected with the carrying through of a first performance. If a want of knowledge of the stage, and a somewhat over nice simplicity of instrumentation were a hindrance to him in the operatic style, yet the depth and sincerity of his religious feelings, the sterling excellence of his musical settings, and particularly his uncommon mastery of the male chorus, made him as universally recognized in Oratorio, as the dramatic vitality, the characteristic truth of delineation, and the plastic quality of form and style have done in his Ballads, for which, in spite of often exacting requirements as to compass and flexibility of voice, they have secured for all time the first place in their kind.

"After a stroke of paralysis in 1864, Loewe was pensioned off. Soon afterwards he carried out his resolution to leave Stettin and removed to Kiel, where he passed his last years, surrounded by the most affectionate care of his family. Just eight days before his death, he said to his servant who accompanied him upon a walk: The world grows more and more beautiful, and I——" a heavy sigh closed the utterance of his presentiment of death. On the 20th of April a second attack came, paralyzing his whole right side, and followed in a few hours by a paralysis of the lungs, which caused his death. With inexpressibly mild and unchanged features the youthful old man slumbered in the coffin. His heart, enclosed in a silver casket, was deposited beneath a memorial stone in St. James's church at Stettin, while his body, without music of voices or instruments, was committed to the burial ground.

"An extended biography of Loewe, partly written by himself, and for the rest compiled by his daughter Helene from numerous letters and documents, is to appear in the course of the present year, from the press of Wilh. Müller in Berlin, to which we would not fail to call the attention of his friends and admirers."

Loewe's published compositions number more than one hundred. He wrote also Symphonies, Overtures and Sonatas. Besides being one of the most prolific composers of recent times, he was also active in a literary way. He wrote a Vocal Method for high schools, which appeared in 1826, and a Commentary on the second part of Goethe's Faust.

RAYMUND and ALEXANDER DREYSCHOCK. The deaths of these two brothers, within a few weeks of each other, last Spring, must have made a sad impression even on this side of the Atlantic, where they were held in pleasant remembrance by a number of American musical students, and were familiar names to many music-lovers. The former was the well-known second leader of the violins who sat next to David in the Gewandhaus orchestra at Leipzig. The latter was one of the famous new school pianists, much sought by pupils, among whom were our townsmen Francis Hill and the late Nathan Richardson. The Signale says:

"ALEXANDER DREYSCHOCK died in Venice on the 1st of April. So now both brothers have departed this life within a few weeks, for RAYMUND DREYSCHOCK died upon the 6th of February. The name of Droyschok had acquired a European reputation. Alexander was born at Zack in Bohemia on the 15th of October, 1818. Endowed with talents of great promise, and under the guidance of a sound teacher, by the name of J. Pospischil, Droyschok, while scarcely eight years old, had acquired such a facility on the piano that he could appear already in public concerts in his native place and its vicinity. For the full development of his talent, his father committed the boy of thirteen to W. Tomaschek in Prague, with whom he passed four years in practical and theoretic studies. After two more years of practice by himself, Droyschok in December 1838 began his first artistic tour through a great part of North Germany, and met everywhere with the most flattering recognition. A journey into Russia from 1840 to 1842 proved equally successful. After his return, still in the year '42, he gave concerts in Brussels, Paris and London, which places he has since revisited repeatedly, as well as Holland, Austria, Hungary, &c. The success of these tours was always in the highest degree favorable; his facility in octave passages everywhere causing especial astonishment.

"As a composer, Droyschok has published over 140 works, which, although designed mostly for the hands of virtuosos, are yet distinguished by their clearness, symmetry and fine singing style among many other compositions of this kind, and part of them have on that account become popular. Since 1862 Droyschok has officiated as Professor in the Conservatory at St. Petersburg, where he was made Pianist to the Emperor in 1865. Advancing illness compelled him from time to time to leave this place and to betake himself to a milder climate, which however did not bring the hoped for restoration. Alexander Droyschok belonged to the very small circle of the musical elite who were distinguished by the title of "Imperial-Royal Austrian Chamber Virtuosos." He was moreover Court Kapellmeister to the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt. The deceased leaves behind a widow and three sons." He was buried with great ceremony and honor in Prague, although he had not lived in Bohemia for years.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK. The Sun of Monday last tells us:

In a musical way we have only Mr. Theodore Thomas at present to look to. Without him we should have to starve until fall, for, other than at his concerts, there is not a note to be heard, except from the inevitable hand organs, to remind us that such an art as that of music still exists.

Mr. Thomas has done so noble a work that it is gratifying to know that his entertainments are proving a pecuniary success, and that his testimonial on Friday night was all that could have been desired in point of numbers and enthusiasm.

The musical prospects for the winter are very uncertain. French grand opera and Italian opera have been talked of, but even the rumors of them seem to have finally died away. Of English opera, however, we have a double prospect. The Parepa-Rosa-Seguin troupe is to open at the French Theatre on the 11th of September with Bulfe's "Puritan's Daughter." On the 18th the "Sonnambula" will be brought out, with Miss Rose Hersee as Amina.

About the 20th of that month Mlle. Carlotta Patti, with some efficient assistants, will commence a concert season at Steinway Hall.

The Richings English Opera Company do not open until November.

MR. CARLYLE PETERSILEA, the pianist, has entered upon a concert tour during the summer months. The Bangor Whig and Courier reports of him as follows:

"Mr. Petersilea, who made his first appearance among us, is the finest pianist to whose touch the walls of Norumbega have ever echoed. His fingering is nearer perfection than any we have ever seen, while his power of drawing from his instrument volumes of sound that completely fill every part of the hall, is only excelled by the skillful touches that produce tones so soft and sweet as require the closest attention and most complete stillness to render them audible."

AN APOSTLE OF PEACE. Under this heading, the London Orchestra makes merry over what seems certainly fair game, as follows:

A clergyman of the great Republic, the Rev. T. de Witt Talmage of Brooklyn, went to Boston for the Peace Festival, and was very much struck by it. He liked it. It gave him peculiar feelings; and on his arrival home he tried to tell his congregation from the pulpit how he felt during the hanging of guns, and clanking of anvils, and halloing of tens of thousands of voices. This is what he thought of it:

"Sopranoes and tenors, altos and basses, mingled wrestling, wrenthling, roaring, sinking, till every depth of emotion was sounded, and every height of inspiration touched; and the great surges of music broke on the shore of the soul in crystal and pearl and amethyst of sound."

The Rev. T. de Witt Talmage is evidently a wag. By "crystal and pearl and amethyst of sound," he meant to imply that the row was composed of many precious tones.

"It seemed as if all lullabies, and requiems, and warbles, and sonnets, and serenades, and overtures, and orations, that had been wandering through the ages, had at last found their heaven, clasping hands together in one grand march, to which an unconsecrated ear was not fit to listen."

If every loading lullaby, roving requiem, wandering warble (by the way what is a warble?) and strolling serenade could be collected together and sent out of this lower earth by means of a grand assemblage of rows, what a capital plan it would be to get all the organ-grinders, German bands, chanters of "Ya-ah sparrer-grass," and cats who do most frequent the Night's Plutonian shore, and let them all clasp hands together in one grand march, which should rid us of them forever. But we are afraid that the Rev. T. de Witt Talmage, now that he has got home again, will find that the lullabies, orations, warbles and so forth, go on wandering through the ages pretty much the same now as they used to. There is no peace for the wicked, despite all Bostonian Jubilees may say.

And what did the audience think of it, while the warbles and sonnets were clasping hands and going to heaven?

"Some wept; some shouted; some clapped their hands; and yet the tide continued to rise."

This reminds us of the scene described by poor Artemus Ward, as he was delivering his farewell lecture. "It was an affecting scene," he says; "some of the audience sleeping peacefully on the benches, others weeping piteously at the jokes, others leaving the room never to return. It was a solemn and touching sight." From the spectacle which so touched the Rev. T. de Witt Talmage, that good gentleman of course derives a moral. The moral would strike a dull British congregation as being a trifle too comic for a pulpit; but American preachers are not to be judged by the Eastern standard. This is the comparison which the reverend orator founds:

"It was an occasion to be talked of and written about for all time. And yet even that was nothing compared with the multitude and splendor of the assemblage of the Redeemed, when they come from the North, and the South, and the East, and the West, and sit down at the great Peace Jubilee of Heaven, and ten million times ten million trumpeters shall lift their trumpets, and ten million times ten million harpers shall strike their harps, and all the hosts stretching off on seas of glass, and reaching up on everlasting hills, shall take up the anthem, chorus of children, chorus of martyrs, chorus of oceans, chorus of stars, while the Arch-angel, in the might and splendor of Eternity, standing before the great multitude, shall beat time with his sceptre."

The notion of an archangelic chef d'orchestre is so peculiarly American that we leave the Rev. T. de Witt Talmage, of Brooklyn, at the climax which his most original genius has created.

There's richness! Verily, of all the crazy imagery, the sentimental hifalutin, fulsome rhapsody that has been written since the Jubilee, there's none can hold a candle to much that has appeared in the religious newspapers or been preached in pulpits. Are these some of those "transpirings" (Query: perspirings) "of the appointed time," which some great poet so eloquently anticipated in his rhapsody on Peace (à la Lamartine) prefixed to the prospectus of the Jubilee?

The celebrated violinist, M. Joachim, during a winter residence in Northern Germany, was in the habit of watching the skaters on a fine piece of water beneath his window, until one day it occurred to him to try the exercise himself. As he had never yet donned a pair of skates, he put himself into the hands of a man who provided skates and instruction in the art on the brink of the water, and was soon equipped and started on the ice, the master leading his pupil. Finding no difficulty in keeping his balance under these circumstances, Joachim felt sure he could go alone, desired his leader to leave him, and the next minute he was sprawling on his back. "Aha!" said the teacher, triumphantly, as he raised his prostrate pupil, "you see it is not quite so easy as playing the fiddle!"

This reminds us of the winter days in Berlin when we watched the skating on the Thiergarten, and saw our friend John Paine, the organist, indulging in that form of pedal practice.

The splendid southern portal of Cologne Cathedral is now completed. It is ornamented with 107 statues, 38 of them life-size, and eight reliefs representing the passion of our Saviour—all composed and executed by Professor Mohr.

The Council, summoned to meet at Rome in December, will, it appears, take into consideration, among other things, church music. The preliminary committee, which is already at work, has had three reports sent in, relative to the notation of plain chant. It wants to amalgamate the seven different editions in one only, which would then be obligatory for every church. The authors of these reports are the Abbate Liszt, M. Fétis, and M. Sain-d'Arod, formerly chapelmaster to King Victor Emmanuel. Liszt was in favor of the "Roman of Avignon," so called because the use of it was decreed by a papal bull dated from that town. M. Fétis accepts the edition revised by the Council. M. Sain-d'Arod wishes the library of the Vatican to be searched, for the manuscript of Palestrina, which is preserved there, and which he would have republished exactly as it is. It dates from 1600; it is the first with a regular notation, and is, no doubt, more in keeping than any other, with the traditions of the primitive Church.

MUSICAL TRANPOSITIONS.—M. Castil-Blaze has given an interesting account of the various keys in which the chief solo pieces in Il Barbiere have been presented to the public. Of course Mme. Giorgi Righetti sang Rosina's air in its original key, F. Mme. Persiani and other sopranos sang it in G. Figaro's air, written in C for Zamboni, is generally sung in B flat; Tamburini sang it in B natural. Basilio's air, "La Calunnia," generally sung in C, is written in D. Bartholo's air, written in E flat, used to be sung by Lablache in D flat. These particulars may be interesting to those who believe in the abstract value of a normal diapason, and in the absolute character of keys. We have all heard the principal airs in Il Barbiere sung in the keys in which they were not written. We have seldom heard any of them sung in the keys in which Rossini wrote them; yet who can say that by these frequent, constant transpositions, they lose anything of their original character—that Figaro's air, for instance, sounds mournful when sung in B flat?—Life of Rossini, by Sutherland Edwards.

The portrait of Handel, presented by the illustrious composer to his relatives at Halle, on the occasion of his last visit in 1750, has just been bought by some Hamburg dilettanti for 400 thalers (£60). A town subscription is proposed, with a view to its being purchased for the communal library, which already possesses 129 volumes of the master's manuscript scores.

There's many a slip, &c. The Harvard Musical Association, here in Boston, had set its heart upon that portrait for the adornment of its Club Room and Library, and had actually forwarded the money to an agent for its purchase. After much strange vacillation of the owner in regard to price, first tempting purchase at 1,000 thalers or so, then warning us off by the startling sum of 4,500, it suddenly was offered for 400, yes 300, thalers, just too late to enter into competition with much nearer bidders. The portrait is in oil, life size, representing the full figure down to the knees, and was painted from life by Hudson.

A NOVEL SOLUTION.—Apocryph of the Boston Peace Jubilee, the London Spectator speculates after this fashion:

It was not the volume of musical sound, which was hardly perceptibly increased by the multitudinous numbers, it was the concentrated volume of sympathy and emotion which reassured the radically different genius of this wonderfully creative and able people. The Americans, like the Asiatics, often seem to us daunted by the greatness of the universe they live in, and seek in visible symbols of popular life for the courage which they fail to gather in the solitude of individual worship. If there be any other explanation of the great craving for something which gives a visible picture of the Grand Etre of Humanity, in its united yearnings and hopes, we cannot find it. Their pride in the vast scale of their continent reacts, as we fancy, in a sort of shiver of awe upon their hearts, and they fly for reassurance, not to reverie and meditation, but to populous meetings which "resolve" on some common sentiment, or better still, where that is possible, they have recourse to great human liturgies of liberty and praise, like this Monster Musical Festival of June, 1869.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Flashing Eyes. 3. G to g. Centauri. 40
The "flashing eyes" that "never can be mine." A sadly beautiful song, with a varied and expressive melody.

Non torno. Turn not away. 4. G to g. Centauri. 40
A fine new Italian song in excellent style. The subject, a supplication to the loved one not to depart, allows deep pathos and expression. Add this and the other to your list of good foreign songs.

Ask me no more. (Frage nicht). Voice, Flute and Piano. 4. Eb to g. Proch.
A beautiful German song, well arranged for voice and two instruments. Try it the next musical evening, substituting a Violin for Flute at will.

Thady O'Flinn. 2. D to c. Molloy. 35
A capital Irish song, half humorous, half tender, and pretty all through.

Of thee I think. (Ich denke dein). 3. Ab to a. Reichardt. 30
Another fine German song, making the repertoire of such music for this bulletin quite rich and valuable.

It is a good Thing to give Thanks. Quartet. Emerson. 60 Quartet or anthem for the church service. A "good thing" to give thanks with.

Faithful Echo. 3. C to e. Ganz. 40
A pretty maiden puts echo to a very good use in answering lover's questions. Echo has no objection to respond to such a nice melody as this.

Passing away into Sunlight. 3. A to e. Ellis. 30
The sentiment is beautiful, and the words are so well united to the music that the song can hardly fail to be a standard one.

Her Bright Smile. Duet. 3. Ab to f. Wrighton. 35
Nothing hardly has pleased more than this, as a song, and as a piano piece. So its popularity as a duet is already established.

Love me beloved! 3. Bb to d. Reichardt.
Still another charming German-English song. Will not disappoint you.

When the Silver Snow is falling. Duet. 3. Bb to f. Smart. 40
A pretty duet, which one may like now for its coolness, and in the winter for its well imagined verses.

The Mariners. (I naviganti). Trio for Soprano, Tenor and Bass. 4. Eb to g. Randegger. 75
Beautiful for sea and shore. Sounding over the seas of Italy, the effect of such music must be surprisingly sweet.

Turn from them, Willie! 3. E to a. Salisbury. 30
Song and Chorus. A most touching appeal, and good Temperance song.

Molly Adair. Song and Cho. 3. Eb to e. Hong. 35
Very pleasing ballad in the favorite ballad style.

Instrumental.

Walking in the Park. Var. 4. D. Pratt. 50
Favorite melody well arranged. Slips easily from the fingers.

I'll follow thee. Polonaise. 3. Ab. Pratt. 50
Also very well arranged, and a good instructive piece.

Coliseum Waltz. 3. C. Turner. 30
Quite pleasing, and the name a good one. Buy it as a memento.

Whirlpool Galop. Hamburger Sprudel Galop. 3. C. Parlow. 35
With that clear metallic ring which imparts such brilliancy to the best German Dance music.

In Wild Haste. Galop. 3. E. Faust. 30
Like the above, brilliant, and in good popular style.

Books.

THE PICNIC. A Cantata. By J. R. Thomas. 1.00

A pretty affair with an unpretending title, which is hardly good enough for the music, that being very pleasing. Arranged for mixed voices, but an added staff renders it equally available for three female voices. So it is just the thing for Seminars, as well as for the outside world. Incidents and Pieces are The Gathering, The Departure (Boat song), The Arrival, Swinging Song, Flower Song, Waltz Song, Laughing Glee, Skipping Song, The Storm, The Sunshine after Rain, Farewell, and Homeward Bound.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

(After Missa Sobell.)

My heart, so heavy-laden,
How throbbeest thou, wild and high,
When she, light-footed maiden,
With airy step floats by!
About her shoulders floweth
A veil of dazzling whiteness;
Beneath each dark lash gloweth
A fire of magic brightness;
Her rippling night-black tresses
Half shade her bosom's sweetness,
A rose's moss the dress is,
That folds her form's completeness;
And all is lovely motion,
All youthful graces charming,
To soft, yet wild emotion
My soul, my senses warming,
Until, too heavy-laden,
This heart of mine beats high,
When she, light-footed maiden,
With airy step floats by!
Narcissus flowers, and roses,
Around her robe are twining;
Its purple hem discloses
Her foot, in scarlet shining.
Oh, rounded foot so tender!
Oh, fine white hands' completeness!
Oh, lip of ruby splendor!
Enchanting, endless sweetness!
My heart so heavy-laden,
How throbbeest thou, wild and high,
When she, light-footed maiden,
With airy step floats by!

On the roof she stood as I went by,
With her robe and tresses played the wind,
While to her my parting song sang I:
"Fare thee well, dear child, sweet, good, and kind!
We must part in pain,
But shall meet again,
When the marriage feast awaiteth me!"

"Laden camels will I bring thee, dear;
Richest stuff for robe and wide schwalwar
For thy fingers, henna choice and clear;
Spikenard for thy long ambrosial hair;
Silks most fine and light,
Satins thick and bright,
And thy mother shall contented be!"

On the roof she stood; I passed along,
While her little hand she waved to me;
Warm winds bore to her my parting song,
And with robe and tress played tenderly.

"Fare thee well, my love,
Homeward will I rove,
When the marriage feast awaiteth me!"

Christine Nilsson.

(From the London Orchestra.)

I.

The history of art, like the history of politics, often repeats itself; its law of succession is exemplified in many ways. Twenty-two years ago a certain "Swedish Nightingale" burst upon the world at a time when the fortunes of lyric art in this country were at a very low ebb. Two years ago a younger and fresher Swedish Nightingale alighted on English shores at a time when the prospects of one of our opera houses looked similarly hopeless. In both cases the voice of the charmer exercised the liveliest effect upon the purse of the despondent manager.

In 1847 the then director of Her Majesty's Theatre, Mr. Lumley, had the best of reasons for blessing the advent of Jenny Lind. Things had gone worse and worse with him; the opera-house was about to close its doors, when the fair Swedish singer suddenly turned the heads of Londoners and the tide of luck into Her Majesty's Theatre. In 1867, twenty years later, as deep a gloom seemed settling upon the fortunes of the house, and again the kindly North sent a rescuer in Christine Nilsson. "When the sky is darkest," says the proverb, "dawn is nearest." Mr. Mapleson had arrived at the mauvais quart d'heure which precedes an improbable dawn; but it came nevertheless, and Mr. Mapleson woke one fine morning in June to find himself, his new prima donna, and his theatre famous. The magic of twenty years before had repeated itself; a single look, a single hearing, had done it all. Old opera-goers recalled Jenny Lind's appearance and the consequent furor, and predicted a similar excitement in these staidier times. Younger opera-goers were eager for the antecedents of this wonderful singer who had captivated London at first sight, but of whom they had as yet learnt little or nothing. Who was she? where had she come from? how was it she had not visited England before? Patti we knew, Lucia we knew, but who was this Nilsson, heard of but dimly as a cantatrice at the Theatre Lyrique? "All precious things, discovered late, to those that seek them issue forth;" but young London was impatient at the tardiness of this discovery. Paris had enjoyed this luxury for three years, grumbled the amateurs, and no entrepreneur till now had been precious enough or patriotic enough to contest the privilege with Paris. And then the question was renewed: What were the new artist's antecedents?

II.

The province of Smoland in Sweden is famous for a tradition conferring sundry honors and privileges upon its community. Five cantons which form the southern portion of this province bear the name of Weland, signifying Defence. There is a legend in connection with the wars between Sweden and Denmark before the two kingdoms were united, telling of the patriotic deed of a Weland girl named Blinda, medieval Judith of the north. All the fighting men of Weland were afield, awaiting the Danes, when a detachment of the army of invaders unexpectedly appeared in Smoland. Blinda, a patrician Swede, left in charge of her father's or husband's castle, (the legend is vague concerning her relationship to the castellan) proved herself equal to the emergency. Welcoming the invaders, she lulled them into a false sense of security, and at the close of a banquet, contriving to abstract the arms, gave the signal to a band of devoted Swedish women who fell upon the Danes and massacred them, from the chiefs downwards; the general being undertaken by Blinda herself. However apocryphal the story, it has received some recognition at the hands of the kings of Sweden. In memory of the good service of Blinda and her women, sundry taxes were remitted to Weland; equality of inheritance with the males was conferred upon the females of the province; and especial honors are still accorded to a Weland lady when she marries or is buried.

In one of the privileged cantons, at a village three leagues from the small town of Vexie, Christine Nilsson was born. Her parents were humble in condition—peasants laboring upon an inextensive farm. Before the age of ten the musical ability of little Christine asserted itself in various meagre ways. The child was known for a singularly sweet voice, and for a fair knowledge of the violin, picked up haphazard. Occasionally her parents would send her to the fairs held in the different villages and small towns of the district, where the little maid's beauty and fresh, clear singing earned a few copper-pieces, welcome enough to the hard-working couple at home.

Burgers and peasants were generous enough in their modest way (Smoland being far from a rich province) to the fair childish musician with blond hair, beautiful eyes, and an innocent face. The gentry, too, roundabout, made inquiries from time to time after Christine; and one or two urged her father and mother to allow her to receive a proper training in music. The child, however, for long resisted all attempts to separate her from her parents, though the latter seemed willing to avail themselves of the offers repeatedly made to them.

They had reason enough to be tempted; for at this period the Nilsson household was very poor. Christine herself was the youngest of seven; and a French chronicler portrays her as generally wearing the cast-off clothes of one of her brothers. French feuilletonistes, however, often allow their love of creating an effect to overstep their regard for veracity.

One day, while singing to her own violin accompaniment before a crowd of peasants at a fair, a strolling juggler offered her the magnificent sum of 20 riksdaler a year—about twenty-four shillings of our money—if she would join his troupe. Here at all events was a practical proposal, embracing actual terms. It would seem however that Christine declined this first engagement, notwithstanding the liberality of the entrepreneur. What an interesting subject for a painter it would make, in view of the after-career of the artist: Christine Nilsson offered her first engagement!

She did not join the man of cups and balls, for we find her at length—somewhere about the age of thirteen or fourteen—domiciled with the Baroness of Lenhusen, a lady once celebrated in her country as a singer under the name of Mlle. Valerius. A gentleman amateur named Toneriellm was the means of persuading Christine to dedicate herself formally to music, and through his introduction the young girl took up a position in the Baroness's household, and received her first lessons from her.

She was an apt scholar; and in a short time her instructress judged her fit to leave Gothenburg, where the Baroness lived, for Stockholm. Here Christine studied under Franz Berwald, and here, as one of his pupils, she attracted the notice of royalty. From Stockholm her patrons sent her to Paris, where she completed her musical education under Wartel, a very Warwick of his craft, a true Diva-maker. A dozen prime donne owe their celebrity to the care and shrewdness of this teacher; but had he trained only a Christine Nilsson his fame would be complete.

III.

Three years were devoted by Wartel to the perfection of Mlle. Nilsson's supple voice and to training her in declamation, in style, and in all the arts that belong to the lyric stage. An easy task, when the master was so able and the pupil so gifted. At the end of that time Wartel pronounced her fit to make her debut, and gave M.

Carvalho, the manager of the Lyrique, a hint as to the rising of this bright particular star.

An opera manager is only too glad to secure fresh talent when the warrant of it is undeniable. M. Carvalho took Wartel's advice. Mlle. Nilsson accepted an engagement to appear in "Violetta," a French translation of "La Traviata," on the 27th of October, 1864.

She was now eighteen years of age; fair, slender, graceful in carriage, amiable in features, with the light blue eyes of the Scandinavian race. As the curtain rose the audience were aware of an unaccustomed apparition; a Violetta gentle and dignified rather than passionate, displaying grace instead of sensuous languors, innocence in the place of recklessness.

The traits of Mlle. Nilsson's performance of this character are now of European notoriety; but it was new to the French audience in 1864. They were little prepared for the novel rendering. A succession of dark, Southern, warm-blooded cantatrici had portrayed the Lady of the Camellias as an amorous, voluptuous, seductive sort of Circe, a trifle dissolute, not to say vulgar. Here was a wide departure from the traditional rôle: Violetta shorn of her naughtiness, Violetta with fair hair, light blue eyes, a calm brow; full of love, but a love consistent with self-sacrifice; not the Sybarite passion of previous Traviatas; something very different and much more agreeable to contemplate.

It was the idealization of unsanctioned devotion; and the spirituels French recognized the subtlety of the conception, and applauded to the echo. The new rendering accorded perfectly with the fresh, clear, beautiful voice. Both were pure, unstrained, unspoiled. In both lay that simplicity which is the highest outcome of art, since it proves that in the cultivation of art the purity of nature is not forgotten.

The Swedish diva has widely improved on that first performance, with the practice that makes perfect. But the personation even then was great enough to arouse a considerable sensation in Paris. The critics discovered a new genius; an artist whose dramatic power was worthy of her bright soprano voice and thorough style. The press burst into eulogium. The staid Moniteur Universel headed the acclamations. "She has transitions," exclaimed the critic of the Moniteur, "which resemble the murmurs of the infinite; at times her songs fall from patrician lips like phrases lowly uttered by a duchess of olden time. Her sigh is a melody, her breath a caress. If she interprets Verdi thus, how would she sing Mozart!"

"Never has death," wrote M. Nestor Roqueplan in the Constitutionnel, "presented itself in a softer and more touching guise than under the young features and with the sweet voice of the new singer. The repugnant reality of this agony was, as it were, veiled and idealized under a poetic film. Violetta did not die, she seemed to dissolve in a melodious atmosphere."

With the due allowance made to the fervor of French writers, always exalted when their sympathies are strongly aroused, nobody will contest the justness of the criticism. Later years indeed have verified it in the amplest manner.

IV.

The speculation of the critic of the Moniteur was destined to be ratified. In Verdi, Mlle. Nilsson was matriculated; in Mozart she subsequently took her lyrical degree. The music of Mozart was after all the test-point, and the opportunity of showing how the young Swedish artist could sing the "Don Giovanni" music and the exceptional rôle of Astrafiammante in "Die Zauberflöte," was soon afforded.

M. Carvalho, the manager of the Lyrique, enjoyed the reputation of making known to the Parisians, from time to time, the beauties of Mozart's masterpieces. The possession of so excellent a soprano as Mlle. Nilsson decided him to repeat the experiment with all lavishness in the matter of cast and scenic accessory. "Don Juan" (at the Lyrique French adaptations of opera are performed) should be his first essay.

The newly-accorded liberty of the theatres favoured the attempt. Under the old system of privilege, certain theatres were limited to a certain range of the drama. "Don Juan," for example, could be played only at the Académie Impériale de la Musique, a patent house. There it had been produced; had been played, like Gluck's "Alceste," some six weeks or two months; and had been quietly shelved sine die. Mozart's glorious music was voted old and exploded, of little value, save to decorate the library of some musical archæologist, fond of amassing lyrical antiquities. "La ci darem" and "Il mio tesoro" were dead as the Doge, and about as interesting.

In addition to the various obstacles in the way of reviving a taste for Mozart—obstacles arising from Parisian ignorance and prejudice—there had always been the difficulty of finding a "Queen of Night" for the composer's other masterpiece, the "Zauberflöte." The music of this character is written with inordinately high notes; the frequent use of the F in alt debars most sopranos from undertaking the rôle. Singers there have been—like Mlle. Carlotta Patti—able to reach these notes with sufficient ease; but such singers are as often destitute of the dramatic qualifications demanded by the part.

M. Carvalho thought he had obtained a soprano equally competent in the histrionic and the vocal requirements of the rôle, and determined to produce the "Don Juan" tentatively, with "Die Zauberflöte," translated into "La Flûte Enchantée," in reserve. The result proved that he had not underrated his resources. Mlle. Nilsson he cast for the part of Donna Elvira, Mme. Miolan-Carvalho, his wife, undertook Zerlina, Mme. Charton-Demeur, Donna Anna; and the parts of Don Juan, Don Ottavio, Leporello, were respectively assigned to M. Barré, M. Michot, and M. Troy. A well-selected orchestra seconded this capital ensemble; the chorus was good, the scenery left nothing to be desired. As was a natural consequence, the issue fulfilled the manager's most sanguine expectations.

Once more Parisian audiences discovered a new delight. So sweet, so tender, so gracious an Elvira they had never realized. She moved, the embodiment of Mozart's inspired fancy, a blue-eyed, spiritual presence, whom it was Don Juan's blackest infamy ever to have wronged. And this was the music accounted dull and obsolete! This the singing which but for a manager's far-sightedness Parisian dullards might have foregone!

The victory was gained; Don Juan became a French subject by terms of naturalization. Marseilles, Toulouse, Bordeaux, Lille and Rouen followed the example of Paris, and mounted the opera. Only the accident of birth prevented Mozart being claimed a Frenchman at once. As it was, the critics were disposed to quarrel with Germany for having forestalled them with the composer. In revenge they triumphed over Sweden in having robbed her of the artist!

V.

The success of "Don Juan" paved an even way for the attempt which M. Carvalho had in his mind: the production of "Die Zauberflöte." Mounted with great care, and possessed of the advantage bestowed upon it by such a Queen of Night as Mlle. Nilsson, its reception was assured the moment Astrafiammante appeared upon the stage. "It was a revelation," wrote one eminent critic of the performance; "that voice so splendid, virginal, correct, flexible, equal throughout its rare extent, modulating, trilling to inaccessible heights." They were not inaccessible, since Mlle. Nilsson attained them; but the license of criticism must be understood. Certain it is that the marvellous rendering of Astrafiammante's two celebrated airs, unexampled for difficulty, yet easily conquered by her exceptional gifts, transformed a meagre part into "a revelation," and a dull libretto into a triumph. Stupid as is "the book" of the Magic Flute, with its incomprehensible mysticism, its assumption of Freemasonry intrigue, and the aimlessness of action throughout it; still more silly as it is in the French adaptation, wherein the German transcendentalism has been botched altogether; the opera at once entered upon a splendid run. French audiences, lively enough in a general way to a sense of the ridiculous, lost sight of all ludicrousness of dialogue and action in the spell of Christine Nilsson's voice. She became the talk of Paris; she "sang stars" as Mozart said of Mme. Lange, the original Queen of Night; she sang gold and silver as well—into the pocket of the happy manager of the Lyrique.

VI.

The reputation of the new star of the Lyrique, and the curiously long run, nearly 300 nights, of Mozart's fantastic opera achieved through her genius, naturally reached the ears of our London managers, at that time straining every nerve in rivalry. Luckily for Mr. Mapleson, he made the best bid for preference, and secured the Swedish prima donna at a time when he was being distanced in the race by his competitor. In 1867 Mr. Gye was having it all his own way; Mr. Mapleson was beginning to fall in the rear. At Covent Garden Patti still shone an undimmed star of brightness; Lucca, a fresher attraction, offered the stimulus of novelty and variety. At Her Majesty's there was Tietjens, incomparably great in opera of the broad heroic cast, but a presence to which the public had been used for successive seasons and now demanded a new excitement. Ilma de Muraka had been brought forward a season before, but audiences were but lukewarm at the best towards Mlle. de Muraka; and this year she had, in spite of promises, not appeared. Mongini, Santley and Trebelli, it is true, were still to the fore; but the opera-going multitude craved a special sensation, and, failing any particular novelty, went where they could enjoy beauty, youth, and espiglerie in Lucca and Patti.

The time was therefore ripe for a startling début: "the hour" had arrived, and with the hour "the woman." The 10th of June was advertised for the new singer's appearance; and some presentiment of delight—more likely some knowledge of the Lyrique artist's excellence borne hitherward by those who had seen her in Paris—crowded Her Majesty's Theatre to the roof. The "Traviata" was the opera advertised—at no time a favorite with English audiences, vu the character of the libretto and its groping into unholy ways. Still a foreign language covers a multitude of sins, and Verdi's music atones for another multitude. Added to this was the expectation that the new singer would condone all the remaining sins, if any more could be found. The theatre was crammed.

It was the story of Paris repeated. Christine Nilsson appeared and London capitulated. "One glance," wrote the Saturday Review, quoting Robert Schumann's remark on Schubert, "one glance, and the world shone fresh again." A murmur of admiration, harbinger of the interest to be gained, ran through the house at the apparition of the pale, slender, fair-haired divinity who was such a satire upon the naughty words she had to utter. "Grande, svelte, gracieuse," as the French critics had called her, she resembled in no whit the Italian ideal of Violetta. She that dissipated little personage who has to sing her conviction that "all the world is folly except that which is pleasure"! She the reveller who has to pour out all her soul in an invitation to drink, and who pursues her racy, reckless career until Boredom in the shape of old Germont, and consumption in the shape of interesting little coughs over a dainty handkerchief, put an end to her naughty life! The idea was absurd. This was simply a graceful gentlewoman, pure in look, refined in bearing, as distinct from the prototype of Dumas fils as Enid from Vivien, as Beatrice from Francesca.

It was her voice which opened the door of a new delight: and then that crowded audience recognized the beauty of the new conception. A pure soprano sforzato, bright and tender as a May morning and clear and limpid as a stream; an intonation faultlessly accurate; no strain, no attempt at forcing, but a natural power which made certain notes audible at a distance unattainable by stronger organs; these were the qualities at first recognizable in the impetuous "Libiamo ne' lieti calici." Then came "Ah fors è lui che anima," displaying a sympathetic quality of the lower tones, and producing so lively an impression of pleasure that bouquets thus early in the evening began to fall. But the singer had her work yet to perform, and the first large bouquet was laid upon the table, like a Bill, for further consideration. Later on, the wealth of bouquets became onerous.

As the opera advanced, so did the young singer in the hearts of her hearers. Refined as was her style of acting, gentle as her features, they lent themselves readily to every variety of emotion; thus the admiration which the appearance of Violetta awakened in the bedroom-scene became submerged in sympathy for her woes, soon as the unfortunate lady began to sing. The wail of regret for a lost past, with the sorrow suggested in the reed accompaniment, the growth of weakness in the frame and voice of the singer, and then the passionate burst at dying so young, which rang clear and bell-like throughout the house; combined to render the last act memorable. The artifices of Piccolomini and Bossio—artifices which used to give this act something of a charnel-house character—were left unemployed by Nilsson. She overstepped neither the modesty of nature nor the dignity of art. In particular, she abandoned the spasmodic cough and the other dismal indications of phthisis in its last stage, with which other artists had embellished the latter end of Violetta's career. In Nilsson's hand, the tragedy was capable of another signification. Violetta dies, but scarcely of consumption. She fades away, a victim to disappointed love, to unmanly scorn. The "melodious æther," in which, according to the French feuilletoniste, she dissolves, is the fitting Elysium for so sweet-singing a spirit. Bulwer in one of his plays talks of "melody like a happy soul released;" a vision which seems to take bodily presence in this impersonation of Violetta.

"A look, and the world shone fresh again." Mr. Mapleson found it so at all events. The fortunes of Her Majesty's suddenly took a new lease; rumor's thousand tongues and the more substantial testimony of the morning papers, spread abroad the new singer's fame; and the theatre was besieged for seats for the second performance. Thus was another parallel afforded between Nilsson and Jenny Lind. Christine had arrived in the very nick of time for Mr. Mapleson, as her predecessor and compatriot had for Mr. Lumley; and by virtue of her coming, defeat turned to victory. Once more the old opera-house reared its head and defied its adversary. Patti might sparkle, and Lucca languish; the Market envied not the Garden possession of such bright exotics. If the south had her passion-flower, the North had her snowdrop, her violet; and the world, without derogation to either growth, might take its choice.

That the season of 1867 declared for Nilsson was unmistakable. She was the new idea, the sensation. It remained for after appearances to solidify the sensation into an abiding sense.

Butterfly and Thistle.

By MRS. JULIA WARD HOWE.

O! delightful butterfly
At thy morning revelry!
Little bark with sails lateen,
With a many-colored sheen,
Like some fairy craft that flies
Where smooth-mirrored Venice lies.

Wings that thrill and flutter ever,
Mocking every rude endeavor,
With the passion of the speech
Set beyond thine insect reach.
Would we grasp thee, as men rush
After gold, or glory's flush,
Ill the haud of might we trust,

For thy feathers are but dust—
Say to our unloved insistence:
"Beauty shows but in God's distance."

This purple thistle is to thee
An islet in the summer sea
That images eternity.
As I ponder and rehearse
This poor idle morning's verse,
Here joy-anchored thou remainest
And thy brief elysium drainest.

Breezy sephyr sweeps the fields,
And the thistle sways and yields,
But the butterfly clings fast
As a sailor to the mast,
As a banner to the blast,
Which, when widest sweep its folds,
Firmest still its proud slave holds.

I who picture thee, this hour
Thus am clinging to my flower.
Winds on lofty errand sent Question me with sharp intent—
"Where's thy honey? where thy song?
Bee or bird, thou doest wrong."

Still I seek one last caress,
One more breath of joyousness.
O! my flower, the wealth thou hast
Softly in my soul hath passed.
When the happy summer day
That unveils thee flits away,
When Love's bloom has hurried by,
Know, thy butterfly will die,
Bearing to some gentler zone
Thy lost spirit with her own.

Thee how soon may I behold
Lifeless in thy shroud of gold!
Nothing in thy plaintive death
Wholesome Nature threateneth,
No pale corpse, with loathed ill;
But the little wings are still.
Vain the thistle keeps its growth,
Vain the breeze his challenge bloweth;
Thy gay pennon floats no more
From the æther's meadow-shore.

Might I, when my day is done,
Fall like thee, oh winged one!
No contagion leave, nor soil,
But a pure and harmless spoil,
One might keep with relics rare,
Saying to the stranger's stare:
"This she was, and she was fair."

—Hours at Home.

Liszt in Rome.—Chopin

Miss Anne Brewster writes to the Philadelphia Bulletin again as follows:

PIAZZA DI SPAGNA, ROME, ITALY, Tuesday, July 27, 1869.—Apropos to a report which I have read in some American papers lately of Abbé Liszt's movements and present musical occupations, I will give his own words. I asked him last Friday if he intended to go next month to Munich, to be present at Wagner's "Rheingold."

"Yes, if it is brought out," replied Liszt, "but I doubt very much if it will be."

The "Christ" Oratorio, which the newspaper paragraphs say Liszt is now engaged on, was composed some years ago, and was performed at the Centenary Fête in Rome. Abbé Liszt is engaged at present in preparing a method for advanced musical students. This celebrated artist, author, and composer leads a charming life in his fine airy rooms at the St. Francesca Romana convent buildings, the beautiful situation of which I have already described in a preceding letter. He has a little court of musical followers around him, at the head of which is the young Roman Raphael of music, Sgambati. Sgambati is a quiet, intelligent young man, a conscientious student, and jealous of every moment of his time. He is well up in the literature of his art too. Through his courtesy I am able to read that rare book, "Memorie Storico-Critiche di Giovanni Pierluigi,"—which in plain English means "The Critical Life of Palestrina," written by the great musician, Giuseppe Baini. Ever since I came to Rome I have been trying to get this work. One day, while talking to Sgambati, I found he owned it; instantly it was offered to me, and the next day he brought me the volumes. Since then I have been working away hard at them, and some of these days I shall give you a few precious bits from this curious and most agreeable, quaint old "Storico Critico."

While on the subject of music, I cannot help echoing the earnest wish of the Venice correspondent to this week's issue of the Correspondence de Rome.—our weekly Roman journal. This letter writer says: "We put up the most ardent wishes that the Council will interest itself in the reform of Church music. Venice gives us on this subject a case in point at St. Mark's this very day—a specimen of what some artists will do when not held in check by ecclesiastical authority. At this church is being sung a Vesper for the dead, to the high sounding music of a full orchestra, in which there is nothing to suggest a sigh or a tear!"

Ever since my residence in Rome I have been struck with the necessity for reform in church music. Modern Italian mass music is to me very repulsive. With the exception of the Pontifical masses, when the Pope's choir sings the true old Palestrina music, there is no church in Rome where I can listen patiently to the music. It is all florid and full of the most disagreeable suggestions of operatic scenes in Verdi's operas. Some of the good old ecclesiastics have never heard an opera in their lives, and are very ignorant of the objectionable character of the music performed before them. One day this Spring a Catholic friend and I alighted from the carriage as a procession passed by with the Sacred Host. The procession was a very fine one, and I was accompanied by a military band of one of the regiments. At the most solemn moment, the band struck up the drunken chorus from "La Belle Hélène! I forgot its name, but you will remember it, the droll, absurd scene in which Agamemnon and other Trojan heroes appear, with wreaths on their heads, wine cups in their hands, and in a state of beastly intoxication. Every one who has seen this disgusting but exquisitely droll travesty of the old story of "Veiled Sin," can form some idea of how shocked I felt.

On Friday I told Liszt that a lady who was with me at the time had lately read with much pleasure Mme. Sand's "Maitres Mosaiques," and had been delighted to see in the preface that the charming book had been written to the sound of his music.

"I have written few books," says Mme. Sand, "with as much pleasure as this. I was in the country during a summer as hot as the climate of Italy, which I had just left. Liszt played on the piano on the ground floor, and the nightingales, intoxicated with the music, sang in the surrounding lilacs."

This was written far off in 1837. Thirty-two years ago! Liszt's face grew bright as I repeated a few lines from the preface.

"Yes! yes!" he said, nodding his head and smiling. "Yes, I was visiting Mme. Sand at No. 10. The weather was indeed frightfully hot. She used to go to work at 8 o'clock in the evening, and I spent a great part of the time at the piano. At 3 o'clock in the morning we had a supper, and Mme. Sand read us the result of her evening's work. She wrote rapidly, very freely—hardly an erasure on the page."

Liszt has a great deal of fine humor, a little tinged with sarcasm, which is agreeably tempered by mid-age and religion. We were talking of a French author.

"Il a l'esprit, oui, il a l'esprit," said the Abbé, pouting out his lips, then added with a sharp, wicked twinkle of the eye, a little wave of the long fingers, and a lowering of the voice, "mais vous voyez c'est l'esprit Russe, l'esprit d'entresol."

This loses in translation, and has not half the force or piquancy when I say: "He has intelligence, but you see it is Russian intelligence, intelligence on the ground floor;" and yet I am sure, even in the English version, we can feel the keen sarcasm.

Even if Wagner's "Rheingold" is not presented at Munich this summer, the Goethe statue will be erected in that city on the 20th of August, the 12th birthday of the great German.

Before leaving this musical subject I will give you a young lady readers who are lovers of Chopin's music a charming story which a musical friend told me last evening. This friend had called, as is the Italian custom, to congratulate me on my fête day, St. Anne, which was yesterday, 26th of July. He brought me two pieces of music, one a Prayer to the Madonna, a song without words, by Talex, and those three Graces, the waltzes of Chopin, Opus 64.

When he played the one in C minor he asked me if I had ever heard the history of it, and told it to me.

It opens, as we know, with a sad movement, and then breaks into a mad, gay whirl, totally at variance with the beginning, and apparently having no connection with it. The first movement is repeated, but it should be played more as a memory of the original theme than as an actual representation of existing emotion—that is, according to the story, which is this:

Chopin called on Mme. Sand one day and was told she had been taken suddenly and violently ill. He returned to his rooms in extreme distress, sat down to the piano and composed, at once, this touching first movement—it was the expression of his great anxiety. While playing, a messenger came with word that Mme. Sand was better: the composer listened to the agreeable news in silence; then burst forth on the piano, with the wild, delirious passage which forms such a curious contrast to the first part of the waltz.

The Condition of Opera in England.

A sharp article in Macmillan's Magazine on "The Condition of Opera in England" takes the managers to task for putting art in the background by "the worship of one or two artists." The writer says:

"Were an illustration needed, one is supplied at Covent Garden. The present season may be summed up in the words 'Nilsson and Patti.' To these graceful and gifted ladies everybody and everything are subservient, from Mongini and Sautley down to the gentleman who nominally decides what works shall be played. He has really little choice. Mlle. Nilsson is famous as 'Marguerite,' 'Violetta,' 'Marta,' and 'Lucia,' while Mlle. Patti is equally famous as 'Amina,' 'Norina,' 'Zerlina,' and 'Rosina.' All that has to be done, therefore, is to put the ladies forward, turn and turn about, in one or other of the characters, so that the habitués see their favorites, get as much variety as they care for, and everybody worth propitiating is satisfied. Under any circumstances a Nilsson or a Patti would be the reigning 'star,' but here we have a vast establishment existing for and by them. The Covent Garden managers tried an experiment lately, and brought out an opera for the display of Signor Bottero's peculiar humor. Although the Signor came with a great reputation, in a character acknowledged his masterpiece, nobody cared, and the novelty of a primo uomo was exhausted by one representation. Moreover, at the same performance, the unapproachable Mlle. Tietjens was degraded to take part in a lever de rideau. Could there be a more bitter satire upon operatic taste?

"* * * "When less rich in the personal attractions of their singers, our managers did not entirely neglect unfamiliar works. A good many rarely-heard operas were promised us, and some actually given. At the old house, within the last few seasons, the public have been presented with Medea, Iphigenia and Il Seraglio; while the new house has brought out L'Africaine, Don Carlos, and Romeo et Juliette. This may not be much, but it is marvellous when compared with the barrenness upon which opera has now entered. The prospectus of the present season was in effect a list of prime donne; a list so strong that the management did not even think it worth while to promise anything, though knowing full well that the promises of a prospectus bind to nothing. True, the season has witnessed the production of Don Bucofalo and Hamlet; but the former was given for the sake of Signor Bottero, and the latter as part of the price of Mlle. Nilsson's services. Meanwhile, the house-bills have announced repetitions of Lucia, La Traviata, La Sonnambula, Don Giovanni (thanks be to the accident of Mme. Patti's 'Zerlina'), Faust and Il Barbiere, with a result showing that the directors well know their preference-public. Here, then, in this subordination of art to artist, we have one consequence of the system which makes opera a mere creature of fashion."

The same writer pays a compliment to New York: "The objector will probably declare that no other system is possible, without a resort to the continental plan of a state subvention. Unhappily for him there is an America, which explodes his argument by the simple logic of facts. The New York managers have no subvention, and yet they contrive to give satisfactory entertainments at prices ranging from one to two dollars. Their entertainment may not suggest Covent Garden extravagance, and the performances fall below the Covent Garden standard; but New York is no place to tolerate meanness and inefficiency."

Then follow some suggestions:

"Let the manager be free from obligation to conciliate any one class, and let him have the fullest liberty to act upon the general likings and dislikings. In brief, put him on the same footing as his dramatic brother; and, if he be permitted to run a good thing for a month he may make compensation by not running a bad one for a night.

"In the next place let the art be put at least on equal terms with the artist. No audience will be unjust to the claims of the latter but a musical audience is likely to insist upon some attention to the former, preferring that works should be selected for intrinsic merit rather than accidental agreement with a performer's powers. Under such circumstances a Bottero would have to serve the highest of art purposes, instead of that which is no higher than himself. The arrangement would render impossible not only Don Bucofalo, but also the wearisome repetition of shallow works chosen because they enable the heroine to 'bring down' the house by tours de force.

"Again, popular opera should avoid superfluous expenditure. For relays of artists beyond what might be necessary to keep up a good working company no demand would arise, while the costly magnificence which has for years absorbed so large a portion of Mr. Gye's receipts might easily be dispensed with. All these belong to a lavish and artificial régime, and have no necessary connection with opera at all. Big companies, an elaborate mise-en-scène, and armies of supernumeraries, are to opera what Charles Kean's 'aphrodisiac' was to Shakespeare—good enough as a spectacle, but quite superfluous. Reduced expenditure would secure moderate prices, and thus place the opera within reach of a large class now practically debarred from it. Dress must be left to individual good taste, and with sartorial regulations would disappear the last remnant of exclusiveness."

Prima Donnas.

From the Pall Mall Gazette.

The American gentleman who, having first thought of bringing up his son as a carpenter, afterwards determined to apprentice him to Hiram Powers, the sculptor, on the ground that "sculpting" seemed a more profitable trade, would doubtless, if he had been blessed with daughters, have educated the young ladies as prima-donnas. It is a brilliant profession. But then it is not every young lady who can sing; and to be thoroughly successful a prima-donna should possess a variety of gifts and acquirements in addition to perfect vocalization. She ought to be personally interesting; and the enthusiasm of an audience will be more easily roused if to her artistic accomplishments she unites great personal beauty. Of course she must be an excellent actress; and it is absolutely necessary that she should exhibit the most correct and refined taste in the matter of costume. All the qualities which Benedick deemed indispensable in a wife should belong, or seem to belong, to her; and to enjoy European favor, she must have several languages at her command. Italian, if not the first, should be the second language of every prima-donna; and the most successful of contemporary prima-donnas have, like Malibran, the most striking type of the class, possessed a complete mastery of several tongues. Perhaps the gift of language and the gift of song go to a certain extent together. At any rate several examples could be cited—two brilliant ones at the present time and close at hand—in which the highest faculty for musical language and a very high faculty for ordinary speech are combined. When the time comes for studying the prima-donna scientifically, it will be interesting and important to note the origin of the great prima-donnas who during the past and present century have from time to time enchanted Europe. They have, for the most part, displayed aristocratic qualities; they have been received into the aristocratic class, and, in many cases (Sontag, Crivelli, Alboni, Patti) have ended by forming part of it. But none of them have been of aristocratic birth; and what is far more remarkable is the fact that to very few does musical talent seem to have come by inheritance. Certainly not one has inherited her high artistic qualities from her immediate progenitors.

The public have but little idea of the indomitable energy that a great prima-donna should possess, called upon as she is during the season (and with a great prima-donna changing perpetually from capital to capital it is always and everywhere the season) to take part in morning rehearsals, afternoon concerts, evening representations, and often private concerts when the operatic representations are at an end; nor of the knowledge of society of various kinds and countries which a prima-donna of the highest class cannot, with such a varied life, fail to acquire. She ends by knowing something of the artistic, literary, and fashionable society of every capital in Europe, and has been on speaking as well as singing terms with the members of all the principal courts. The cosmopolitanism of the really absolute prime donna assoluta is one of the most remarkable things about them. Of the thousands of cantatrici who dream of competing, of the hundreds who actually compete, for the highest honors in the profession, of the dozen who are very near attaining those honors, there are scarcely more than two or three—certainly not half a dozen—by whom they are really gained; and from those fortunate few a certificate of nationality is the last thing that would be demanded. They may come from the United States or from Sweden, from Hamburg, Prague, or Pesth; the one thing necessary is that, possessing the rare qualifications we have spoken of, they shall sing habitually in the Italian language. They are more than cosmopolitan; for, instead of being citizens of the world—that is to say, of no city in particular—they are citizens of each city at which they happen to be engaged. Mme. Patti, independently of her operatic performances in Italian, sings "Home, sweet home" in London, "Solovei" in St. Petersburg, "Si vous n'avez rien à me dire" in Paris. Mlle. Nilsson, without counting her Swedish melodies, sings operatic music in Italian at Covent Garden, operatic music in French at the Académie de Paris, oratorio music in English at English festivals.

Prima-donnas do certainly receive immense salaries; but it must not be forgotten that their expenses—above all, travelling expenses and outlay for dress—are very great. They are for the most part charitable even to excess. They are surrounded at the theatre by attendants of all kinds who expect money for the most trifling services; their addresses are known to all the begging-letter writers; and when one of the principal mendicants of the metropolis fell, not long since, into the hands of the police, it is a fact that the name of a celebrated German prima-donna was found at the top of his list of probable benefactors. Then think of the number of occasions on which prima-donnas are asked to sing gratuitously, and in many cases actually consent to do so! "It is so little trouble for her to sing," it is argued. But it is still less trouble for a millionaire to write a check, in spite of which he is rarely so ready with a check for a large amount as the prima-donna of high repute is with her easily convertible notes. Nevertheless, after making due allowances for the prima-donna's inevitable expenditure, the fact remains that she is exceedingly well paid. Indeed, no one among women receives a larger income, apart from property, except she be an empress or a queen. There is this difference, however: that the income of the sovereign (harring revolutions) is for life, while that of the prima-donna is only for the life of her voice; which, however, in the case of a happily-constituted prima-donna may fairly be reckoned at twenty-five years, say from seventeen to forty-two. Among men, no minister of State is so highly paid as Mme. Patti was last winter at St. Petersburg. The salary of a first-rate prima-donna is about equal to that of an ambassador (say £12,000 a year); and she retains the right, denied to the unfortunate ambassador, of receiving presents.

Indeed, those who judge of the worth of others by what they conceive to be their own personal value are often shocked to find that our most popular prima-donnas are so magnificently paid. It is clear, moreover, that a priest, a professor, a judge, do exercise much more important social functions than the greatest of prima-donnas; only being less rare, and their services being less eagerly sought after by the rich multitude, they receive more slender remuneration. For it is not, of course, the rarity alone; it is the rarity combined with rare excellence of the prima-donna, in which her attractiveness lies. Any luna nature is rare. But nature is not in a freakish mood, she is in a smiling mood when she creates the perfect prima-donna, who may well be called surrisus nature. When it was stated some years ago in the Court of Bankruptcy what amount of salary was paid to a celebrated first soprano at the Royal Italian Opera, the learned commissioner exclaimed that that was twice the salary of a puisne judge; and nearly a century before that, the Empress Catherine, when she heard what terms La Gabrielle required, is said to have replied that "that was more than she gave to any of her marshals." Thereupon, as the story goes, Gabriel recommended the Empress to get her marshals to sing; and probably a Russian field-marshal of the last century would have cut as queer a figure on the operatic stage as an English judge might be expected to do in the present day.

The truth is, the prima-donna, though largely and often profoundly adored, has not yet been sufficiently studied—certainly not in that calm spirit of investigation which it is necessary but very difficult to bring to the contemplation of so charming a subject. From star-worship to astronomy would be a great step, but if the nature of the operatic star were thoroughly understood, its distinctive attributes would be found, we are sure, to be even of a higher kind than passing devotees usually imagine.

The Critic's Duty.

To the Editors of the New York Evening Post.

It is impossible for any candid and clear-minded person to look through the journals and magazines without being painfully convinced that very few of them contain criticisms of any value at all. This is most distinctly felt when we compare their current reviews and criticisms with those standard productions of the same character which have had a permanent influence on intelligent opinion. When we turn from any such papers to our current critical literature, a humiliating conviction of the little value of the latter, with a few honorable exceptions, is forced upon us. An absence of the careful study of the work in hand, an equal absence of that close and keen analysis without which criticism is worthless—in short, a pitious carelessness and superficiality are the distinguishing characteristics of what passes for criticism.

There is a certain jargon in use among our critics at present—a form of words which at the first glance is sufficiently imposing; there is sometimes a good deal of racy sarcasm, and sometimes a graceful encomium, but very little which bears close examination, and still less which is of the slightest assistance to authors or artists. And this it is which is sorely needed in a country like ours, where all departments are open to all, and where a vast amount of superficial work is forced before the public. Just now, the press, the Academy of Design, the stage, the lecturer's desk, the concert room, are all flooded with it; and well-trained, thoughtful and conscientious critics, by sifting the chaff from the wheat, could render great service, not alone to young aspirants for literary and artistic honors, but also to the long-suffering and not sufficiently fastidious public. In older countries, where criticism is made more strictly a profession, it is really in one sense not as much needed as it is here; because there, education is slow, minute and thorough, and before making a venture in any department of art or literature an amount of training is often acquired which is here quite unattainable, at least without an expenditure of time and patience distasteful to most of our minds. Whoever, therefore, has a gift, or thinks that he has a gift, waits not to polish or develop it, but makes the first trial of his powers before the public, and the public is, as we have said, not sufficiently fastidious, and tolerates much which never ought to be tolerated at all. Certainly, were the reading public as exacting as it might be, it would scorn that which the majority of our journals and reviews set before it as criticism.

Some thoughtful and cultivated people have dreamed that the American mind is scarcely capable of producing good criticism. But in fact there is much critical capacity lying fallow here, simply because the owners of it do not think it worth while to use it conscientiously and laboriously; perhaps, also, because they do not understand what really noble and efficient service they might render to art and literature by its thorough and zealous exercise. This requires, we must admit, no small amount of patience, perseverance and self-denial. For, it is very hard certainly to prepare deliberately and carefully for any one branch of criticism when we daily see people assuming—and apparently with success—the office of critics without any previous preparation; and equally hard to spend the time and patience which must necessarily be spent in study and analyzing what we would criticize conscientiously and well, when perhaps the success of the article would be as great were it dismissed with a few graceful phrases which would read smoothly, but after all mean nothing. At present there is little, perhaps, in the aspect of literary affairs which would encourage any young critic to this laborious and perhaps unrewarded exertion. But we firmly believe that if a beginning were made by a few the reward would surely follow.

Most of our young critics attempt too many subjects, forgetting that no human being, however finely qualified by nature, can possibly be possessed of the training requisite to form a critical judgment of any value on more than two, or at most three, branches of art. Not long since we were conversing with a young man who filled the office of critic in five newspapers, on literature, painting, sculpture, music and the drama. He ran off the list of subjects, any two of which would suffice for the study of a lifetime, with an air of such capacity and easy assurance that we were almost dazzled into a belief of his powers commensurate with his own. Within a week we had an opportunity of comparing several critiques of his.

They are what we might have expected—what, indeed, was inevitable—slight, shallow and superficial. Not that there was not plenty of natural ability, but that it was spread over too wide a surface, and the result was mere surface work. Our young friend is, unhappily, the type of a very large class of youths, who, gifted with fatal facility of expression, allow themselves to be tempted thereby to undertake just twice as much as can be well or thoughtfully performed. But earnestly would we urge upon the gifted young men and women who hold the position of critics for our newspapers and magazines to remember that, after all, it is good work alone which endures and is remembered. To-day, the pretty little painted paper boat goes dancing down the stream of Time beside its more solid companions, and for a little while it seems to stand the stress of weather and rough usage as well. But only for a little while. It sinks ere long, as all frail things do and must. Only that which the mind has strained to achieve, and on the perfecting of which time has been expended, fails of sinking in the ever-rushing flood which is hearing both ourselves and our work onward either to immortality or oblivion.

How it Looked and felt in the Coliseum.

The best description of the scene is that by Mr. Howells in his delightful Atlantic Monthly article, entitled "Jubilee Days." We must copy here a portion of it, by way of supplementing and completing our own drier record.

There was, in fact, something in the sight of the Coliseum, as we approached it, which was a sufficient cause of elation to whoever is buoyed up by the flutter of bright flags, and the movement in and about holiday booths, as I think we are all apt to be. One may not have the stomach of happier days for the swing or the whirligig; he may not drink soda-water, intemperately; pop-corn may not tempt him, nor tropical fruits allure; but he beholds them without gloom,—nay, a grin inevitably lights up his countenance at the sight of a great show of these amusements and refreshments. And any Bostonian might have felt proud that morning that his city did not hide the light of her mercantile merit under a bushel, but blazoned it about on the booths and walls in every variety of printed and painted advertisement. To the mere æsthetic observer, these vast placards gave the delight of brilliant color, and blended prettily enough in effect with the flags; and at first glance I received quite as much pleasure from the frescos that advised me where to buy my summer clothing, as from any bunting I saw.

I had the good fortune on the morning of this first Jubilee day to view the interior of the Coliseum when there was scarcely anybody there,—a trifle of ten thousand singers at one end, and a few thousand other people scattered about over the wide expanses of parquet and galleries. The decorations within, as without, were a pleasure to the eyes that love gaiety of color; and the interior was certainly magnificent, with those long lines of white and blue drapery roofing the balconies, the slim, lofty columns festooned with flags and drooping banners, the arms of the States decking the fronts of the galleries, and the arabesques of painted muslin everywhere. I do not know that my taste concerned itself with the decorations, or that I have any taste in such things; but I testify that these tints and draperies gave no small part of the comfort of being where all things conspired for one's pleasure. The airy amplitude of the building, the perfect order and the perfect freedom of movement, the ease of access and exit, the completeness of the arrangements that in the afternoon gave all of us thirty thousand spectators a chance to behold the great spectacle as well as to hear the music, were felt, I am sure, as personal favors by every one. These minor particulars, in fact, served greatly to assist you in identifying yourself, when the vast hive swarmed with humanity, and you became a mere sentient atom of the mass.

I do not know if I shall be able to give an idea of the immensity of this scene; but if such a reader as has the dimensions of the Coliseum accurately fixed in his mind will, in imagination, densely hide all that interminable array of benching in the parquet and the galleries and the slopes at either end of the edifice with human heads, showing here crowns, there occiputs, and yonder faces, he will perhaps have some notion of the spectacle as we beheld it from the northern hillside. Some thousands of heads nearest were recognizable as attached by the usual neck to the customary human body, but for the rest, we seemed to have entered a world of cherubim. Especially did the multitudinous singers seated far opposite encourage this illusion; and their fluttering fans and handkerchiefs wonderfully mocked the movement of those cravat-like pinions which the fancy attributed to them. They rose or sank at the wave of the director's baton; and still looked like an innumerable flock of cherubs drifting over some slope of Paradise, or settling upon it,—if cherubs can settle.

The immensity was quite as striking to the mind as to the eye, and an absolute democracy was appreciable in it. Not only did all artificial distinctions cease, but those of nature were practically obliterated, and you felt for once the full meaning of unanimity. No one was at a disadvantage; one was as wise, as good, as handsome as another. In most public assemblages, the foolish eye roves in search of the vanity of female beauty, and rests upon some lovely visage, or pretty figure; but here it seemed to matter nothing whether ladies were well or ill-looking; and one might have been perfectly æsthetic without self-denial. A blue eye or a black,—what of it? A mass of blond or chestnut hair, this sort of walking-dress or that,—you might note the difference casually in a few hundred around you; but a sense of those myriads of other eyes and chignons and walking-dresses absorbed the impression in an instant, and left a dim, strange sense of loss, as if all women had suddenly become Woman. For the time, one would have been preposterously conceited to have felt his littleness in that crowd; you never thought of yourself in an individual capacity at all. It was as if you were a private in an army, or a very ordinary billow of the sea, feeling the battle or the storm, in a collective sort of way, but unable to distinguish your sensations from those of the mass. If a rafter had fallen and crushed you and your unimportant row of people, you could scarcely have regarded it as a personal calamity, but might have found it disagreeable as a shock to that great body of humanity. Recall, then, how astonished you were to be recognized by some one, and to have your hand shaken in your individual character of Smith. "Smith? My dear What's-your-name, I am for the present the fifty-thousandth part of an enormous emotion!"

It was as difficult to distribute the various facts of the whole effect, as to identify one's self. I had only a public and general consciousness of the delight given by the harmony of hues in the parquet below; and concerning the orchestra I had at first no distinct impression save of the three hundred and thirty violin bows held erect like standing wheat at one motion of the director's wand, and then falling as if with the next he swept them down. Afterwards files of men with horns, and other files of men with drums and cymbals discovered themselves; while far above all, certain laborious figures pumped or ground with incessant obeisance at the apparatus supplying the organ with wind.

What helped, more than anything else, to restore you your dispersed and wandering individuality was the singing of Parepa-Rosa, as she triumphed over the harmonious rivalry of the orchestra. There was something in the generous amplitude and robust cheerfulness of this great artist that accorded well with the ideal of the occasion; she was in herself a great musical festival; and one felt, as she floated down the stage with her far-spreading white draperies, and swept the audience a colossal courtesy, that here was the embodied genius of the Jubilee. * * *

When Parepa (or Prepper, as I have heard her name popularly pronounced) had sung, the revived consciousness of an individual life rose in rebellion against the oppression of all that dominant vastness. In fact, human nature can stand only so much of any one thing. To a certain degree you accept and conceive of facts truthfully, but beyond this a mere fantasticality rules; and having got enough of grandeur, the senses played themselves false. That array of fluttering and tuning people on the southern slope began to look minute, like the myriad heads assembled in the infinitesimal photograph which you view through one of those little half-inch lorgnettes; and you had the satisfaction of knowing that to any lovely infinitesimality yonder you showed no bigger than a carpet-tack. The whole performance now seemed to be worked by those tireless figures pumping at the organ, in obedience to signals from a very alert figure on the platform below. The choral and orchestral thousands sang and piped and played; and at a given point in the scene from Verdi, a hundred fairies in red shirts marched down through the sombre mass of puppets and beat upon as many invisible anvils.

This was the stroke of anti-climax; and the dull sound of those anvils, so far above all the voices and instruments in its pitch, thoroughly disillusioned you and restored you finally to your proper entity and proportions. It was the great error of the great Jubilee, and where almost everything else was noble and impressive,—where the direction was faultless, and the singing and instrumentation as perfectly controlled as if they were the result of one volition,—this anvil-beating was alone ignoble and discordant, —trivial and huge merely. Not even the artillery accompaniment, in which the cannon were made to pronounce words of two syllables, was so bad.

The dimensions of this magazine bear so little proportion to those of the Jubilee, that I must perforce leave most of its features unnoticed; but I wish to express the sense of enjoyment which prevailed (whenever the anvils were not beaten) over every other feeling, even over wonder. To the ear as to the eye it was a delight, and it was an assured success in the popular affections from the performance of the first piece. For my own part, if one pleasurable sensation, besides that received from Parepa's singing, distinguished itself from the rest, it was that given by the performance of the exquisite Coronation March from Meyerbeer's "Prophète"; but I say this under protest of the pleasures taken in the choral rendering of the "Star-Spangled Banner." Closely allying themselves to these great raptures were the minor joys of wandering freely about from point to point, of receiving fresh sensations from the varying lights and aspects in which the novel scene presented itself with its strange fascinations, and of noting, half consciously, the incessant movement of the crowd as it revealed itself in changing effects of color. Then the gay tumult of the fifteen minutes of intermission between the parts, when all rose with a surplus of innumerable silks, and the thousands of pretty singers fluttered about, and gossiped tremulously and delightedly over the glory of the performance, revealing themselves as charming feminine personalities, each with her pique or pride, and each her something to tell her friend of the conduct, agreeable or displeasing, of some particular him! Even the quick dispersion of the mass at the close was a marvel of orderliness or grace, as the melting and separating parts, falling asunder, radiated from the centre, and flowed and rippled rapidly away, and left the great hall empty and bare at last.

And as you emerged from the building, what bizarre and perverse feeling was that you knew? Something as if all-out-doors were cramped and small, and it were better to return to the freedom and amplitude of the interior!

NEW HISTORY OF MUSIC.—In all Europe, there is no name more widely known in the literature of music than that of M. F. J. Fétis. Some thirty years ago he published his "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens," and he now announces as complete his long-looked-for "Histoire Générale de la Musique depuis les temps les plus anciens jusqu'à nos jours." In eight volumes, the first of which is just issued from the press of Firmin Didot. Judging from the first volume, and from what we know of the author, his work will be found to be no mere review—a pretext for ingenious research and elegant dissertation—but a thorough presentation of all that science and erudition can do for so vast a subject. The labor of fifty years of the first literary musician of Europe on such a theme cannot fail to produce a work that will create an epoch in the historiography of his art. Treated by him, the history of music is the reconstruction of an important fragment of the history of humanity. Music, says M. Fétis, "is the ideal art par excellence. Unlike poetry, painting, or statuary, it is not intended to produce the manifestation of determined ideas, or the representation of external objects; but its province is to awaken emotions and express sentiments whose endless modifications escape analysis. The poems of Homer, of Pindar, and of Anacreon fathered the poetry of Latin antiquity, of the Middle Ages, and of modern times; something of them may be found in the productions of the most original geniuses; Homer and Virgil still live in the poetical apocalypses of Dante, whose original creations have inspired his successors; the tragedy of Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles may be partly found in the tragedies of to-day; the statues and bas-reliefs of our artists differ but little in their aim from the productions of Phidias and Praxiteles, and not always do they excel them; to the art of the Grecian painters our modern artists have added nothing but perspective and more skillful shading of color; the object sought to be represented, which is nature, still remains the same. Music on the contrary—vague in its essence and sublime in its effects—has, in the multiplicity of its forms, nothing identical but sound and time. Among the peoples of India, in China, among the Arabs, among the Greeks, in the mediæval plain chants, in the harmonic combinations of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, in the popular melodies of different nations, finally, in the dramatic or instrumental productions of our day, the art so little resembles itself that we feel tempted to attribute it to as many diverse origins. Imitation of nature is, within a certain limit, the necessary principle in the arts of design; that of music is spontaneous emotion." And this cannot be called mere enthusiastic eloquence; though whether we should allow M. Fétis the word "ideal" to use as he uses it is a question. To defy analysis and to be most emotional is not to be truly ideal in the highest degree, though there is a school which seems to hold the belief—a school in literature as well as in other fields of human activity.—Nation.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 28, 1869.

The Musical Prospect.

Of course everybody asks, what Music shall we have this coming Winter? The answer, as yet, must be rather vague and general. There is no cause to fear that we may miss any of the important features of the last concert seasons, with the single exception, we regret to say, of the classical chamber concerts of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. These five gentlemen, so long and honorably identified with our chief opportunities of hearing and enjoying the violin Quartets, Quintets, &c., of the great masters in that kind, have had such tempting experience in their excursions "out West" for a month or two at a time during the last two years, that for the present they regard the call from that quarter of the wide field as paramount and instant. Leaving Boston in October, they propose to pass the entire winter and spring in giving concerts in the Western cities. That they will scatter good seed there, we have no doubt. But it will be a loss to us, for Boston has not so many good musicians, especially when it comes to the matter of selecting a grand orchestra, that it can afford to spare, even for a season, five of the most accomplished, including the almost indispensable violoncello and artist-like presence of WULF FRIKE, as well as the sure and telling violin of WILLIAM SCHULTZE who has sat so many years at the head of the strings.

Their chamber concerts, latterly, have been reduced to four in a winter, so that our destitution will not seem so great as if we had not been let down gently to it by degrees. Moreover, nature abhors a vacuum, and in the present advanced state of musical culture, and increased demand, there need be no fear that other and fresh forces will not rush in to fill this one, gratifying our curiosity at least with new interpretations of works which we have always known in only one way. Probably the new Quartet party of the Brothers LISTERMANN, after the successful experiment of last year, will be ready to do more and better now. And Boston with its Festivals, its Oratorios, its Symphony concerts, &c., is getting to be such a Mecca for musicians, and for music-lovers, that we shall not wonder at any rich invoice of artists suddenly arriving in our harbor any day.

Then, whatever the Muses grant us or withhold in the way of purely stringed Quartets, &c., we can hardly fail of being rich again in other kinds of choicest Chamber Music. In classical pianists we are always strong; and although Mr. DRESSEL will remain abroad another winter (incalculably to the loss of music here in every best sense), and Mr. LANG, too, means to pass a year in Germany (another great loss), we still have LEONHARD and PERABO and PETERSILEA and PARKER, and other good ones within call, who, with the aid of our best violinists, and our vocalists so heartily devoted to the finest kinds of German song, will furnish edifying entertainment in more ways than one.

To pass from smaller things to great, the Symphony Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association will be as many and as good as usual. They will be given as heretofore on alternate Thursday afternoons, ten in number, beginning on the 4th of November. Further particulars about the programmes, &c., will be made known in ample season. We shall miss from the orchestral ranks the Quintette Club, as we have said; but the country is full of good musicians, and the motto of the Society at all events is still "Excelsior."

The Government of the Handel and Haydn Society were never more in earnest. We do not know that they have decided on the list of Oratorios to be brought out. But there is one important piece of news which we are quite safe in telling: This time, it appears to be really a settled thing that Bach's great Passion Music (after the gospel of St. Matthew), will be taken up and studied with the design of producing it in Passion Week. The full score (as edited by Robert Franz) and orchestral parts were procured from Germany last winter, but too late to enter upon so formidable a task at that time. The voice parts for the double chorus will soon be in readiness. Messrs. Ditson & Co. already have them in the engravers' hands, and are preparing to publish an octavo edition (like their Mendelssohn and Handel oratorios after the pattern of Novello) of the entire work for voices and pianoforte, with both German and English words—the latter translated here expressly with the utmost care to keep them as close as possible in spirit, sense and form to the original text, antiquated and quaintly pietistic as it is, while scrupulously studying in every syllable and vowel sound Bach's never careless marriage of the word and tone.—Thus there will be plenty of copies of the full vocal score, at a moderate price, both for the singers to sing from, and for the inquiring listener to look over while he listens, or to study at his leisure. For an American publisher this is a bold venture and an honorable one. But we believe it will repay in the long run. Bach's Matthew Passion is bound to take its place in the repertoire of the great Choral Societies in this country, as it has long since done all over Germany, where it is performed in a dozen places every year, as it has done too in London, where it is to be revived next winter, and even in Paris, witness the interest it excited at the Pantheon a year ago. With us it is a question of time only; it may never be popular, but it will be, it is already, in such demand, that it cannot be kept out of the market or the concert-room much longer. For our old Oratorio Society, too, it is a brave, bold undertaking; perhaps the boldest step they could take; with due faith and persistency it will not prove a rash one. Why should they not essay the boldest, the most difficult of tasks? They have for years been taking all the arduous steps that lead right up to it; they have mastered Handel's Oratorios, except the Israel, which yet waits for adequate performance; they have had great success with St. Paul, which is a stepping stone to Bach; they have even triumphed signally in the whilome discouraging choruses of the Ninth Symphony. What task remains, what further height to gain, if they would still make progress, but to grapple manfully with and solve the long postponed problem of the great religious music of Sebastian Bach? Even if they do not succeed in doing it very perfectly, or more than passably at first, for want especially of great solo singers masters, of the (here) rare art of recitative, still the effort will reward with a sweet sense of progress, it will inspire and charm with a new knowledge, a new love, with the beginning of a new possession that shall grow sweeter and richer the more deeply they enter into it and realize it.

The new oratorio society, the Boston Choral Union, under the direction of Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, has plans, we hear, of more enlarged activity. And in a more private way, yet every year enjoyable to hosts of invited friends, we have still Mr. Parker's admirable Club of mixed voices, and the German Orpheus for male part-songs and choruses,—the latter now under Mr. ZERRAHN's direction, illness having prevented Mr. KREISSMANN from meeting as often as he wished with his old associates, with whose musical progress and pleasures he has been identified from the beginning. Mr. Kreissmann, however, is the musical head of

A NEW GERMAN SINGING CLUB, of mixed voices, of which the Boston Journal gives the following information:

It is called the Cæcilien-Verein, and is composed of both male and female voices—Germans, or Americans who are able to sing in German. The admission of ladies as singers is a feature which distinguishes it from the Orpheus Society and the generality of the German singing clubs of our country, although in the Liedertrens of New York, and in one or two other of the large associations of that class, ladies are admitted to membership, and to a participation in the musical exercises, although such organizations also maintain a separate or distinctive existence as Männerchöre, or male choirs. In Germany, singing societies composed of mixed voices are very common, as they are in England and America, and they invariably draw together the first vocal talent. The formation of such a society in Boston will open to us a new mine of good music, for the German part-songs already made familiar here, are almost exclusively compositions for male voices only. The enterprise is in the best of hands, and the Musical Director is an enthusiastic and untiring worker, as well as an artist of acknowledged ability. He has contributed very greatly already to the advancement of musical art among us, and his name is a guaranty that whatever is attempted will be well done and that the highest ends of music will be served. There is to be an active and passive membership, and the rolls already include some of our best resident vocalists and patrons of music, some of whom, ladies as well as gentlemen, are well known as solo artists. Messrs. Chickering & Sons have very kindly placed their elegant hall at the disposal of the Society for its meetings and rehearsals, which will take place for the present every Wednesday evening. On Wednesday evening last, a constitution and by-laws were adopted, and the following officers were elected: Musical Director, August Kreissmann; Treasurer, Carl Schraubstücker; Librarian, Carl Pruesse. Several musical selections were sung with very excellent effect, although no preliminary practice had taken place. Public concerts will probably be given in the course of the winter.

This new St. Cecilia Club (may it grow to rival the excellence of its prototype, the Cæcilien-Verein of Frankfurt on the Main!) will occupy a sphere which needed to be filled. There are rich and various treasures of choral composition, secular and sacred, of more moderate length than Oratorios, such works for instance as Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," the religious Cantatas of Bach, church compositions of old Italian masters, &c., of all hearing of which we have been thus far deprived, except so far as Mr. Parker's Club has given glimpses of their wealth. These fields our German Cæcilia propose to cultivate. They already number over thirty voices, and we trust they will in time be strong enough to bring out such works in full with orchestra. At present they are engaged in the practice of Schumann's Zigeuner-Leben ("Gypsy Life"), to be followed by the Ballad "Schön Ellen," by Max Brach, and Hauptmann's Salve Regina. Later in the winter's programme they have set down for them the following sterling sacred works, by old German and Italian masters, all as arranged by Robert Franz, to-wit: Handel's Jubilate; one of the Cantatas by J. S. Bach; Durante's Magnificat; Astorga's Stabat Mater. Rich promise truly!

The Great Organ we have always with us. It still plays, or is played with, every Wednesday and Saturday noon for an hour. If the noble instrument always fulfilled its functions as worthily as when we listened there last Saturday, it would be a comfort to true music-lovers and a gain to music. Mr. LANG played, beginning with a Concerto in G major by Bach (Allegro, Andante, Presto), not by any means one of the greater works of the old master, but genial and graceful for an introduction. Then the larger half of the hour was occupied with his own transcription, thoughtfully and tastefully made, of all three movements of the Orchestral Symphony to Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," as delicate a piece of organ coloring, well contrasted and connected, smoothly flowing, happily reflecting the orchestral traits, as we have ever heard upon that instrument, and beautifully executed. If we must have orchestral music on the organ, let it be like that. Another point of interest was an original Prelude and Fugue in D minor by an amateur of this city, a gentleman deeply read and practically well versed in music, as this first publicly disclosed specimen of his work shows. Mr. JOSIAH BRADLEE. After a spirited arpeggio prelude, a regular Fugue is built on a theme resembling that of Handel's "And with His stripes," followed by a second subject also well worked up, with episodes, the whole ending in a Choral richly harmonized. It made a very good impression.

HUMBOLDT FESTIVAL.—It is fit that Americans as well as Germans, in their own land, and here uniting with us as well as in their own way by themselves, should celebrate the Centennial Anniversary of the birth of ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT, one of the greatest men of the past century, whether as a scientific student and teacher of the laws of nature, or as a foremost representative of culture in the largest sense, or as a great lover of our country and of freedom, one of the wisest friends and benefactors of the human race. It occurs on the 14th of September. A committee of the Boston Society of Natural History, very fitly, have taken the matter in hand, and adding to their number from the citizens at large, announce appropriate services at the Music Hall at 3:12 o'clock that day. Boston has an advantage over all other places celebrating the day, in being able to call upon Professor AGASSIZ for the address. No man living could do fuller justice to the theme. Our German fellow citizens, through their various organizations, warmly coöperate, particularly the Orpheus Musical Society, who, increasing their number to some sixty or seventy voices, are practising some of their best part-music for the occasion. There will also be a good orchestral piece or two, conducted by Mr. ZERRAHN, and perhaps other music. For Humboldt was a zealous and appreciative friend of Music and of Art as well as Science; the author of the "Kosmos" knew the Greek word in both its senses, one of which is Beauty.

It is hoped that the celebration will bring together many distinguished friends of science and of culture. The price of tickets is put at $2.00 and $1.00, not only in the belief that the exercises will be interesting enough to warrant it, but mainly for a solid, practical good end, namely, to found a "Humboldt Scholarship," at the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy, the noble creation of Agassiz, in Cambridge.

Mr. ERNST PERABO, our remarkable young pianist, at the request of friends in Cleveland, Ohio, gave there on Monday, Aug. 9, a Matinée of Classical Music, with this programme:

Dedication Overture, Op. 124, (G major),	Beethoven.
Sonata, Op. 27, No. 1, (E flat major),	Beethoven.
Scherzo, from the Midsummer Night's Dream, (G minor),	Mendelssohn.
Six Variations, Op. 81, (F major),	Beethoven.
Grande Sonata, Op. 106, (B flat major),	Beethoven.

Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA, also, has been concertizing, with success, in Milwaukee and other Western cities.

NEW YORK.—The French Theatre will open its doors on the 11th of September to a far pleasanter sort of entertainment than the revels of last Winter, and, as we trust, to a long lease of popular favor. The Parepa-Rosa English Opera Company will then begin a short season—fifteen nights only—with Balfe's "Puritan's Daughter," an operafull of charming melodies and pretty stage effects, and one which will give opportunity for nearly all the members of the large troupe to make their bow and receive a pleasant welcome. The star of the company is, of course, Mme. Rosa herself. The young English prima donna, Rose Hersee, will soon arrive, and be ready with "La Sonnambula," by the time we are tired of "The Puritan's Daughter."

After a tour through the provincial wilderness, the Rosas will return about Christmas time, and give several interesting novelties—among them

Weber's "Oberon." The troupe includes the charming young contralto, Mrs. Seguin, Miss Fannie Stockton, Mr. Castle, Mr. Nordblom, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lawrence (a new baritone), Mr. G. F. Hall, and other favorites.

The great high C tenor Wachtel, has changed his mind about coming to America, and concluded to stay at home. It may possibly be a consolation to some people, however, to learn that Mme. Anna Bishop is coming. The French Opera Company which has taken the Academy of Music remains an impenetrable mystery, the only ascertained facts about it being that some sanguine manager has paid an installment of the rent, and that Roger and Mme. Saxe, being importuned to join the company, have both refused. It is said to be certain now that Nilsson is not coming, though it is also certain that she was engaged, and that Tietjens is not coming either.

While so many people are not coming, it is the most natural thing in the world that we should try to keep those who are here from going away, and we are consequently not surprised to learn that certain stockholders of the Academy are trying to obtain a release of Miss Kellogg from her contract with Maurice Strakosch, and to organize with her an Italian Opera Company under the management of Maretzek. We hope they may succeed. If they do not, we fear the Academy this Winter will be as deserted as a haunted house, which, considering the awful deeds that have been done there, it well might be.—Tribune, 21st.

THE PARIS CONSERVATOIRE.—The annual examination of the pupils of the Imperial Conservatoire was commenced on the 21st ult. and has just been concluded. Among the "judges" or, as we should term them, examiners, have been the veteran Anber, the president, M. Ambroise Thomas and other eminent French musicians. The pieces chosen for the competition for the first prize for pianoforte playing was the allegro de concert in E major by Chopin. So excellent was the playing that a double first prize was given to M. M. Auzende and Cavaille, who are described as "pianists of great promise and excellent musicians." There were sixteen competitors. The young ladies who entered the lists for the same instrument numbered thirty-five; they played the fourth Concerto of Ries in A [?] sharp minor. Five first prizes were given. The singing this year by the male pupils is described as not being very satisfactory, so far as the quality of the voice was concerned, but the ladies were better, Mlle. Marie Minen taking the chief honors. The performance on the stringed instruments, always, says the Revue et Gazette Musicale, excites most interest among musicians while it fails to attract the general public. The work chosen for the violoncellists of whom nine took prizes, was a concerto in E minor, by Piatel, a composer who died in 1835, and although comparatively forgotten now, was well known as a virtuoso in his own day. Twenty-four violinists competed in Viotti's concerto in A minor, displaying remarkable talent. The following were the number of pupils who competed in the other subjects. Grand Opera, 11 male, 6 female; the drama 6 and 23; the flute 6; oboe 9, clarinet 7; bassoon 2; horn 7; cornet à pistons, civil, 4, military 5; trumpet 7; trombone à coulisse, civil, 1, military (on the system of M. Sax) 2; saxophone, military 11; saxhorn, military 3. The distribution of the prizes was fixed for Thursday last.—London Choir, Aug. 7.

The Ecole de Musique Religieuse, founded in Paris by Louis Niedermeyer, and now directed by his son-in-law, celebrated on Wednesday the inauguration of a bust of its founder, and a distribution of prizes. Among the compositions rendered with great spirit in a concert may be mentioned a Salve Regina by Orlando Lassus, and a madrigal by Orlando Gibbon. The bust was then uncovered, and addresses delivered, panegyricizing the career of the composer of "Le Lac," "L'Isolément," "L'Automne," "La Fronde," and the fine Mass in B minor, and the founder of the School to which he devoted the last years of his life.

HANDEL'S "ACIS AND GALATEA was revived at the Princess's Theatre, London, on the 2nd inst. The Athenæum says of it:

The revival of "Acis and Galatea" with all the scenic accessories that marked the production of the serenata by Mr. Macready, at Drury Lane, will interest play-goers of almost every class. Those whose taste has been formed or defurred on the sensation scenes of late years, will find plenty in "Acis," as now given at the Princess's, to engage their attention; while many will be curious to hear, on the stage, music, that in the concert room is familiar enough.

No pains have been spared to equal the famous revival at Drury Lane, in 1842. Clarkson Stanfield's original designs have been freely used in the exquisitely beautiful Sicilian views; while in the groupings of the crowd of simply-robed attendants there is evidence of a refined intelligence but rarely witnessed on our stage. The principal characters are as well represented as we can expect them to be at a time when no encouragement is given for the cultivation of English dramatic singing. The afternoon operatic performances at the Crystal Palace have had the effect of bringing to the surface a young singer who, for lack of such opportunity, might long have remained in obscurity. Miss Blanche Cole has not yet acquired the art of singing Handel's music with fitting emphasis, but she gives full promise for the future. Her bright voice is naturally flexible, and it is directed, as it seems to us, by active intelligence. Miss Cole has much to learn, but she has plenty of time before her. Mr. Vernon Rigby's voice told better in the bold phrase "Love sounds the alarm," than in the gracious melody of Acis's incomparable song to his mistress's eyes. Far better, however, in intention, feeling and execution was Mr. Montem Smith's delivery of Damon's airs, and infinitely worse was Herr Formes's false singing of the Giant's rugged love song, "O, ruddier than the cherry." We fail to see any good reason for the introduction of Cupid; and in spite of the Drury Lane precedent, we would willingly dispense with the music written by the late Tom Cooke to accompany the introductory scene. The scene itself, however, is a marvel of stage carpentry. We actually see the waves breaking on the shore in "tender, curving lines of creamy spray," and hear the rustle of the receding water on the sand. Scenic illusion can scarcely further go. The choruses, though they are by no means easy, are fairly sung, and the orchestra, under the guidance of Mr. J. L. Hatton, is efficient.

LONDON PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The following list of the chief works performed during the last season is extracted from a paper recently published by the directors: English (instrumental) music has been represented by the symphony in G minor, the pianoforte caprice, and the pianoforte concerto in C minor, of Professor Sterndale Bennett; the overture to "Les Travailleurs de la Mer," of Mr. W. G. Cusins; and the symphony in D of Mr. Cipriani Potter, the instructor of them both: Belgian music by two movements from the violin concerto in E of M. Vieuxtemps. French music by the violin concerto in B minor, and that in A minor, of Rodé. Italian music, by the overture to Lodoiska of Cherubini; German music by two movements from the violin sonata in E of Bach; the symphonies in E flat (Eroica), in B flat, in C minor, in F (Pastorale), in A, and in F (No. 8), the third overture to Leonora, and the violin concerto of Beethoven; the symphony in B flat (La Reine de France) of Haydn; the symphonies in A and in A minor, the overtures to the Wedding of Camacho, the Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage, and the Isles of Fingal, the pianoforte concerto in G minor, the violin concerto, the pianoforte serenade and allegro, and the march from a Midsummer Night's Dream, of Mendelssohn; two movements from the violoncello concerto of Molière; the symphony in G minor, the overture to Die Zauberflöte, and the pianoforte concerto in D (Coronation), of Mozart; the overture to König Manfred of Herr Reinecke; the unfinished symphony in B minor, the overture to Rosamunde, and a Lied, of Schubert; the symphony in C, an arrangement of the Abendlied, of Schumann; the prelude to Lohengrin, and the march from Tannhäuser, of Wagner; the overtures to the Jubilee Cantata, Preciosa, Euryanthe, and the pianoforte Concert-stück, of Weber; the symphony in G minor of Woelfl, and Spohr's "scena cantante," for violin.

MUSICAL FESTIVALS IN ENGLAND.—At Norwich, the festival is to open on the evening of Monday, the 30th of August. There is less novelty than usual in the programme and much less interest. A selection from an unpublished oratorio by Mr. Pierson, "Hezekiah," and a sacred cantata by Mr. Horace Hill, a local composer, whose fame has not travelled beyond the walls of Norwich, are absolutely the only novelties. Spohr's "Fall of Babylon," a dreary work, Rossini's Mass, Handel's "Acis," Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," and "The Messiah," make up the remainder of the programme. The Triennial Musical Festival will be held in Worcester on September 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th. On the first day (Tuesday) Elijah will be given; on Wednesday, Mr. Sullivan's Prodigal Son, and a selection from Judas Maccabeus; on Thursday, the Solemn Mass of Rossini, and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise; and on Friday the Messiah.

On Tuesday evening Mr. J. F. Barnett's Ancient Mariner will be performed, with Mme. Tietjens, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas, as solo singers. The second part includes a selection from Rossini, Donizetti, Schubert, F. David, Blumenthal, &c., with Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington, Tietjens, and Trebelli-Bettini, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, and Signor Bettini, as principal vocalists. On Wednesday evening, Mendelssohn's First Walpurgis Night, a selection from Weber's Oberon, the overture to Sullivan's Sapphire Necklace, and a composition entitled Hommage à Rossini are to be given. The third and last evening programme is made up of selections from Mozart's Il Flauto Magico, including the overture; and from the works of Meyerbeer, Donizetti, Rossini, Purcell, Beethoven, Verdi, Bellini, Randegger, &c. The band and chorus will number nearly 350 performers. The organ (electric) is by Bryceson & Co.

There is to be an operatic performance in the Roman Amphitheatre of Orange, in the month of August. Méhul's "Joseph," selections from "Vaccari's" "Romeo and Juliet," and an ode written for the occasion, entitled "Les Triomphateurs," have been decided upon. The stage will be illuminated by the electric light, and the audience will, of course, be seated sub Jove. The amphitheatre will contain ten thousand spectators. Whether the performance be a success or a failure, the experiment must, in any event, be interesting. More than fifteen centuries have passed since any representation was given in the ruined amphitheatre.

RAIN.—On the 11th ult., the four brothers Lachner had their annual family meeting in this, their native place. They were Theodor, court organist at Munich; Franz, Director General of Music, at the same capital; Ignatius, conductor at Frankfort-on-the-Maine; and Vincenz, conductor at Mannheim. It is fifty years since one of their brothers died.

Dr. F. Hiller has been invited by the Concert Society of Petersburg, under the immediate patronage of the Grand Duchess Hélène, to conduct four concerts next winter. The direction of the Conservatoire of Cologne having granted to Dr. Hiller a prolongation of his usual congé, he has been enabled to accept this very brilliant as well as honorable engagement. The members of the celebrated Academy of Painting of Düsseldorf, headed by the great master, Bendemann, have just sent a letter to Dr. Hiller, thanking him for having yielded to the prayers of his friends, as well as of the friends of art, in remaining at his post at Cologne, to continue his work of propagating a taste for music all over the Rhine.

MAVENCE.—An operatic skit, by Herr Britong, entitled Die Meistersinger, oder das Judenthum in der Musik, has been produced with great success.

LEIPZIG.—M. Ambroise Thomas's Mignon has been produced with moderate success. On the 22d July, the firm of Breitkopf and Härtel celebrated with great rejoicings the completion of its five thousandth piano.

The Marquis and Marquise de Canx left Paris on Tuesday, for Homburg, where Madame sings for fourteen nights. After two performances at Baden, she returns to Baden, remains there during October, and finishes the year in St. Petersburg.

Tenors are so scarce now-a-days that we (Athenæum) watch all débuts with interest. There is not much to be hoped for, however, from M. Dela-branche, who appeared a few days ago at the Grand Opera in Les Huguenots. A pupil of M. Duprez, he made his first début, two or three years ago, in the same theatre, but without success. Since then he has gained a reputation in Marseilles and Lyons, and has been thereby emboldened again to try his fortune on the Parisian stage. But he is, as yet, far too uncultivated to do justice to the character of Raoul, the most difficult, looking at the wide range of needful qualifications, to be found in the tenor répertoire. Paris is just now as uneventful as London in music. The revival of Vert-Vert at the Opéra Comique, and the above-mentioned début at the Académie de Musique, are the only notes of the week.

An improvement for increasing the sonority of the violoncello, invented by Servais, is attracting considerable attention abroad. The instrument is allowed to rest on a bar of metal and thus communicates the vibrations to the floor, and the old practice of holding it between the knees is abandoned.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- The Love of other days. Song and Chorus.
3. Ab to d. Turner. 30
Somewhat mournful, but expressive, and with a very musical chorus.
Out in the cold. Words by J. S. Adams. 2.
D to d. Emerson. 40
This very beautiful and touching ballad does not seem to lose its popularity, but will continue to be a favorite until everybody has either heard or sung it. A new edition is now issued, with a fine lithograph title, representing the poor little wanderer in the night and storm.
Out on the Rocks. 4. Eb to c. Swinton Dolby. 35
An effective concert song. An exquisite reminiscence of some little lover's quarrel, "out on the rocks" which was forgiven and forgotten quickly.
Bonny Bess. 2. Bb to f. J. R. Thomas. 35
In popular ballad style, and the story of Bonny Bess in May is quite pleasing. Taking melody.
Down by the River side I stray. 3. F to f. Thomas 50
Very sweet ballad. Of course he did not stray alone, and the "wedding" scene on one corner of the fine lithograph title informs us well enough as to what came after those pleasant walks.

Instrumental.

- Warrior Polka. 3. Eb. Turner. 30
Original, and with a striking melody.
Spring Fairy. 3. Bb. Englbrecht. 60
A new edition of a great favorite, good for an instructive piece, and good any way. The lithograph title is a "success" and quite ornamental.
Potpourri. Fidelity. 4. Wds. 75
This selection from the melodies of what many consider the best of all operas, will be welcomed by all players.
Grotto Polka. 3. Eb. Turner. 30
A trifle more extended and difficult than most of Mr. T's compositions. Original and good music.
Blue Bells. Variations. Wyman. 60
The old beautiful melody, skillfully varied.
The Organ at Home. Each, 25
This useful set contains, among other pieces, Batti batti, Ah che la morte, Oasta Diva, America, Santa Lucia. It is better to laugh, Kathleen Mavourneen, Hail Columbia, What restrains me, May Breeze, Prayer from Moses, Yankee Doodle, Ave Maria, Long ago, Barcarolle, Long Weary Day, Non più mesta, Non più andrai, Waite's March, Star Spangled Banner, Trio from Bellario, Last Rose of Summer, Serenade, Mountain Home, Annie Laurie, Blue Bells of Scotland, Home, Sweet Home, and an aria from Norma.
Walking in the Park. Var. 4. D. Pratt. 50
Favorite melody well arranged. Slips easily from the fingers.
I'll follow thee. Polonaise. 3. Ab. Pratt. 50
Also very well arranged, and a good instructive piece.

WINNER'S PERFECT GUIDE FOR THE GERMAN CONCERTINA. 75

These little instruments, easily learned, afford an infinite deal of amusement for those who have not time for extended practice in music. Pupils will find here all needed instructions, and plenty of favorite airs.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c., A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

The Musical Drama and the Works of Richard Wagner.

From the French of EDONARD SCHULZ.

Lohengrin followed close upon Tannhäuser. Here, the dramatic system of the author shone out with the utmost clearness. Considered as a poem, its elevation and beauty are remarkable. If Richard Wagner had written nothing but the words of this noble tragedy, it would have given him rank with the true poets of the world. While German criticism was hurling fire and flame against the "musical heresies,"—so-called—of Tannhäuser, the author, quite unmindful of these attacks, and absorbed in his own idea, gave himself with renewed eagerness to the study of the old Germanic poetry. Exploring that chaos of legends and fragmentary traditions, he felt himself ever re-animated by the breath of a younger and more healthful life. Here he found space and scope for his heroes, grand figures surpassing, by many a cubit, the vulgar limits; men of gigantic passions, heroic women, souls great in evil, or sublime in goodness. Was it a mistake to call up these heroic shades, these figures rudely sketched by the genius of the nation, and consecrated by the worship of many generations? The strict partisans of the historic opera blame him; but those who love strong and simple tragedy, appreciate his work; scarcely could he have found elsewhere so picturesque outlines, characters so clear-cut,—in a word, all the most valuable material for the musical drama.

The new type to which his attention was irresistibly drawn was that of the Chevalier of the Swan. Like the Flying Dutchman, and like Tannhäuser, the Lohengrin of the legend became in his mind very personal and human. This Knight of the Holy Grail descends from the heights of Montsalvat, that sacred land of justice and holiness, of which his father, Parzival, is king: he comes over the sea to defend Elsa, heiress of Brabant, unjustly accused of having slain her brother. Notwithstanding his godlike nature, there burns in his secret soul a human passion,—he would fain love and be loved, and share with some mortal who could understand them aright, the unutterable joy, the infinite sadness, which is his sublime birthright. Mysterious thought, which recurs in the myths of every nation; the hero, the demi-god, seeks the love of the mortal woman. Lohengrin takes in hand the cause of Elsa, and in single combat vanquishes her accuser. King and people at once recognize in the victory, the judgment of God. Having saved Elsa, he offers her his love; at the same time he asks her absolute trust, and forbids her ever to question him upon his origin or his name. Twice he repeats the command, in language the most exact and imperative. "Thou shalt never ask, thou shalt never even seek in thy thought to know whence I came over the waters, what my name, or what my race! Lohengrin had given instant faith to the innocence of Elsa; he asks that she should believe in him equally without reservation and without proof. He would be loved for himself, accepted just as he stands in his heroic pride; understood through trust and love, as he, through love and trust, has understood Elsa. She, who has had a mysterious consciousness that he would come to save her, and has loved him before she had seen his face, promises all, in a passion of gratitude and worship; but through a series of intrigues, which fill the second act, Frederic and Ortrude, the enemies of Elsa, who wish to remove her from the throne, that they may occupy it themselves, succeed in insinuating doubt into this pure soul. After frightful struggles with herself, driven by torturing anxiety, which amounts even to terror, she puts to Lohengrin the fatal question, upon the very night of their marriage. Wounded to the heart, Lohengrin reveals his high origin, in the presence of Elsa, the King, and the assembled guests; announces himself Knight of the Holy Grail, then leaves her, never to return. He goes away heart-broken, for he loves her still,—but obedient to his own haughty self-respect and to the law of his order, which forbids that its champions should remain among men, once the mystery of their origin has been revealed.

Lohengrin, tender yet imperious, is a living incarnation of that heroic temperament which demands in love the blindest and most perfect trust, and which will break inexorably every tie at the first and faintest manifestation of doubt. He seems to pay the penalty of his superior nature, in the fear that he inspires, for it is his tragic destiny to be suspected by the woman he adores, and by whom alone he can be understood and loved. Elsa, the impassioned woman, claims his complete confidence, and, through the pride of the immortals, he denies it to her. She doubts him, for an instant, and he cannot see that the doubt springs from love's excess. The proud, heroic nature cannot quite understand the woman's soul in all its delicacy and its depth. He ought to see that she has a right to all his confidence, but he does not. Hence the abyss which yawns to divide them;—here is the tragic crisis of the poem. The construction is simple, and events cluster about this point, in a few decisive scenes,—each scene brings on the action, and every word carries weight. In the musical drama, the poem itself can be but a sketch, the music must give it life and color; but from the strength and freedom of the cartoon, one can imagine the wealth of splendor of the finished picture. The characters are drawn with extreme delicacy of shading, and grouped with skill. Frederic de Telramund and Ortrude are a most striking contrast to Lohengrin and Elsa. The sombre, scheming two, united by hatred, serve as a foil to the two so noble and tender, and bring out clearer the white purity of the hero and his betrothed, two angels of light,—as it were,—by the side of two evil and condemned creatures, escaped from the abyss. Neither Ortrude nor Frederic are the vulgar, wicked conventional "villains" of the drama. Ortrude, especially, is an original creation. Great in audacity and sang froid, she hides under a marble exterior a very hull of hatred and malice, to let them loose upon their victim at the fatal moment, with the most ferocious exultation. The quiet skill with which she poisons the mind of Elsa, the perfidious carresses with which she surrounds the innocent girl, and the false gentleness with which she gains ascendancy over the unsuspecting heart, betray the trained malice of a demon. The encounter of these characters gives rise to unexpected and striking situations, and the fatal scene in the third act, between Lohengrin and Elsa, where the latter forgets her promise in the very transports of her own passionate affection, is of a tragic beauty, which moves the soul to its depths.

The musical interpretation of this tragedy is far clearer and more harmonious than that of Tannhäuser. The unity of conception and style are so perfect, that one asks oneself if the words were made for the music, or the music for the words; one might say that in the height of poetic expression, language, vibrating with soul and passion, becomes melody. The musical form of expression, like the versification of a tragedy, far from confusing the action, renders it more salient. The chorus is no longer a dull mass, manoeuvred with mechanical effect by the conductor's bâton; it is an eager crowd, full of life and individuality. The grand chorus in eight parts, which precedes and accompanies the arrival of Lohengrin, is a fine example. Elsa, accused and defenceless, is in the presence of the king and all the people: twice the royal herald calls for the knight upon whom she depends. Not a person stirs in the crowd: the rude soldiers begin to doubt her innocence, and the sad and solemn motif expressing the judgment of God weighs upon her in the dead silence, like an irrevocable malediction. Elsa, despairing, falls upon her knees, with her women. Suddenly, her face lights up with rapture; in the distance, at the same instant, appears a figure standing in a boat drawn by a swan; his armor glitters in the sun, and the mysterious swan cleaves the waves, in measured advance. At the sight, a stir runs through the crowd; the chorus commences pianissimo, like a light whisper. First there are only individual exclamations, where you may detect the surprise of some, the innocent faith of others, the alarm of the incredulous, the astonishment of all. While the boat comes nearer, the chorus strengthens, rises in waves of rejoicing, still rises, till, as the radiant knight steps on shore, it bursts into a grand hymn of joy and religious exaltation.

This wonderful crescendo brings before our minds that sacred terror which the ancients required in their Tragedy, which the people feel in the presence of this shining avenger, and which fills the human soul at every manifestation of the divine.

The dominant motifs, which are so important in Tannhäuser, are yet more significant in Lohengrin. They form the unity of the musical woof. From the principal musical phrases, the skillful and daring composer has woven a pliant and harmonious network, which enfolds the entire drama. These expressive phrases recur like the words of a spell. They are all so original, that at the end of a measure, you would recognize them among a thousand, and their faintest suggestion may be instantly detected in the great symphonic waves of the orchestra. The most important of these motifs are those which embody the great moral powers, the passions of the characters, those fundamental principles of the soul, whence flow the character, the conduct, and the life. Thus the religious theme of the Holy Grail admirably unfolded in the prelude, is, as it were, a golden background, upon which is relieved the luminous and heroic figure of Lohengrin,—it is the theatrical atmosphere which surrounds him, the lofty, silent and sacred solitude, whence he descends to the troubled and heated air of earthly passions. All the other motifs which relate to the hero, have a secret kinship with this mystic phrase. The melody itself recurs but rarely, as if to make us feel that these divine sentiments illuminate the life of man only with rare and fleeting gleams. It steals, faint and dreamy, a far-off vision, into the first song of Elsa, who awaits her defender and who feels already the unspeakable felicities of the Holy Grail. Sweeter and purer than a mountain breeze, in the heavy and stormy air of the plain, it whispers around the young girl, accused, yet beautiful with innocence, like the breath of another world. It returns at long intervals, each time that Lohengrin alludes to his sacred mission. This exquisite modulation, full of the enthusiasm of heaven, which hovers over the hero, like a chorus of unseen angels, is rendered, at first, always, by the violins; but, finally, when Lohengrin reveals his origin, it is suddenly seized upon by the trumpets, as if the Temple of the Holy Grail stood revealed, at that supreme moment, with all its jasper columns, its serried ranks of angels, and its blinding splendors. To this celestial melody, which is victorious wherever it comes, and without effort, is opposed the evil motif of Ortrude, designed, usually, by the violoncellos. This rampant and perfidious phrase springs like a serpent from the darkest depths of the soul. In the duo between Ortrude and Frederic, it seems to wind itself about the unhappy pair and stifle them in its coils; in the dialogue with Elsa, where Ortrude insinuates that Lohengrin may be perhaps only a magician and an impostor, it seems to be ever in motion in the orchestral level; now dragging itself along with dismal sounds, then rearing itself up with the hiss of a viper. It glides subtle and tortuous, into the innocent heart of Elsa, and with its venom poisons her dreams of love; but in the presence of the invincible Lohengrin, it draws back affrighted.

It is easy to see the psychological interest which attaches to the developments, combinations and reminiscences of such characteristic motifs. They are no longer cold symbols, belonging to a system of mnemonics; they are wonderfully vivid themes, that the imagination of the composer varies, at every moment, according to the exigencies of the drama, or the intensity of the passion. They reveal, as if by stealth, the most secret impulses of the heart, not yet expressed in words. It has been said that the clairvoyant, in his mysterious sleep, sees unveiled the inmost soul of those who are before him. The orchestra of Richard Wagner gives us an analogous sensation, revealing to our gaze the secret hearts of the personages before us upon the stage. and, by this strange betrayal, making us aware of their carefully-concealed emotions, and their hidden designs.

In Lohengrin, that perfect fusion of poet and composer, towards which the artist has tended from his youth, finds its accomplishment. The noble creation which has resulted from this union, will remain forever a work of a new and completely original description. It brings in a new period in the history of the musical drama,—the enfranchisement from old conventionalisms, on the one hand, and a more perfect unity between the words and the music, on the other. This is not one of the ordinary operas, that is to say, a brilliant mosaic of marches, choruses, trios and septuors. Rather is it a living organism, all whose parts spring harmoniously from a single germ, to which all are referable, from which all are developed, by the innate necessity of the subject; in a word, rigorously used,—it is a musical drama.

Richard Wagner thus arrived at the clear view of his dramatic ideal, which resembles the Greek tragedy in its general structure, but which is none the less completely modern in its ideas and sentiments. Thus perceiving his goal, he goes towards it, undisturbed by the fluctuations of criticism. I shall be brief in giving the rest of his career. The point of importance was to show the instinctive, inevitable and logical development of his thought. The political events of 1849 brought a great change to his life. He early threw himself into the revolutionary movement, in the hope that this great social and democratic reform would be the signal of a revival in art and might lead to the founding of a grand national theatre. The Saxon republic, as is well known, was overthrown by Prussian troops. Wagner, proscribed as one of the insurgents, took refuge in Switzerland. In the long exile which followed, he had time for meditation, for patient waiting, and for gaining new strength in his cherished ideas. He now resolved to explain his theories in a series of æsthetic essays. Accustomed to express his thoughts in living creations, he entered with reluctance the labyrinth of speculative ideas. It was needful, however, to define his position, and to defend the musical drama, as he conceived it, against a crowd of misunderstandings; likewise, the proscribed man must now live by his pen. He threw himself into the arena with all the ardor of a man who identifies himself with his Idea. These writings, which form a chapter by themselves among the works of Wagner, indicate a profound knowledge of music, and are filled with original thought, often of great justice, upon the history of the opera, and upon the essence of art and the intimate harmony existing between its different forms. It may be regretted that the author has not given these works a less abstruse form. The thought is sometimes lost in philosophic formulas, so broad that the mind is not able to grasp them; but along with these polemic exaggerations and these idealistic transports, is found many an eloquent page through which throbs the artist-soul, glowing with the love of art, in which speaks the man who has put his thought into his life. Of these works, the most remarkable are: Art and Revolution, Opera and Drama, and above all, The mission of Art in the future, which has made for the author so many enemies, and has occasioned a quarrel in the world of letters more violent and more interminable than was provoked a hundred years earlier by the dedicatory epistle prefixed to Alceste. In this book, the author seeks to prove that all the arts blend harmoniously in the musical drama, as he conceives it. He shows with much sagacity, that in the opera they strive with each other, as rivals, instead of concurring to one and the same end. Each, seeking to shine for itself, exhausts its ingenuity to excel the others, and from the mutual struggle arises the tyranny of whichever is the strongest. The one which carries the day will absorb the spectator's attention. Sometimes, it is the singing only, the simple vocalization which rules, at the expense of the words and even of common sense; again, it is the orchestra which now plays a march, out of all connection, and now brings upon the stage a troop of choristers and figurantes, without any one's seeing the reason why; lastly, it is some fantastic ballet which usurps possession of the scene. As for Poetry, she does what she can; in the opera, she is the drudge and the scape-goat of all the other arts; she is maltreated without pity, shut up in a libretto which is constructed, cut into shape, hacked to pieces, at the will of musician, scene-painter and virtuoso. Hence, all manner of contradictory impressions,—an incongruous whole, a degenerate style. How would it be, the author goes on to say, if Poetry, instead of being the submissive slave, became the intelligent ruler,—if, instead of being the pretext for the work, she was the soul of it,—if the action were grand and simple, if the music, subordinated to the drama, contented itself with strengthening and adorning the expression of the sentiments,—if the decorations were always in harmony with the emotions of the characters,—if the pantomime, instead of being a series of ballets, always out of place, should lend its aid only to give plastic beauty to the gestures of the actors, to their attitudes, to their natural grouping, and should compose under our eyes new and noble tableaux vivants,—if, in a word, the arts should act together under one sovereign inspiration, to forward one end: the eloquent representation and the poetic transfiguration of man, and of his destiny? Should we not then have a work a hundred times stronger and truer, and would it not leave in the soul a more profound and more harmonious impression? Here then, says the author, in conclusion, is the living and perfect form, towards which the opera, during two centuries, has been slowly making its way; this is the ideal, which we sought while yet ignorant what it would be, and which, henceforth, we must pursue with full knowledge. Far from assuming that he has attained this ideal in his own works, he confesses that he is still distant from it; he declares only, that he seeks it, and believing it possible, and even necessary, he sets it before his contemporaries as an object worth their bravest efforts;—not so did the critics choose to understand him. Leaving out of the account all the ideas which the author has brought forward, they seized upon the title of his book and turned it as a weapon against himself. According to them, Wagner, unable to gain admiration in the present, gave himself out as the musician of the future. The mot was well received, it has made the tour of Europe. Such is the origin of that famous "music of the future" of which such a bugbear has been made. Like the epithet "romantic" in 1830, the simple word becomes a reproach, and takes the place of argument.

Much weight was added to this summary criticism, from the fact that the world in general seemed to confirm its decrees. The operas of Wagner were spreading very slowly through Germany; Lohengrin had not even been represented. All the directors were afraid of them, and the author himself, now in exile, had renounced all hope of success. Less disposed than ever to yield to public opinion, he still kept at work, in obedience to that necessity of creating which rests upon the true artist. In this isolation he had the good fortune to meet an ardent champion, who did more for his cause in Germany, than he could have done for himself. François Liszt, then chef d'orchestre at Weimar, had seen by accident the score of Lohengrin, and was passionately taken by it. This generous, spontaneous, electrical enthusiasm which Wagner's music has many a time excited in fine and elevated natures, is not the least stamp of distinction placed upon his works. Then ensued a rare sight; a chef d'orchestre bringing out an opera from no motive of material interest, in spite of the apprehensions of the director, through pure artistic conviction, persuaded that by his own enthusiasm he should be able to bring the public to feel the beauty which he himself so deeply felt. Liszt had understood Lohengrin by inspiration; he directed the rehearsals with an enthusiasm that those who witnessed remember to this day; for many months he devoted himself to the work, till he fired with his own ardor the orchestra and the actors. Naturally, the performance was admirable; the success, brilliant. Performed for the first time at Weimar, Aug. 28, 1850, the birth-day of Goethe, Lohengrin was received with an enthusiasm that knew no bounds. Now in this case it was not the public who imposed their caprice upon the master,—it was the master who brought what he knew to be good before the public, and directed the public taste to approve it. Should it not be so always! When art becomes degenerate, it is the fault of the artists. Almost invariably, their concessions to the frivolities of fashion are unworthy and base. It is past disputing, the grand and the true always succeed with the crowd, when those who stand as interpreters believe, themselves, with all their hearts.

From this day forward, the operas of Wagner conquered the opposition of the German public. There was still no lack of hostility, it is true; but Lohengrin and Tannhäuser made the entire circuit of Germany. They took their place in the repertoire of every great theatre, and acquired a wide popularity. Further, the most independent thinkers hastened to encourage this brave reformer, who made himself the champion of the musical drama, that is, of dramatic truth in the opera. Adolphe Starr was one of the first to recognize the merits of the poet-composer, and proclaimed them in his book, Weimar und Jena (1852) with that generous rashness which characterizes him. Later, the suffrages of such musical authorities as Ambros Marx and Brendel, were given in. Some distinguished musicians gathered about him, and great artists of the lyric drama, such as M. and Mme. Schnorr von Karolsfeld became his enthusiastic disciples.

We will say nothing of Tristan und Isolde, represented in 1865, at Munich, and so wonderfully rendered by M. and Mme. Schnorr, nor of Die Walkyrie and Siegfried, which have not yet been put on the stage, except that, in a poetic point of view, they surpass the preceding works, and considered as musical compositions, the author has valiantly carried out in them his principles. In his latest work, to conclude, Wagner has entered upon a new field. Deserting the mythic region, he has placed himself full in the 16th century, among the organized society, known as the Master-singers of Nuremberg. In this picturesque and national setting, he has brought forward a subject of great originality and which must be dear to every lover of free and true art. His idea is the victory of spontaneous, poetic genius over the pedantry of the schools.

Such is briefly the career of this man, so attacked, so decried; such the ensemble of his works seen at a bird's-eye glance. What does this rapid review bring before us? An artist of daring genius, early freed from restraints, self-developed with the strongest originality, following strictly the law of his own being, driven to constant work by the stress of the creative instinct. As a worshipper of the Ideal, exalted, rash, sometimes extravagant, but strong even in his exaggerations, we have seen him gaining his rightful place, never sustained and borne forward by surrounding society, but always at war with it, not favored by the rules of art of his time, but hampered by them, not with the age, but in spite of the age; something wonderful as a proof that the artist is not always the product of the conditions in which he lives. He took from his century its fever of revolution, only to carry it into the domain of art; and from the great composers of his nation, only their most advanced ideas in regard to music. Poet and musician at once, from the time of The Flying Dutchman he is thoroughly original. From that time forth he is mastered by one dominant idea, to give to opera the unity, the richness, all the dramatic charm of the grandest tragedy; to create works which shall be able to bring up public taste to the most noble sentiments and the most elevated ideas. Filled with this desire, he breaks with the traditional opera, enters upon the career of the musical drama, and strives to bring poetry and music together into the front rank. Henceforth, he stops at nothing, he rules over his own domain, and in each successive work extends its boundaries. It remains to us to judge, by some example, of this new form of opera; we select his latest, The Master-singers of Nuremberg.

To be Continued.

Christine Nilsson.

VII.

When Mlle. Nilsson rested from her labors in the autumn of 1867, she had earned several triumphs, and could bear away from British shores many pleasant recollections. Among the conquests was the Marguerite of Goethe and Gounod. Everybody has more or less formed his ideal of Gretchen—either from the original pages, or through the translations of Bulwer and Martin, or through Scheffer's pictorial art, or through the opera. There is perhaps no more concrete embodiment of a poet's dream than Marguerite. Desdemona is a mere ideal; Imogen may be fair or dark, tall or petite; Miranda might take shape in a dozen forms; so widely do dramatic realizations differ. Perhaps the most distinctly defined type is a non-dramatic one—that of Byron's Haidee; but she has the distinctiveness of dress rather than of spirit and feature. Given the Greek adornments, the tasselled head-dress and the dark hair, and a certain resemblance must pervade all efforts at illustration.

But Marguerite is one and indivisible. Who has not in his mind's eye the slender Saxon type, the blond hair, flat upon a marble forehead and falling in plaits behind; the low stomacher, the lithe, supple form just emerging into womanhood as she crosses the path of a lover prepared to "see Helen's beauty in a brow of Egypt"?

"Her arms across her breast she laid,
She was more fair than words can say."

And the ideal has survived.

So absolute is Gretchen's individuality that on the stage it is difficult to vivify the model with exactitude. Operatic singers in particular have felt themselves restricted to a certain accepted notion at variance more or less with their natural manner; and when, tired of constraint, they have relapsed into their natural manner, they have strayed further from the ideal. Tietjens cleaves to the flaxen tresses, and piles a wig over her own hair which gives her a Watteau appearance. It is a Marguerite of laborious simplicity whom we see: a stately Margarete, inclined to embonpoint. Patti forswears the wig and comes out as a brune Gretchen, black-haired and dark-eyed; a pretty specimen of miscegenation; an Italian girl singing a French personification of a German ideal. Lucca, who by nationality is well fitted (as indeed Tietjens is) to appreciate Goethe, apparently frames her conception upon the lines

"Sie ist so sitt-und tugendreich, Und etwas schnippsch doch zugleich."

But then she insists too strongly upon the schnippisch. With her Marguerite is a saucy little person, fully open to a flirtation, and disposed in the first meeting with Faust only to reculer pour mieux sauter. There is an air of "Follow me if you dare," when she rejects Faust's arm and escort. Hers is a Gretchen of the Gassen; we almost expect to hear her "chaff" Mephistopheles in the Berlin patois; and when the serious interest deepens and passion supervenes on sauciness, she develops more Southern proclivities than even Patti.

Until Nilsson's assumption of the part, therefore, a full realization of Gretchen was wanting. But there now entered into competition one fitted alike by nature, by youth, and by culture, to do justice to Goethe's conception and Gounod's illustration. The Scandinavian type was near enough to the German to render disguise unnecessary; the slender form and young grace needed no disguise; the gentleness was only natural. So, when she crossed the scene, clad in white, with downcast eyes and clasping her missal, Scheffer's picture of Marguerite suddenly stood realized before the spectators. There was no need to write "This is Marguerite" under the illustration; there was equally no compulsion to add "This is Marguerite with a difference," when she began to sing. The "No, Signor" of her first phrase might, barring language, have been the "Bin weder Fräulein weder schön" of the original. And the truth of the conception was preserved throughout, though the French version wanders from the German text, and represents Margarete under various circumstances for which there is no warrant in the original, but which are necessary for the composer's purpose.

To give effect to such variations without wandering from the one first aim is no small point in an artist's favor. Take for example the soliloquy of Gretchen over the jewels placed for a soul-trap by Mephistopheles. How pathetic is Goethe's Gretchen's reflection as she stands before the mirror:

"Man lobt euch halb mit Ebsarmen,
Nach Golde drängt,

Am Golde hängt
Doch alles, Ach, wir Armen!"

Contrast this with the burst of Grizette gratification wherewith Gounod's Marguerite hails the spangles; the delight to which the Italian version gives expression in "E strano poter." The one is a poet's unity of imagination, the other a musician's capacity for creating an effect of contrast. In conflicting readings like this, Christine Nilsson manages a happy compromise. She deals justly with the music, but she does not lose sight of the poetic purpose. She is no Grizette suddenly vanquished at the sight of the pretty gewgaws; yet she has to sing delight over them in woman-like fashion. "It was," wrote one English critic of her first appearance in Margherita, "as if a bird were carolling over a poison berry." Again, the soliloquy wherein Margarete cons over Faust's love, as she appears at the window, is given by Mlle. Nilsson in a calm, happy reverie, rising by subtle gradations into ecstasy when she concludes by invoking his presence. There is nothing in all this of Southern languors or of French abandon, yet it lacks not fervor. The vein of German sentiment runs throughout; but the passion which is not of one nation, but of all nature, speaks in every silvery tone and shines in every eloquent look and gesture.

VIII.

Up to this time Christine Nilsson's French triumphs had been earned at the Theatre Lyrique. At that establishment she had continued to play, in friendly rivalry to Mme. Miolan-Carvalho, the singer of an old and famous reputation and the wife of the manager. There were not wanting mischievous writers who insinuated a relationship of small cordiality between the old and the new prima donna, between the manager's wife and the star. Actually no such jealousy existed; but it pleased the French feuilletonistes to imagine it. It enabled them to say wicked little pleasantries from time to time. A French joke becomes all the more piquant for a spice of malice and personality.

Thus when "Faust" was revived at the Lyrique for the opportunity of presenting Nilsson in Marguerite, one spiteful critic—albeit he meant no spite, only a coarse form of jocosity—announced the playing of the part as "a splendid triumph—for Mme. Carvalho." The insinuation being that Nilsson had failed in the impersonation, and that Mme. Carvalho, who had formerly been identified with Marguerite, would be pleased at her rival's disaster.

Now among all Christine Nilsson's triumphs there is none perhaps so strikingly illustrative of genius as this attempt in Paris to personate Marguerite. Herein she was doomed for the first time in her career to encounter a vast opposing force of prejudices, and to be defeated by them at first, and at last to overcome them. The Parisians did not like her conception of Gretchen. They had formed their own ideal of Gretchen—an ideal of the Boulevards; they had imagined her as a sort of saucy soubrette, with the manner of a shop-girl: a trifle unfortunate, perhaps, and therefore in some measure to be pitied, but to be pitied in the way one may bestow a degree of sentiment upon a girl who has been victimized by a gentleman and a devil in partnership. Any underlying formation of character, any tone of sentiment beyond or above this Boulevard appreciation of the young person, was not in the French mind. If it existed, it was foreign, it was German, and therefore not worth analyzing or bothering about in any way. The Germans were a queer, mystical, transcendental race of theorists; they smoked more than was good for them, and ate chou croute inordinately; they were êtres curvés, and not a little stupid and cloudy. As for them—the French—accepting a German point of view of a character which Gounod, their own Gounod, had incorporated and Gallicized, it was not to be thought of. Parisian audiences had seen Marguerite dressed and played à la Française, and they were satisfied, and wanted nothing more.

In this humor they were unprepared for Mlle. Nilsson's new rendering. She herself had not desired the ordeal; she had begged that the part might be left in the hands of Mme. Carvalho, who had graced it before, and who was always associated with it. But the manager insisted, and Christine reluctantly attempted the task. She undertook it, however, in her own fashion, embodying her own knowledge of German literature and German habits; she realized her own conception of the artless girl such as Goethe created, and Ary Scheffer and Kaulbach depicted. The faithfulness of demeanor, the accuracy of dress, the fidelity of spirit, were presented as we are accustomed to see them in the bearing of Christine Nilsson. It was the same sweet, tender conception which subsequently made her famous in Paris, and has counted among her triumphs in this country. "She is the impersonation," wrote the Paris correspondent of a New York paper at the time, "of unsuspecting purity—guileless, sweet, candid, modest, and self-restrained—but with a tinge, perhaps, of melancholy in her face and bearing, as if the gentle mirror of her soul already reflected the dark shadows of evil gathering about her, and soon to wrap her away in storm and darkness and death."

Nevertheless this conception offended the French critics at that time, and displeased the audience. They accused Nilsson of dullness of coldness; she has no animation they cried; even her voice had fallen off; and—gravest fault in a Parisian eye—she was becoming stupid. Something more alert, more saucy, more "bouncing," was what they had looked for in Marguerite. "It was a triumph—for Mme. Carvalho;" but a signal failure for Nilsson. One critic demanded the instant withdrawal of the opera. Even the Revue de Deux Mondes stooped to blame. It seemed, indeed, as if the great artist had failed upon the very issue which should have earned her greatest glory. Unaccustomed to such harsh treatment, she might well, at this point of her career, have lost heart.

Luckily for her, luckily also for the subsequent pleasure of Paris, the verdict was not unanimous. Théophile Gautier, one of the keenest intellects and readiest pens in the service of dramatic literature, justified Nilsson's rendering in the Journal Officiel; Ernest Feydeau, in the columns of the Revue Nationale, stemmed the tide of disapprobation; and among spectators the English and American components of the audience stood by Christine. To them German literature was not such a sealed book as to the Parisians pur sang; they thus could appreciate the truthfulness of the rendering. There were German residents also in Paris, who naturally knew that Nilsson was right and her detractors wrong. Lastly, the critic of Galignani battled bravely for the Swedish artist, averring that he had seen the part played by every eminent singer in Europe, and not one of them could approach Christine Nilsson in spirituality and loving fidelity to the poet.

The tide turned. The opposition had had one good effect: it advertised the singer. As a result, during the last twenty or thirty nights of the engagement, every seat in the theatre was secured at a high premium. Not a box, not a stall, not standing-room even, but was eagerly taken, long in advance: the audiences were delighted, the critics veered round to a man. Rarely, if ever, has a fuller conquest been obtained over ignorance and prejudice and national jealousy. After all, a Paris public is not unaccustomed to reverse its judgments. It did so in the notorious instance of Rossini's "Guillaume Tell," utterly tabooed at its first performance. Superadded to the proverbial fickleness of the multitude, there is always the hostile force of private rivalry and envy and dislike, which is sometimes permitted to suggest, if not to organize, the outward opposition. What a world of intrigue and bitter strife is the world behind the scenes; what innumerable enemies must a rising artist conquer before his empire is secured! Victor Hugo, though personally he has had little to complain of in his career as a dramatist, knows the meanness and the bitterness of the faction-fight which every great man must encounter in that arena, be he author or composer or artist; and on the life to be there undergone the poet has fixed his broad, emphatic mark. "God grant me," he writes in one of his prefaces, "proper repentance for having exposed the virgin obscurity of my name and person to the snares and squalls of the theatre, and above all to the wretched broils of the comédies; for having entered into that most fitful, foggy, stormy atmosphere, where ignorance dogmatizes, where envy hisses, where cabal reigns or crawls, where the probity of talent is so often unrecognized, where the noble candor of genius is so generally displaced, where mediocrity triumphs by reducing superiority to its own level; in short, where there are so many little men for one great man, so many nullities for each Talma, so many myrmidons for each Achilles."

IX.

Mlle. Nilsson's reputation had by this time grown too large to be limited by the walls of the Lyrique. She had swelled it in appearances at many concerts and private salons, and now the opera coveted so rare a singer: Imperial art put in a claim. In a country like France, where the State is the patron of national art, a great artist becomes an object of national importance. It had become, too, a matter of great exigency to secure the Swedish singer, as M. Ambroise Thomas had just finished his opera of "Hamlet," upon a libretto adapted from Shakespeare's play. In its original form—or rather through versions which more or less departed from Shakespeare's text, but were sufficiently original to satisfy French criticism, "Hamlet" was fairly enough known to Paris playgoers. Alexandre Dumas, the elder had had a turn at it, doing the blank verse into rhymed alexandrines, and clipping and trimming the stout English into finikin French conceits. Like all his fellow-dramatists, Dumas had not scrupled to improve Shakespeare where in his judgment such process became necessary. The Gallic mind is never even to this day fully emancipated from the influence of Voltaire, and Shakespeare continues to be regarded as somewhat barbarous; as rough; as wanting that polish which is the special boast of French literature. Therefore he has to be rhymed; to be divested of his strong materialistic way of treating things; to be sentimentalized; to be knocked into classic shape; to be generally bewigged and perfumed, before the cultured sense of France can endure him. In his barbarous, defiant originality he is much too 'shoking.'

A great improvement was introduced into "Hamlet" in the shape of a classic urn, containing the ashes of the defunct King of Denmark. Over this urn the Parisian Hamlet poses himself elegantly, and delivers some prettily-turned sentiments of the "Affliction sore long time I bore" order. This improvement on the unrefined English poet commended itself to French intelligence as being true alike to nature and art—especially the art of Père la Chaise. When therefore the knowledge spread that Ambroise Thomas had turned the tragedy into an opera, and that this opera was to be produced at the chief lyrical house, everybody knew pretty well the nature of the subject and the sort of artists who would be required for its interpretation. People knew that the hero of the tragedy was a sombre, melancholy, brooding personage, whose character could only be delineated through a bass voice, and that among bassi Faure was pre-eminent; to Faure, therefore Hamlet would fall. They knew also that the fair and gentle attributes of Ophelia demanded one interpreter—one whose birth and education, whose natural bias and art training alike suited her to the part. Who so thoroughly fitted to present the sweet Danish lady as the Swedish singer? All eyes were instinctively turned to Christine Nilsson.

In due time it was known that Christine would leave the Place du Châtelet for the Rue le Peletier, and that she would undertake, as everybody had anticipated, the first rôle in M. Thomas's opera. A great concourse assembled to bid her farewell. Though she was but exchanging one theatre for another, though all Paris could still delight in her appearances, the demonstration was as great as though she were taking leave of the stage entirely. The "Blüets" by M. Cohen was her valedictory opera; a work which depended entirely upon Nilsson's grace in filling the principal part, and which withered at her departure. "M. Cohen," said one generous critic on the occasion, "préfère retirer sa partition que la laisser dépouillée de son prestige féminin." In harsher words, he had no help for it: the opera possessed no vitality beyond Nilsson's charm. But had it been the dullest work extant, the audience were prepared to honor it for the prima donna's sake; thus the theatre was crowded, and the demonstration became a frenzy. Such bravoes; such a rain of flowers—garlands, principally composed of artificial cornflowers (blüets, the namesake of the opera); wreaths and crowns wherein rare jewels were not wanting; bouquets with a visiting card, mostly crested or coroneted, in the heart of each, pour prendre congé; poetic epigrams, too, attached to the gifts, after the dainty Continental manner; in short a thorough ovation. This was Nilsson's last night at the Lyrique, previous to her début at the Opéra, on the 9th of March 1868, in the part of Ophélie.

Music at Baden-Baden.

Mr. Chorley's letter, in the Athenæum, dated at Baden-Baden, August 9, gives interesting particulars as to musical affairs in that gay centre of continental life:—

The musical attractions of this watering-place are, for the moment, without stint or limit. The established orchestral band is better than I recollect it any previous season. Among the guests are numbered some of the best living musicians of Germany and Belgium: to name only M. Leonard (violin); Herr Cossmann (violin), who has ripened into one of the best players on this instrument extant; Herr and Mme. Trautmann-Jaell; Herr Brahms; Herr Lassen, from Weimar; Herr Emil Naumann; Herr Milde, and other less eminent, but still meritorious. There has been, accordingly, a chance for the amateur (who is in England and Paris somewhat jaded by the incessant repetition of a few unimpeachable masterpieces) to make acquaintance with some of the newest creations of German instrumental music.

The name of Herr Brahms as a composer from whom great things were to be expected, has, for some years past, been known in England. Every work from his pen which has been given out contains some of those touches of happy thought and real invention which distinguish the master from the manufacturer. A pianoforte quartet in A major; a set of duet variations for the pianoforte; another for piano solo, on a stately theme from one of Handel's harpsichord lessons; a trio for pianoforte, violin and horn—an unsatisfactory mixture—may be specified; each of them built on phrases which the ear clings to and retains. But, whether it be from over-solicitude to escape from the well used classical combinations of form and sequence, the development of all these will fail to satisfy those who demand clearness and sustaining power in music. The episodic matter is too vague; the harmonies, though arranged with a view to climax, too harsh and untoward. It may be feared that at the outset of his career the taste of Herr Brahms has been warped beyond the power of time and counsel to set it straight. The impression made on myself, at least, is one of tantalized expectation and weariness consequent on unperformed promises.

It was only by an exercise of blind faith in good intentions, or that craving for novelty which accepts confusion for originality, till at length the ear and the mind become confused, I could arrive at the "Young German" point of admiration, which is based on the happy conviction that we have to day a school of inventors who begin where Beethoven, Weber, and Mendelssohn ended as pioneers. To me (for it would be absurd to lay down a law as infallible) the chamber music of Herr Brahms ranks at some distance behind that of Herr Rubinstein. When I compare a pianoforte concerto, a quartet, a trio, a sonata with violin by him with the music I heard the other evening; the Russian composer, though, like Herr Brahms, he may be too prolix, too vague, too disdainful, possibly, of self-correction, rises in right of force, fire, and mastery far above his contemporary. Both, it may be, suffer from living in a time of turbulence and lawless revolution, during which "foul" and "fair" are strangely confounded and made synonyms, and the satirist's rhyme—

Thinking is but an idle waste of thought,
And nought is everything, and everything is nought—represents a reality.

From this shapeless and fatiguing music, an excellent concerto for the violoncello, by Herr Eckert, excellently played by Herr Cossmann, and another for the violin, which was no less skillfully rendered by its composer, M. Léonard, offered a welcome relief to the ear, and a proof, no less welcome, that novelty is possible without eccentricity. Both, as being rational, spirited and attractive, may be characterized as among the best things of our time, and gave real pleasure to their hearers. A word, too, is due to the clever playing of Herr and Mme. Trautmann-Jaell combined, in Schumann's duet variations for two pianofortes, on an affected theme. Why these should be largely preferred to a similar suite by Mendelssohn (too seldom selected) I have never been able to understand. Better rendered than they were on the occasion referred to they could not have been. By contrast, the violent and monotonous pianoforte playing of Mlle. Marie Wieck could not but excite a disadvantageous contrast. The lady has complete power over the keyboard of the pianoforte, but it is a power totally untempered by grace or sensitiveness, and, as such, fails to impress, persuade, or fascinate the ear.

Mlle. Battu has been singing here; also Herr Milde, from the Opéra at Weimar. In these days, when what is rough and unfinished (falsely rated as strenuous and classical) is so largely the rule of German vocal execution, the purity, finish, and elasticity of his tuneful baritone voice and the excellence of his style cannot be too highly estimated. It is a pity that so much talent and accomplishment should be shut up within limits so narrow as those of Weimar. But Goethe's town has always been fortunate in attracting and retaining real talent. The present Kapellmeister there, Herr Lassen, is a real artist, of whom one would be glad to hear more. Four "Lieder" by him, sung by Herr Milde, are as good as German lieder can be, deserving to rank next to those of Schubert and Lindblad. Of Herr Lassen's German "Lieder" it may be said that the cantilena is good and expressive, but not trite: that the accompaniment is rich and various, in itself full of interest, and yet arranged so as to be a support, not a disturbance, to the singer.

The Story of Mozart's Requiem.

Novello's Musical Times, London, contains a series of articles, by William Pole, R.S. Mus. Dec. Oxon., reviewing at great length the principal documents relating to the much mooted question of Mozart's Requiem, and ending with the following "connected narrative":—

At a place called Stuppach, in Lower Austria, four and a-half posts from Vienna, on the high road to Trieste, resided a large landed proprietor, named Count von Wallsegg. He was a great lover of music, kept a number of musicians in his service, and had frequent musical performances, in which he himself took part, playing the violin or flute. He had received only an indifferent musical education, but had the ambition to be thought an eminent musician. He had maintained relations with several composers, from whom he purchased, on liberal terms, quartets and other works, which he transcribed with his own hand, and passed off as his own.

His Countess, to whom he was much attached, died early in 1791; and the idea occurred to him of doing honor at once to her and to himself, by the performance of a grand Requiem, ostensibly of his own composition. He had heard of the fame of Mozart, whom he decided to employ to write the work, under the seal of strict secrecy, and under such precautions as should prevent discovery. Some months elapsed before he carried his intentions into effect; but in 1791 he instructed one of his stewards, a man named Lentgeb, (residing at Schottwein, a village near Stuppach, belonging to the Count), to pay a visit to Mozart at Vienna, for the purpose of executing his commission.

Accordingly, shortly before Mozart received the invitation to visit Prague, and produce there his opera of La Clemenza di Tito for the coronation of the Emperor Leopold, a stranger appeared before him, bearing a letter without signature, in which, after much flattering of Mozart's talent, the writer inquired whether he was willing to undertake the composition of a Requiem, and if so, for what remuneration, and in what time. The messenger was a tall, lank looking man, with a solemn expression of countenance, and clad in sombre gray; and the strange and unusual apparition made on Mozart a deep and lasting impression. He consulted his wife, and expressed his wish to attempt this species of composition, particularly as, he said, the higher pathetic kind of church music had ever been his favorite style, and he would endeavor to write a work of this kind which, after his death, both his friends and his enemies should admire and study. His wife advised him to accept the commission; and Mozart answered that he would compose the Requiem for fifty (or, according to other accounts, for 100) ducats. He was unable to state precisely when it would be completed, but he desired to know the place where he should deliver it when it was ready. After some time, the messenger again appeared, and brought with him not only the sum demanded, but also the promise of a considerable additional payment on the delivery of the score, as the demand had been so moderate. Full permission was given for the composer to write according to his own fancy and inclination, but he was forbidden to make any attempt to discover the name of the person ordering the work, which would certainly be in vain.

In the meantime, Mozart had arranged to go to Prague; and, as he and his wife were stepping into the carriage, the mysterious messenger again appeared, like a spirit, standing by their side; he pulled Mme. Mozart by her dress, and asked, "What will now become of the Requiem?" Mozart excused himself on the ground of the necessity of the journey, and the impossibility of giving his unknown patron notice of his intention, promising, however, that it should be his first work on his return, if the person would wait so long. With this answer the messenger appeared fully satisfied.

Mozart returned, in the middle of September, to Vienna, and set to work at the Requiem; but he was called off from it for the Zauberflöte, which was then pressed forward by Schikaneder, and which was produced for the first time on the 30th of that month. After this he was free, and he set himself zealously to work to complete the composition. His friend, Joseph von Jacquin, came to him to request him to give lessons to a lady, and he found him at his writing-table at work at the Requiem. Mozart asked for a short delay; for, he said, he had a work in hand which was pressing, and which lay heavily on his mind, and that till this was finished he could think of nothing else. Other friends also afterwards remembered that this work exclusively occupied him.

The mystery in which the commission was enveloped appeared to take a strong hold of his imagination. He sank into a deeply thoughtful state of mind; and, regardless of all advice, worked at the score with untiring earnestness and energy. The interest he took in it appeared to increase with every bar, and he wrote constantly, day and night. This exertion, however, was too much for his feeble frame, which had suffered by illness shortly before at Prague, and his weakness increased to such an extent that he would sometimes faint at his labor. His wife noticed, with deep concern, his failing health, and tried to enliven him with society, but in vain, for he remained absent and melancholy. She, however, took him occasionally for a drive in the Prater. On these occasions she noticed he would sit silent and thoughtful; and on one fine autumn day, as they were sitting alone during their drive, he began to speak of his death, and declared that he was writing the Requiem for himself. Tears stood in his eyes; and as she endeavored to prove to him the fallacy of this sad foreboding, he said: "No, no! I feel it too strongly; I am not much longer for this world." From this idea he was not to be turned. He gave utterance to other strange fancies about the mysterious appearance and the commission of the unknown messenger; and when his friends attempted to reason him out of them, he remained silent, but unconvinced.

His wife, finding his illness increasing, and believing that his work at the Requiem was too much for him, consulted his physician, and took the score out of his hands. After this, his state somewhat improved, and he was able, on the 15th of November, to compose the little Cantata, Das Lob der Freundschaft, the successful performance of which, and the great applause it obtained, gave him new spirits. He again asked for the Requiem, in order to continue and complete it, and his wife felt now no hesitation in restoring it to him. But this hopeful state did not last long. In a few days he relapsed into his former melancholy; he became constantly weaker, until at last he took to his bed, from which he never rose again.

But still he worked on at the Requiem, as hard as his failing powers would allow him. When he had finished any part he would get it sung, and played the instrumental part on the pianoforte by his bedside. On the day of his death, he caused the score to be brought to him, and sung as usual. Schak (who relates the anecdote) sang the soprano; Mozart himself the alto; Hofer, Mozart's brother-in-law, the tenor; and Gerle (afterwards a public singer in Mannheim) the bass. They were singing the first bars of the Lacrymosa, when Mozart began to weep bitterly (he was always easily moved to tears by music) and laid the score aside. This was at 2 p.m. on the 4th of December. In the course of the afternoon his wife's sister found Süßmayr at Mozart's bedside in eager conversation with him about the Requiem. "Have I not told you," said the dying man, as with tearful eyes he turned over the score, "that I was writing this Requiem for myself?" He soon became worse; but even in his last moments the Requiem seemed to occupy his thoughts. He puffed out his cheeks and tried to imitate the effect of the drums. Soon afterwards, he raised himself up, but his eyes were glazed; he leaned his head against the wall and seemed to slumber; and an hour after midnight his spirit passed peacefully away.

After the funeral, when the widow had time to look around her, her first attention was directed to the Requiem, which Mozart had left unfinished. She was in very bad circumstances; and she feared that when the person who had ordered it came to know it was left incomplete, he would refuse to take it, and demand a return of his money. In this state of things, the idea occurred to her and her friends that it might be possible to get the Requiem finished by some other hand, and so to give it over in a complete state to the unknown owner. Several musicians were applied to, and, among the number, was Eybler, the chief of the court orchestra at Vienna, who undertook the work under a formal agreement, dated 21st December, 1791, binding himself to secrecy. He began to fill in the instrumentation, and to continue the Lacrymosa; but, being dissatisfied with his work, he declined to continue it. Probably others who were applied to hesitated to measure their capabilities against those of Mozart, or refused to be parties to the deception; and at length it was offered to Süßmayr, who appears to have had no scruples in the matter. Leaving untouched the Requiem and Kyrie, which had been finished by Mozart, he copied out, note for note, the subsequent parts which Mozart had written, filling in the instrumentation according to Mozart's design. The parts which were wanting to complete the work, and which Mozart had not commenced, Süßmayr composed, he says, entirely himself. The score, so copied and completed by Süßmayr, was written, as before stated, in a handwriting so remarkably similar to Mozart's, as to pass perfectly well for it. It was accordingly joined to the Requiem and Kyrie (really in Mozart's hand), and so formed a complete Requiem, which, after it had been copied for the widow's use, was given over to Count Wallsegg's messenger. From the copy retained by the widow, the work was afterwards performed and published.

It remains to trace the history of the two principal manuscripts, namely:—

(1) The complete score, partly in Mozart's and partly in Süßmayr's hand, given to Count Wallsegg; and—

(2) Mozart's original unfinished manuscript of the portions of the work following the Requiem and Kyrie.

(1) When Count Wallsegg received the score from his messenger Leutgeb (who had been bound over to secrecy, and had, as he conceived, secured similar secrecy on the part of the real composer), he shut himself up in his writing room, and made a copy of it in his own hand, putting on it the title, "Requiem compositum dal Conte Wallsegg." This copy afterwards passed into the possession of the Count's sister, the Countess Sternberg; and it must have been this which Zawrzel saw, when partly finished, as stated in his letter to André.

From this copy the Count proceeded to have the work rehearsed and, ultimately, performed, giving it out as his own composition. Performances took place, first in Neustadt, near Vienna, and afterwards at an estate of his on the Sömmerring; and detailed particulars connected with these performances are given by Krüchten and Herzog.

It seems strange that a new work of this magnitude and merit should have been performed at Vienna and at Neustadt, only about fifteen miles apart, at about the same time, and under two different composers' names, without the anomaly exciting attention; but this is only one of the many strange things in the story. We may, however, take it for granted that, though the Vienna public knew nothing of the Count's assumption, the Count very soon heard of the performance of the work under Mozart's name at Vienna; and we imagine that this performance, and the public knowledge of the work to which it gave rise, were not very palatable to him. He kept, however, his own counsel till he heard of the proposed publication by Breitkopf and Härtel, and of the claim set up by Süßmayr for a share in the composition; for there can be no doubt that he was originally given to understand by Mme. Mozart that the complete score given to him was not only entirely Mozart's composition, but was in Mozart's own hand. At these disclosures his forbearance would hold out no longer, and he set his advocate upon the widow in the way already related; and after his pacification by Stadler and Nissen, we lose sight of him in the history. He died in November, 1827, soon after the commencement of the great controversy in which he was so nearly concerned.

The Mozart-Süßmayr score of the Requiem had been carefully locked up in his library; and, on his death, it was sold along with the rest of his music. It passed through several hands, until, in 1838, one of the officers of the Imperial Library at Vienna became aware of its existence, purchased it for fifty ducats, and lodged it safely in the Library, where it remains, open to public inspection.

(2) The history of the other, or unfinished manuscript is not so clear. It remained in the widow's hands for some time after Süßmayr had copied it to make Count Wallsegg's score, and it was submitted by her to André in 1800. After this, it would appear that she pulled it to pieces, and sold it, in detached parts, to different persons, with so little care or attention to its inestimable value, that it could not afterwards be traced, and so it was lost sight of entirely for many years. The first we hear of it afterwards is, that at the time when the Abbe Stadler was hotly engaged in the dispute with Weber, the detached parts were put into his hands, to aid him in establishing his argument; and that they were there formally examined by a number of eminent men, as we before related.

From this time they were taken care of; and we find them existing in two portions. One portion belonged to Stadler, and the other to Eybler; but the source from whence they obtained them are unknown. They were afterwards both bequeathed to the Imperial Library in Vienna, where they still remain, with the Wallsegg score.

Handel's Operas.

When old works of great masters, long gone from sight, are brought into the living world again, the dust of time carefully removed, and a beautiful creation given to mankind, what lover of art does not rejoice? Where so much time and labor are spent in excavating fragmentary sculptures of a period we name classic, to stand these incomplete pieces,—symbols of lost beauty—in museums where comparatively few see them, is it not strange that noble works of music are left to their solitary and dusty shelf existence? This has been the fate of the Handel operas. Musicians have either too carelessly turned over the old leaves, or have trusted the common report that Handel's young efforts were wasted in his operas, and so they have neglected to examine them.

A greater mistake cannot be imagined. Instead of wasted efforts, the seeker will find some of the most beautiful productions of Handel's genius. The works are over-running with fresh and vigorous thoughts. The explanation of the neglect with which these operas have been treated is not to be sought in their own weakness, but rather in the imperfect education of the majority of musicians of our day. The old style of writing had long gone by, ere Mozart and Mendelssohn, following in the steps of Mosel, gave their generation an insight into the beauties and wonders of the Oratorios. These were written in nearly the same style as the operas: namely with one and two-voiced accompaniment, with the harmony ciphered below. Sometimes there is but a simple bass alone. Down to Mosel's time the oratorios had suffered the same fate as the operas. Judas Maccabæus, Jephtha, the Messiah, Samson, Israel in Egypt, and the others, gradually came to light. The operas were left almost untouched. Composed at the time of the height of song and following each other in rapid succession, they lived their short lives to give way to other productions. Many of them had a good run; but, dependent upon the fickle taste of a court, who can wonder at their mercurial existence? They were the embryo of modern opera.

The demand of each succeeding generation for a closer union of music and the drama gradually let the Handel Operas fall into their present state of neglect. The light, champagne-y character of modern opera requires something more theatrical, in the strictest sense of the word, than the Handel operas offer. This is natural and concomitant with the development of operatic form. It does not account for, however, nor excuse the total throwing aside of them. The reason is rather to be found in the fact that musicians are inadequate to the task of re-arranging the works of so eminent a master and giving them his character. In the score they lie before you mostly two-voiced, with the harmony ciphered below. In Bach's and Handel's day, it being part of a musician's education to learn to extemporize on any given theme, in which Handel himself was master—much was left to the accompanist's education and talent: of course in piano and organ accompaniment. It was also customary for the conductor to accompany. Much that could have been written out in full was merely signified by a theme and bass. That it was Handel's intention to trust much to the accompanist, we have proof enough. The "Il Pensieroso," for instance, is a chorus followed by a choral. The accompaniment is entirely wanting, with the exception of a simple one-voiced bass; but just above it Handel has written: "The motive of the accompaniment is to be found in the following choral." In other places the aria runs on alone, with nothing whatever in the piano part. The same occurs often in Bach's works. This gap in the accompaniment it was the task of the conductor to fill. How many organists of to-day could at sight accompany an aria, when suddenly a long blank in the organ part occurs? In Handel's time this was child's play; to-day an art of the past.

They are just as few, also, who can with study work out in true Handelian style the motive of an aria or chorus in all its bearings: or in other words, are able to arrange a work of Handel in complete form. I saw lately an edition of "Il Pensieroso," published at Leipsic. So far as carrying out that master's idea of musical form is concerned, it is a failure. The work was merely a filling out of the few harmony ciphers which Handel saw fit to write. The well-known style of repeating in the accompaniment as prelude, interlude, or postlude, the theme of the aria, is disregarded. At the conclusion of a phrase, instead of continuing the motion and carrying out the original idea, the accompaniment falls into a sluggish and stiff arrangement of the harmony as it stands ciphered in the original score; spoiling the beauty of the piece and misrepresenting Handel.

To supply these oft occurring blanks an accompanist must be perfect master of musical form and must have a keen power of analysis; added to which a deep musical nature. Each of these necessary qualities ROBERT FRANZ possesses to an eminent degree. This composer, so well known in America, has devoted much time of late to the studying and re-arranging of the Handel Operas. There have been published in Leipzig, during the past month, Twelve Arias each for the four different voices. The score for orchestra and organ will soon follow, with complete re-arrangement of the choruses. The thought of their being wasted early efforts of Handel, will give way, upon hearing, to one of admiration. Some of the favorite numbers of the oratorios have been taken verbatim from the operas, to which the Messiah forms no exception. The Arias will become favorites of the concert room, and the public, as well as singers, will be grateful for such a new fund of classic music. Among the Alto Arias, "Confusa si miri l'infida consorte," from Rodelinda, is especially beautiful; and of the Soprano: "Ritorna o caro e dolce," from Rodelinda, and "Empio diro tu sei," from Julius Caesar. The Italian is attended by a German translation. It is the first time that these noble arias have been brought before the public in so complete a form. Here and there you may find a note which is not in the original theme; but the whole is so true to Handel, so free from foreign element, so devoid of any personal and egotistical exhibition on the part of Franz, that our Handel-loving public cannot but give them a hearty welcome, and musicians be thankful to have once more in an intelligent form these long neglected creations of the genius of Handel. O.

Devrient's Recollections of Mendelssohn.

Almost every one who ever knew Mendelssohn personally, or who was at any time in correspondence with him, seems to feel called upon of late to write a book about him. "Reminiscences" abound. The most widely circulated and most popular in this country and in England, no doubt, are those by the somewhat sentimental musical romancer, the German lady who rejoices in the nom de plume of Elise Polko. The Polko book, which has been republished here (Leypoldt and Holt, New York), is certainly readable, and in some ways brings one nearer to the man as he looked and moved in the musical and social world of Leipzig. Especially does it illustrate the enthusiastic worship he excited among music-loving and impressible young German girls in the gushing, hero-worshipping period of their life. Nor here have we any reason to question its veracity, making allowance for a great deal of couleur de rose.

A far different book is that by Edward Devrient, a distinguished actor and singer (not the great Emil Devrient), an intimate friend of Felix from his youth, associated with him in many of his most important doings, and particularly in all that related to his well known desire to compose an opera. We fully agree with all that is said of the book in the article which we copy below from the London Athenæum. It does give us a deeper insight than any other into the real character and nature of the man. It deals soberly and wisely with its subject, without exaggeration or romance. We have made numerous translations from it during the past year for the benefit of our readers, and should have continued them, but that a translation of the whole work (it is small) was announced in London. We quite agree, too, with what the Athenæum says of Lady Wallace's translations of the "Letters," and are disposed to take on trust its assurance of the greater faithfulness of Devrient's translator. Why will not Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt add this to their beautiful reprints of other works of the same class?

My Recollections of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, and his Letters to Me. By Edward Devrient.

Translated from the German by Natalia Macfarren. (London, Bentley.)

Meine Erinnerungen an Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, und seine Briefe an mich. Von Edward Devrient. (Leipzig: Weber.)

Of all the books yet published on Mendelssohn, this gives the reader the clearest insight into the character of the most gifted musician of our time. The earnest, conscientious nature of the man, his unceasing striving to attain perfection, his sympathy with every elevating pursuit, his strong affection for family and intimate friends, his impatience of opposition and contradiction, his extreme sensitiveness, and his occasional irritability, are here fully and unreservedly displayed. Herr Devrient first shows us the little prodigy of twelve years old, and allows us to follow his progress year by year, often week by week, until the sad catastrophe that robbed the world of so much promise. The form into which the narrative is thrown gives the reader peculiar facilities for becoming acquainted with Mendelssohn's characteristics. The numerous letters—even more charming, because still more unconstrained than those delightful notes of travel published some years ago—are so many windows, through which we gaze at our will at Mendelssohn's simple, frank, guileless nature, while the shrewd, though sympathetic comments of Herr Devrient convey the impression produced by the composer on his personal friends and on the world at large. Singularly real and lifelike is the account of how the two friends were bent upon having a performance of Sebastian Bach's "Passion according to St. Matthew,"—how they called with this object upon rough old Zelter,—how, in spite of much discouragement and many difficulties, they at length carried their point,—and how, from the first performance of this work under Mendelssohn's direction, dates the recently rekindled love for the long-neglected master. Well might this great scholar exclaim with pride, "And to think that it should be an actor and a Jew who gave back to the people the greatest of Christian works!" Especially interesting to us is all that relates to Mendelssohn's frequent journeys to England. He writes his opinion of us without the least reserve; but although the confession tells against ourselves, we must concede that the strictures are just. And it is pleasant to observe that Mendelssohn grows more attached to England with each visit. Even when he is most severe upon us, he finds still more fault with the Berliners, to whom he has so strong an antipathy. "Here," he says, "music is treated as a business; it is calculated, paid for, and bargained over, and much indeed is wanting; but the difference between a musical festival here and in Germany shows where the disparity lies.... When I think of the musicians of Berlin, I overflow with gall and wormwood; they are miserable shams, with all their sentimentality and devotion to art. I have no intention to sing the praises of English musicians; but when they eat an apple-pie, at all events they do not talk about the abstract nature of a pie, and of the affinities of its constituent crust and apples, but they heartily eat it down. May the devil have his own!"

The perpetual craving of Mendelssohn to make a name as an operatic composer comes out very strongly in this volume,—too strongly perhaps, seeing that Herr Devrient was the unceasing instigator, and that it was from the singer playwright that the composer hoped to receive the libretto which would come up to his ideal of what an opera book should be. To the anxiety of Mendelssohn to write for the stage, and to his extreme punctiliousness in choosing a subject, we owe many valuable indications of the high principles which governed his artistic life. Thus, in one valuable letter on the subject, he writes thus:—Ever since I began to compose, I have remained true to my starting principle: not to write a page because no matter what public or what pretty girl wanted it to be thus or thus; but to write solely as I myself thought best, and as it gave me pleasure. I will not depart from this principle in writing an opera, and this makes it so very hard; since most people, as well as most poets, look upon an opera merely as a thing to be popular. I am aware that popularity is more essential and natural to an opera than to a symphony or oratorio, pianoforte pieces, and such like; nevertheless, with these even, it takes time before one stands sufficiently firm to be above all danger of being misled by external considerations; and this leaves me hope that I may yet write an opera with joy, and the good conscience that my principle has not wavered." A hope, never, alas! to be fully realized.

Later on, Mendelssohn suggests 'Lear' or 'Faust' adding, "I always return to the latter."

These extracts are from the above-cited English translation, which, on the whole, has been admirably executed, the translator adding many interesting notes, and in several important matters setting Herr Devrient right on questions of fact. So faithfully has the version been made, that the English, frequently harsh and unidiomatic, suffers. But this is a fault on the right side. After the slipshod, blundering translation of the 'Reisebriefe,' this conscientious version of Herr Devrient's 'Recollections' is especially to be prized.

THE HUMBOLDT CELEBRATION, at the Music Hall, next Tuesday afternoon, must not be forgotten. The arrangements are complete, and it promises in every way to be one of the most interesting celebrations ever yet held in this country. Besides the address by AGASSIZ, there will be noble music admirably in keeping with his subject and the whole thought of the occasion. Mr. PAINNE will open the exercises with Bach's Toccata in F upon the organ. A fine orchestra, under Mr. ZERRAHN, will play Mozart's Zauberflöte overture before the address, and the Introduction and first movement of Beethoven's 7th Symphony after it. The singing will be by the Orpheus enlarged by other German Clubs, to the number of some 80 voices, also directed by Mr. Zerrahn, and will consist of the Chorus of Priests in the Zauberflöte (Consecration of "the noble youth") and Mendelssohn's part-song: "Der fröhe Wandersmann," which happens to have an equal fitness in connection with the proposed "Humboldt Scholarship"; also a fine Hymn "An die Musik," by Vincent Lachner.

The Germans also have a celebration of their own in the same Hall in the evening.

ENGLISH OPERA.—Mme. PAREPA-ROSA seems bent upon giving us something more complete and excellent in this line than we have had before. Herself a host, she has made up her company of good materials by all account. Miss ROSE HERSEK, a new prima donna, is described as young, pretty, and very clever, with a high, light, Soprano voice, having the reputation in London of combining eminent effective talent with modest worth. She is to make her New York debut in the "Sonnambula." Then, besides the SKQUINS, Mr. CASTLE and Mr. CAMPBELL, there is Mr. ALBERTO LAWRENCE, a good actor, with a superb high baritone, we hear, who has won reputation in Italy as well as London, and there is Mr. NORDBLUM, the young Swedish tenor, brought to this country and in some sense educated by the Rosas for this special sphere. We hear that he sang very finely in the Creation at Chicago.

Their season opens at the French Theatre, New York, this evening, with Balfe's "Puritan's Daughter," a light, popular opera, full of flowing melody, new to America, which saw a hundred nights in London. Mme. Rosa sang there in it, and counts it among her favorite parts. Miss Hersek is to sing also in Auber's Domino Noir. Other operas mentioned for performance are, "Fra Diavolo," "Mariana," Gounod's "Faust," &c. But far the finest hope of all is raised by the promise of Weber's Oberon, and Mozart's Figaro. The company will visit Boston in due time of course.

ELEGANT EXTRACTS.—The best comment upon some things one meets with now and then in print, is to post them up, letting them speak for themselves. Here are two:

1. (From the Daily Sentinel, Indianapolis, Aug. 17.) A Boston amateur pianist, with the exquisite high sounding title of "Ernst Perabo," (Grand French-iano, "you know,") gave a very commonplace soiree yesterday, to the musical element of our city, most of whom were good judges of very ordinary music, but sadly at a loss to comprehend Perabo's great forte. It certainly did not lay in his manipulation of the piano, to impart any new light to our youngsters, and his display here was simply what any number of our young Misses can perform without any extra practice.

2. (From Loomis' Musical Journal, New Haven, August.)

Meaner than all the rest is it for a paper like Dwight's Journal, located in Boston, and one that should support the thing [viz. Peace Jubilee] with heart and pen, to indulge in such a spirit of calumny and apparent revenge, that is so eminent in their issue of July 31. If Mr. Dwight was not made President of the Association or Chairman of the Music Committee, he need not show his wrath in such a boyish way. He appears as J. S. D., in a long letter in the Tribune, which is very plausibly written and reads very prettily, but is thoroughly unjust and takes a very false view of the whole matter. We should respect Mr. Dwight's course if we could, but he has made it utterly impossible for us to do so.

Mr. S. N. PENFIELD, organist, of Rochester, N. Y., after two years study in Leipzig, has returned to this country and established himself professionally in Chicago. One of the Rochester papers translates, from the Leipziger Tageblatt, of June 11, a notice of his performance on the organ at the Nicolai Church, as follows:

On Thursday, June 9th, occurred the organ exhibition of the pupils of the conservatory, under the direction of Prof. Richter and Dr. Papperitz, which furnished a brilliant testimonial to superior style and careful instruction. Especially worthy of note as the crowning point of the performances (which were throughout very praiseworthy) was the rendering of Bach's compositions by Mr. S. N. Penfield, from Rochester, U. S. A. It indicated a comprehension of the character of the instrument in most worthy style, a cultivation in manual and pedal playing, and sure observance of a clear and finished technic. Such study will work out the highest success in art culture.

The Athenæum by no means flatters the Tonic Sol-faists. With reference to their display at the Crystal Palace lately, it speaks thus:—

"The success of the Tonic Sol-fa Concert at the Crystal Palace, on Wednesday, was hardly equal to its pretensions. Its pretensions were great, apart from the superiority claimed for what is styled 'the new notation.' Each of the singers (nominally there were 4,500 in the orchestra) had passed an examination, and obtained an 'elementary certificate of proficiency' at least; while, we are assured many had reached a higher grade. Moreover, criticism was especially challenged by the performance at sight of a piece never before heard in public. We may consider, therefore that the choir was a finished product of Sol-faism, and that it fairly represented what the method can do. Under these circumstances the concert must be set down as a failure. All though many of the selections were easy, and none more difficult than Handel's 'Theme Sublime' or the 'Benedictus' from Weber's Mass in G, few were given really well. The voices were often out of tune with the organ; the 'attack' of the various parts was extremely weak; and the delivery of tone rough and inartistic throughout. These faults were very noticeable in the first, or sacred portion of the programme, and may account for the fact that only one piece, the well-worn 'Gloria' of Pergolesi, made any effect. The secular music was better rendered, and had a better reception. Against the faults named it is only fair to place the merit of steadiness. Nowhere was there more than the slightest wavering in the immense choir singing together—we believe, without any general rehearsal. To the night-singing test we do not attach the importance which would belong to it under more exacting conditions. The piece selected—part of an anthem by Henry Smart—is, simply harmonized, limited to the tonic and dominant keys, and abounds in passages of imitation. Moreover, before all the copies were distributed, a large portion of the choir had time to give it as much study as was necessary for any but an absolute beginner. That, under such favorable conditions, the little piece was read off remarkably well, can surprise nobody. The Tonic Sol-faists are, without doubt, doing a good work by spreading musical knowledge among the humbler classes; but they have yet to show, in a practical manner, that their system is an improvement upon the one they wish to supersede."

HAMBURG.—The Singacademia, formerly under the direction of Grund, then of Stockhausen, and, at present of Herr von Bernath, will celebrate its fiftieth anniversary this autumn. Among the works selected for performance on this occasion are Handel's Solomon and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

WIENENWANG.—The subscription for the Gluck monument to be erected here has reached the sum of 1750 florins: Of this, the King of Bavaria gave 400 florins; the King of Wurtemberg 100 florins; the King of Saxony 52 florins; the Grand Duke of Hesse 100 florins; and the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin 87 florins. Liberal German Potentates! About seventy-four pounds raised among five of them for a monument to Gluck.

Herr Wagner's "Meistersinger" is definitely accepted for the Berlin Opera, and will be brought out at the end of October, with Herr Niemann as Walter, Mlle. Mallinger as Eva, and Mlle. Brandt as Madeleine. As a set-off against this triumph, a parody of the same opera is having great success at Mayence. The piece is called "Les Maitres Chanteurs, ou le Judaisme en Musique," and its chief characters are Richard Demence, Félix Mendelssboun, Meyerbach, and Offenbeer. Judging by those names its satire must be heavy; but the Mayence folk are said to laugh at it with singular heartiness.

The Pesar fete in honor of Rossini began on the 21st with a performance of Cherubini's D minor Mass in the church of St. Francis. It was to last five days.

The Parisians will lose their darling, M. Capoul, awhile, if it be true that Mr. Strakosch has engaged him for a tour in the United States. La France Musicale says, pathetically, "Esperons qu'il n'en sera rien."

The Marquis and Marquise de Caux are in Homberg, where the Marquise sings for fourteen nights; then for two at Baden; after which she returns to Paris, and gives M. Bagier October, and then goes to St. Petersburg.

The Musical Standard states that a statue of Goethe is to be inaugurated at Munich in the early part of September. On this occasion three productions of the illustrious poet will be given—"Iphigenia in Tauris," "Torquato Tasso," and "Faust."

The dearth of musical news is rather remarkable. Here are a few gleanings from the New York Weekly Review:

CARLOTTA PATTI.—Great expectations are raised to hear this celebrated vocalist, who has been the great concert star of Europe for the last four or five years. Carlotta has not only wonderfully improved in voice and execution, but also in appearance. To judge from various photographs shown us, European life has agreed with her. She, as well as Messrs. Ritter, Jean Prume, and Max Strakosch, will be here in a few days. Mr. Theodor Ritter is not a German, as we stated last week, but a Frenchman, hailing from Marseilles. We are pleased to see Mr. Strakosch has secured the services of this eminent pianist, who will form an attraction in himself, although the marvellous singing of Miss Patti will of course be the feature of the concerts—to commence on the 20th of this month.

ADELAIDE PHILLIPS is at Marshfield, Massachusetts, in attendance at the bed side of her father, who is dangerously ill. Miss Phillips has given up her Paris engagement, and refuses all offers of business, on account of this domestic trouble and duty.

A new singer, whose voice was commended by Rossini as remarkably fine, is shortly to make her appearance here in the concert room. She is a Spanish Lady, Mlle. Marie Cortez, and is reported to be both beautiful and talented. The lady will arrive here, we are assured, in about two weeks.

A German opera company, chiefly composed of the German singers "of note" in this city, intends to open a short season at the French Theatre, either on the 18th or 25th of October. The management is entrusted to Mr. Wertheimer and the conductor's baton to Mr. Carl Anschutz.

Mr Theodore Thomas treated the lovers of music last night, at the Central Park Garden, to Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen," Wagner's Bridal Procession from "Lohengrin," three parts of Mozart's Symphony in D, and Liszt's "Marche Hongroise." Mr. Levy played Rossini's "Una voce," and achieved as usual a genuine success.

A NEW BATCH OF PRODIGES.—We quote the following from the New York Season: "There has recently arrived from Berlin a remarkable family of five children, called the Franko Family, whose ages range from seven to fourteen years—all of whom are most accomplished performers alike on the violin and piano, and are exponents of the most classical and difficult music on either instrument. Their public performances in Berlin, and other leading German cities, have elicited the most unqualified admiration, and those who have heard them privately since their arrival, assert that they are fully warranted. The public will, however, shortly have an opportunity of judging for themselves at their inaugural concert, at Steinway Hall. Though receiving their musical education at Berlin, they were all born in New Orleans."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Sleep, my Baby, Sleep. 3. F to f. Clement. 30
A sweet lullaby, combined with a graceful sentiment in the verses. Has a good chorus.
- Clochette. 2. F to g. Molloy. 30
This quaint title names a charming little song about pretty "Clochette," who could 'nt help being a coquette, but was finally cured of it. A taking song to sing before company.
- Annie's winning Smile. 3. A to e. Blamphin. 30
About a moonlight walk to the stile, the waving corn and the summer night, illumined by "Annie's winning smile." Very pleasing song with a good chorus.
- Act on the Square. 2. G to d. Lee. 30
Capital advice; not only to Macons, but all good men. Effective song before a company.
- Say, my Heart, why art thou beating. (Was ich still). 3. E to g. Abt. 30 Somewhat in the style of "Thou art so near, and yet so far," and quite elegant. The imagery of "dreams," "shadows" &c., is well brought in.
- The Wanderer's Dream. (Mir singt in Hain). 3. F to e. Abt. 30
A "first class" song of classic beauty.
- Stay gentle Morn awhile. 3. G to e. Abt. 40
If "Morn" has an ear for music, it will certainly "stay" to hear such singing. An admirable song, in which the beauties of the fresh morning are finely portrayed.
- Adieu to the Woodlands. (Abschied vom Walde). Duet. 3. C to g. Abt. 30
A very beautiful duet forming, with the others, a set of pieces of which Abt need not be ashamed.
- Only at Home. 3. A to f. Gabriel. 30
The old beautiful sentiment well expressed. Among the best of the "Home" songs. Take it "home" with you.
- Sweet Dora. 3. G to f. Allen. 30
Pretty Dora's three innocent "wishes" were hardly uttered before the things wished for came to pass. A pretty idea, nicely brought on in words and music.
- Somebody's Wife; or, O, I'd go and see my Mother. Jackson. 30
- Walk off, big Shoes! Holder. 30
New contributions to comic musical literature. The more the merrier, and these are merry enough.
- Down by the River side I stray. 3. F to f. Thomas. 50
Very sweet ballad. Of course he did not stray alone, and the "wedding" scene on one corner of the fine lithograph title informs us well enough as to what came after those pleasant walks.

Instrumental.

- Prince Arthur Galop. 3. F. Prince. 30
A wide awake little thing, like the young prince whose name it bears. A pleasant run and good reception to both.
- Rip Van Winkle Galop. 3. B. Wellman. 40
A sort of steady movement, characteristic and pleasing.
- Music at Eve. Reverie. Mack. 40
- Rosy Morn. Mazourka. " 40
- Water Witch. Barcarole. " 40
Three pieces by this favorite author, quite famous for excellent arrangements.
- Potpouri. Fidelio. 4. Wels. 75
This selection from the melodies of what many consider the best of all operas, will be welcomed by all players.
- Warrior Polka. 3. E. Turner. 30
Original, and with a striking melody.
- Spring Fairy. 3. B. Engelbrecht. 60
A new edition of a great favorite, good for an instructive piece, and good any way. The lithograph title is a "success" and quite ornamental.
- Grotto Polka. 3. E. Turner. 30
A trifle more extended and difficult than most of Mr. T's compositions. Original and good music.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

The Musical Drama and the Works of Richard Wagner.

From the French of EDOUARD SCHUBS.

III.

The Master-Singers played but an inferior rôle in the poetry of the middle ages; but in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries a very important part of the history of German culture belongs with them. After those brilliant poet knights of an earlier time, who were known as the Minnesingers, and along with the simple, popular ballads which burst out so spontaneously in the sixteenth century, the citizen poets of the free cities may be considered the true representatives of scholastic pedantry. Their uncouth ritual, their barbaric code known as the Tablature, their solemn sessions, make an amusing picture of the stationary school, exclusive, rigid, unfriendly to any free inspiration, which makes a trade of poetry, and a mere apprenticeship of genius. The most flourishing of these schools appeared in Nuremberg, in the sixteenth century, in the time of Albrecht Dürer. Wagner, seeking the great human verity in the varied national types, discovered here the material for a most interesting drama. He conceived the idea of placing in contrast with these scholastic pedants one of nature's poets, full of youth and fire, singing as the birds sing, because an inner voice commands it, knowing no prosody but the beatings of his generous heart, no rules but his own impetuous and overmastering inspiration. We have then poetry, enthusiasm, genius, entering the lists against feebleness and prose. This strife is the point of the drama, where the noble, the beautiful and the true, by their own simple expansive power, triumph over the mean, the false, and the ridiculous. This beautiful idea is brought before us through a variety of characters, an abundance of episodes, a wealth of poetic invention and a lavish use of melody and instrumental effect, which makes the drama a truly wonderful production.

When the curtain rises, the interior of a church, that of St. Catherine, in Nuremberg, is discovered. The grand nave vanishes obliquely at the left, so that one sees only the last rows of worshippers. The organ peals, and the congregation sing the last strophe of a choral in four parts, whose sonorous harmony swells grandly under the arched roof. As in all Lutheran canticles, the grave and measured melody rests an instant after each verse, before resuming its upward flight. In these short pauses, a significant pantomime is carried on between two persons. A young knight, richly clad in velvet, stands behind a pillar with his eyes fixed upon a young girl, seated in the last rank. He seems to desire to speak to her. His expressive gestures indicate a fervent prayer, an appeal, ardent, yet limited by respect. She replies with timid glances,—then suddenly looks down, blushes, and resumes her singing. The conclusion of the service interrupts this mute dialogue, which has been powerfully rendered by the expressive music of the violoncellos. The congregation begins to disperse; the young girl, accompanied by her nurse, is making her way towards the door, when the knight presses through the crowd and addresses her. He, let us say at once, is Walter von Stolzing, a young Franconian noble, who has just arrived at Nuremberg. Hospitably received in the house of a goldsmith, Pogner, one of the most wealthy of the Master-Singers, he has fallen passionately in love with the daughter of his host, and has followed her to church, hoping to obtain a moment's speech with her. Eva, trembling, agitated, already conquered, knows not what to say, yet seeks a pretext to linger; there is no young girl so naïve, but love can make her marvellously ingenious. Eva knows well enough how it has happened that her handkerchief was left behind on the bench, and that her bracelet was dropped on the way out. "Go and seek them, they are there," she says to her waiting-woman, and the latter hastens away. Instantly a rapid dialogue begins. Walter presses her with questions. "Only one word,—you will not say it? The sentence of my fate, yes or no?—Only a faint whisper,—say, Fräulein, are you betrothed already?" What does he learn? Her father has promised her to the master-singer who tomorrow shall win the crown. "And the maiden, whom would she choose?—You or no one!" Eva cries, forgetting herself. Madeleine, the good nurse, in vain interposes with an air of importance and of maternal protection; the word is spoken, it rings in the ears of Walter, it burns in his heart. The lovers make a rendezvous for the evening: Walter believes he can gain the prize; and the scene ends with a song, "Ich liebe dich." The melody, pleading, questioning, impatient, which seems to hesitate and try its wings in the brief and hurried questions of the lover, bursts into accents of chivalrous daring, and assumes the bold contour of a brilliant aria, in which the first scene comes gaily to its close.

Eva goes away, led by Madeleine, and Walter remains alone with David, an apprentice of Hans Sachs, the poet-shoemaker, to whom Madeleine confides the duty of instructing Walter in all that it may be needful for him to do, to obtain his degree of master. "Master, all at once! Oh! oh! here is courage!" cries the apprentice, scanning Walter from head to foot. He knows the difficulties of the art and enumerates them with amusing pride.

Other apprentices now arrive in the church, where a solemn session of the Master-Singers is to be held. It is a historic fact that these grand meetings of the brotherhood were held in the church of St. Catherine in Nuremberg. All the time teasing their comrade David, who plays the wise man towards the stranger knight, they bring up the benches for the masters, the elevated chair for the singer, and arrange a stage veiled by a black curtain, which they call the Gemerk. In this cage of evil augury is shut up the Merker, the critic, who marks down pitilessly the faults of the hapless singer. The apprentices rally the knight upon his audacity in thinking to go at a single bound over all obstacles, and to improvise himself "master" in a day. Their task ended, these gamins perform a wild dance around the tribune, hurling at the knight this mocking refrain, to which they keep time as they dance:

"The crown of flowers, the lovely crown, Shall this fine knight attain the prize?"

There is a mad mischief in the song; the last note is like the snap of a squib; but the entrance of the grave Master-Singers cuts the merriment short. The school being in high conclave, Pogner hastens to introduce his protégé, Walter von Stolzing. At his appearance, a murmur runs through the learned assembly. A knight in the school of these simple burghers! It is a dangerous innovation, subversive of all order. And then to ask at once for the rank of master,—what youthful arrogance, what aristocratic presumption! An unknown author, coming from the depths of his province, his pen behind his ear, to present himself to the French Academy, could cause no greater surprise in Paris, than the young Lord of Stolzing entering bravely the school of Master-Singers of Nuremberg. It requires all the eloquence of his friend the goldsmith, and all the authority of the old and valiant poet Hans Sachs, who laughs at forms and can already divine in the unknown youth something noble,—to gain for him admission to the solemn test. The President, solemn and severe, the image of rigid dogmatism, rises and proceeds to question the newcomer. Who is your master, he says, where have you learned the art of song? At the question, the most lovely souvenirs of his early youth arise in the mind of Walter; like a dream, comes the memory of the chateau, where, the last of his race, he passed his early days in sweet reveries and long meditations. All this is suggested vaguely by the music, in a prelude of infinite sweetness. Such is the charm of this melody, where the dreamy notes of the horn mingle with the gentle sighs of the violins, that one forgets the scene upon the stage and is transported in imagination to some vast forest solitude where the spring sunshine falls, a checkered light and shade, and only a faint breeze among the tree-tops breaks the profound silence. Walter stands an instant as if lost in these recollections, then he collects himself and his thought seems to shape itself into the slow, broad melody of a lied, expressing what he thus recalls, and summing it up,—"There I learnt what it is to sing!"

There is so much self-reliance in his manner, so much brave pride in what he says, that they all consent to listen to him; but first the critic must be installed in his Gemerk. By chance, this personage is the most arrant pedant of all, and also, still graver misfortune, an aspirant to the hand of Eva. He has been burning with anger and impatience against the stranger, in whom he already detects a rival. Master Beckmesser, the city-recorder, a bachelor of fifty years' standing, considers himself the handsomest youth and the most irresistible singer in Nuremberg. His greatest talent consists in criticizing others; to fill this office is his especial delight. He is so skillful that no fault escapes him; he leaps with joy at every forbidden rhyme, and each false note occasions him a thrill of rapture. In his eyes every new singer is a bungler, as to some judges every accused person is at once a criminal. He advances towards Walter with an air of smartness, bows ironically and says in a bantering tone: "I grant you seven mistakes; I am going to mark them down with chalk. But if you go beyond seven you are ruined, Sir Knight!" Thereupon he mounts his staging and disappears behind the black curtain. Walter, already somewhat disconcerted, seats himself in the fatal chair, which is raised facing the Masters like a sort of pulpit. "The singer is in his place," Kothner says in his heavy bass; and from behind the curtain, the critic adds in falsetto the fatal word "Commence." The poet, thus adjured, hesitates an instant, then with sudden inspiration rises to his full height, and seizing upon the word which has been thrown at him as a defiance, takes it as the theme of an enthusiastic Hymn to the Spring-time. "Commence" he says, "Commence cries the spring-time, in the heart of the woods,"—and a charming and brilliant improvisation follows. While he sings impatient growlings are heard from behind the black curtain of the Gemerk, and fierce scratching of chalk upon the tablets. Walter observes this. He pauses and turns indignantly. The harp responds in a rapid arpeggio, like a flash of lightning, which then falls back upon an accord of superb dislain. Walter, too full of enthusiasm to be disconcerted, seizes the incident as it flies. Half turning towards the powerless critic, he continues: "Shuddering with rage, with spite and hatred, in a savage thicket the Winter is hidden; hidden under the dead wood the coward rails, hoping to impose silence upon the cry of hope! "But commence!" he goes on, and resumes the prelude to his Hymn.

This dithyrambic melody is a magnificent outburst! intoxicated with light and perfume and life, it soars upward from zone to zone of the blue heaven, sustained by an accompaniment of the full orchestra, where the thousand voices of the forest unite in one grand and beautiful symphony.

The Merker loses patience utterly. Furious, he emerges from his hiding place, brandishing the black tablets, all scribbled over with chalk. "That is enough," he cries, "there is no more room." Walter would finish, but it is useless; the assembly rises tumultuously; the Masters form a ring around the critic, who eagerly demonstrates to them his rival's high crimes and misdemeanors. "No pause, no ornamentation, not a trace of melody!" cries the triumphant Recorder. The opinion is unanimous; Walter's attempt is declared absurd, foolish, incomprehensible. One man only watches the brave singer with an admiration that is half amazement. This is old Hans Sachs, the beloved poet of Nuremberg;—in his way, a true poet, and above the prejudices of the school. He takes up the defence, and calls upon Walter to go on with his song, regardless of these pedants who refuse to listen. Walter obeys, proudly erect in his pulpit, and goes on amid uproar and outcries from below. The finale of the first act is very effective. The daring song of Walter dominates over the Masters, as enthusiasm must forever overpower incapacity and weakness. He sings of the bird with radiant plumage, who essays his flight amid a crowd of screech-owls, rises far above them, spreads wide his wings in the tranquil azure, then through the free spaces of air flies to his native mountains. The bird is himself, his own song, the proud melody which now in this third strophe spreads to the utmost its broad, strong wings. "Adieu forever, ye Masters!" cries Walter, scornfully; he descends from his place, and goes out of the church. The uproar of the scandalized Masters is at its height. But through all this agitation Sachs, standing motionless and fascinated, has heard only the song of the stranger Knight. "What courage!" he cries, "What fire!—silence, Masters, listen! It is the heart of a hero, it is a true poet!" It is but wasted breath; the verdict is rendered, all hurry pell-mell towards the doors, and amid the general confusion the apprentices renew their mad gambols around the tribune, and their refrain, "The crown of flowers, the lovely crown!"—

The second act shows us the picturesque city of Nuremberg. A narrow street opens before us in perspective. At the left, is the modest little house of the shoemaker Hans Sachs; clumps of lilacs surround the peaceful dwelling and a flowering vine wreaths itself familiarly about the latticed windows of the old poet. At the right, is the more imposing mansion of Master Pogner, shaded by a fine linden tree, decorated with a stone staircase, and a recessed door-way. Two ranks of pointed roofs, with airy gables and little graceful spires, like a forest of masts, lose themselves in the distance, and over the busy city the last splendors of a summer sunset are fading in the pure sky.

The curfew has sounded; the apprentices are leaving their work with merry outcries: "To-morrow is the St. John! it is the St. John, when one sees all flowers and ribbons everywhere!" David and Madeleine, who venture themselves an instant among the mad crowd, receive all sorts of raillery. "On the St. John, every body goes to be married! the old men marry the little girls, and the old maid marries the boy!" Night falls, all disperse, and the street is vacant. Hans Sachs opens the little door of his workshop, lights his lamp, and sits down upon his bench and begins to work.

But the evening is too enchanting, the silence too profound, the perfume of the lilacs too bewildering; the work does not get on, and laying aside his hammer he dreams. The song of Walter rings yet in his ears, and possesses him strangely. "I feel it, but understand it not; I cannot recall it, nor yet can I forget it. I try to seize it, but the measure escapes me. How could I grasp the Infinite? These accents are so well-known and yet so new, new as a bird's song in the month of May." He seeks and dreams, and seeks again and cannot find, while the hautboy and the horn repeat the most tuneful and penetrating phrase of Walter's trial-song. "How did he grasp this melody? from what land does he come? from what world overflowing with youth and strength?" This Hymn to the Spring-time has awakened very deep echoes in the heart of the old poet; it seems to have revealed a creative force, and waked him up to sing also, as the first notes of the nightingale awake in the trees around a thousand passionate responses. The instrumentation is magical which accompanies this monologue; the light susurrus of violins, the faint, dying notes of the flute, the prolonged, unanswered appeal of the horns, those mysterious harmonies through which fit the exquisite motifs of Walter's song, reveal to us that labor of brain and heart, that mysterious germination, that new spring-time, which is putting forth in the head of the old master.

An unexpected and charming visit disturbs his reverie. Eva has slipped out from the paternal abode; she crosses on tip-toe, and, furtively, like a young fawn, she approaches the workshop of the shoemaker. She is filled with deep anxiety. Has Walter been successful,—will he be permitted to compete on the morrow? This is what she comes to ask. Sachs, agreeably surprised by his fair visitor, rises; Eva seats herself upon the stone bench outside the house; the master, within, rests his arms upon the window-sill, and leans towards the beautiful young girl. The lilacs make a frame for the picture, and a beam of moonlight caresses it. It is an idyl.

A sportive conversation ensues; the old man rallies her on the betrothal which shall take place on the morrow; she cautiously makes inquiries about the events of the day, and learns at last, to her dismay, that her lover has failed completely and been rejected. Sachs, in his baulnage, slurs the stranger, to bring out Eva's true sentiments, and entirely succeeds in the ruse, she praises Walter enthusiastically, and goes away at last quite in a pet, that her old friend will not respond. In the mean time a little secret is also betrayed to us. The gray-haired old poet, yet young at heart, has a little penchant of his own for the lovely child, the pearl of Nuremberg. As a baby, she had been his plaything; he has watched her growth, he has taught her many a lesson, he has loved her, caressed her, petted her like an adopted daughter. It is one of those paternal affections which is not quite free from a warmer emotion; but the brave old master does not think of owning it, even to himself, and now that he knows which way the wind blows, he gaily decides to take in hand the cause of Walter.

The adventure suddenly threatens to grow graver. Walter is seen coming down the street; faithful to the rendezvous, Eva hastens to meet him. Impatient of further delays, exasperated against the Masters, the young man plans an elopement; he will carry off his lady-love and marry her in his own chateau. Eva throws herself into his arms without hesitation; they are about to fly together, but they have reckoned without Master Sachs. The old shoemaker has been watching them; he carefully opens his window shutter, and a beam of light falls full upon the lovers, who retreat in alarm. At this moment, Beckmesser appears in the distance, playing on his guitar. The Recorder flatters himself that he shall gain the heart of Eva by a nocturnal serenade. Perceiving his enemy, the critic, Walter draws his sword and would rush upon him, but Eva, who fears to attract public attention, with great difficulty holds him back. At last she coaxes him off under the linden tree, and, hidden from sight, the two lovers await the issue of the scene.

Perceiving Beckmesser, Sachs, in pursuance of a sudden idea, re-opens his door, and sets his bench out into the street. At the moment when the Recorder begins to sing, Sachs begins to hammer away loudly upon a pair of shoes he is making, and intones with stentorian voice, a characteristic humorous song. Then the Recorder, beside himself with anger, shouts his own prosaic serenade at the top of his voice, and the comic effect is complete.

This amusing uproar brings all the neighbors to their windows, who, furious at being awakened, load the singer with reproaches. David, the apprentice, comes out, and imagining that the Recorder is an enemy in some way to Madeleine, falls upon him, club in hand, and breaks the guitar into splinters. They begin to fight. The neighbors run out to separate them. "What have you to do with it?" cry new comers, and the neighbors themselves become involved in the quarrel. After the neighbors, come the apprentices, and their companions follow; everybody is screaming, swearing, and striking. Corporation jealousies are aroused. Carpenters, tailors, locksmiths, fall one upon another; the Masters themselves, who arrive to restore peace, end by coming to blows; finally, it is a perfect melée. Walter, remaining with Eva under the linden, proposes now to cut their way out, sword in hand; but Master Sachs makes a descent upon the lovers, with one hand holds Walter, with the other, pushes Eva into her father's arms, then drags the knight off into his own house and shuts the door. At this moment, the watchman of the night is heard, and the horn of Oberon himself would not produce a more magical effect. The combat ceases as if by enchantment; apprentices, companions, burghers take flight, all the windows are closed in a great hurry, and nothing remains before our eyes but the quaint street, lying deserted in the quiet moonlight. The nocturnal guardian arrives a little too late; he rubs his eyes, looks around him in amazement, believes it was a troop of spectres, and, trembling with fear repeats his chant:—"Listen, good people, lend your ear,—the bell has sounded eleven,—beware of ghosts and goblins,—let no evil spirit bewitch you. Praise the Lord!"

The conclusion of this act is a master-stroke of dramatic and musical talent. The vast crescendo, which accompanies the melée, develops itself into a fugue, with the melody of the serenade for a ritournelle. Mastering the entire orchestra, it becomes a whirlwind of sound. That absurd little air with which the gallant Recorder proposed to soften his obdurate lady-love, serves only to stir up the neighborhood. Like a mocking imp it springs up around him, multiplied to hundreds, and flying out of windows, escaping at doors, returns, a formidable legion, to assail the terrified singer: The pedant is punished by his own sin, belabored by the serenade he has himself composed, which infests him like a disturbed ant-hill. The idea is original and the comic effect is perfect. Any other composer would have let the curtain fall upon this Shakspearian burst of laughter. Wagner has not done so, and the subtle, profound genius of this true poet and great musician is rarely more admirably shown. There is the sound of a horn, and all vanishes; the night watchman sings in the silence his grave couplets, half comic, half religious,—the moon climbs between the slender gables of the sleeping city;—with the stroke of a wand one seems to have been carried off into some airy kingdom, where spirits amuse themselves in sowing discord among the honest burghers, the better to bring about the triumphs of their favorites. Staccato scherzando the flutes resume the strange motif which is about to be lost in the depths of the bass, while the horn repeats twice, like a soft questioning whisper, three dreamy notes from Walter's prelude. You seem to see the sportive ring of imps and fays stealing away,—its luminous trace fading out fainter and fainter, while one belated sylph leans over Eva to whisper her lover's name in the sleeping ear of the maiden. Music has surely its magic spells; sixteen measures suffice to bring before our eyes all the fairy realm of Oberon and Titania.

Christine Nilsson.

X.

A representative French composer in the local sense—that is to say with little qualification to carry his fame beyond the frontier—M. Ambroise Thomas, had undertaken a difficulty which his admirers underestimated, but anent which his opponents were scornful. He had hitherto rested his title to reputation as an opera-writer on a couple of lyrical paraphrases (cynics said parodies) of foreign works—on "Mignon," an adaptation from Goethe, and on "Le Songe d'une Nuit d'Été," a wide departure from Shakespeare's play. So wild a perversion of him whom some French critics even to this day persist in styling le grand Williams is rarely seen on the Parisian stage, as this "Dream of a Night of Summer," with its Falstaff, Essex, Queen Elizabeth, and William Shakespeare himself as dramatis personæ mixed in inextricable confusion. Besides these two masterworks, Ambroise Thomas had produced at the Grand Opera "Le Comte de Carmagnola" (1841) and the "Guerillero" (1842), and was noted also for his "Catd." His first work, "Le Perroquet de la Régence," brought out thirty years ago, is forgotten even in France. Neither in his earlier nor in his subsequent compositions had the colder among French musicologists succeeded in discovering any special aptitude for the lyric drama. The order of his music they defined in one word: his style was "moonshiny." "A lesser Gluck," his admirers predicated of him. "Infinitely so," retorted his antagonists.

The libretto which served as groundwork for M. Thomas had been prepared by MM. Michel Carré and Auguste Barbier. The librettists had taken the privileged liberties which might excite an Englishman's amusement, a German's ire; for Germany holds the great poet in severer regard than ourselves. A Hamlet who sings the celebrated Soliloquy on Death in jerky lines—"Être ou n'être pas—mystère—mourir, dormir, rêver peut-être," with curious effects in the accompaniment of wood and strings, is not perhaps so outrageous a burlesque as a Hamlet who sings a "Bacchic Song" (fancy Hamlet "Bacchic!"), a Polonius who is the accomplice of Claudius in the murder, a Laertes modelled on the languishing tenor type, or a final tableau wherein Hamlet, having killed his uncle at the grave of Ophelia, is proclaimed King of Denmark in his stead. A ballet, too, in "Hamlet," a ballet which contains a polka, is not the worst freedom which has been taken with this tragedy in its day. A hundred and fifty years ago the opera of "Ambleto" was produced in London, with an overture composed of "four movements and a jig." On this idea, M. Ambroise Thomas's notion is certainly some advance.

"The present "Hamlet" opens with the coronation of Claudius, celebrated with a sort of nuptial chorus to the words—

Le deuil fait place aux chants joyeux.
Jour de fête, jour d'allégresse!
Nous saluons avec ivresse,
O roi, ton hymen glorieux.

To which the King replies, and then Hamlet enters in a melancholy mood. For his entrée the phrase "O woman, thy name is frailty," is musically turned on the words,

O femme, tu t'appelles, Inconstance et fragilité!

accompanied by the violoncellos. Hamlet's part is a melopée—a character preserved throughout the opera. For the first scene between the Prince and Ophelia, the tone is given from the passage "Doubt that the sun is fire," literally enough followed here:—

Ah doute de la lumière,
Doute du soleil et du jour,
Doute des cieux et de la terre,
Mais ne doute jamais de mon amour.

Laertes makes his appearance at the end of this duet. He is a languishing sort of body—a dilution of the stage troubadour—a Scandinavian Dunois. And the chorus of revellers who tilt the conventional goblets with nothing in them, and sing a namby-pamby refrain about "allégresse," what a parody are they upon the fierce Norsomen and their reckless chief who Keeps wassail, and the swaggering up-spring reels,

And as he drains his draughts of Rhenish down,
The kettledrum and trumpet thus bray out
The triumph of his pledge.

But then the task of Messrs. Barbier and Carré was not fidelity. They had to operate the tragedy, to cut, pare, alter, hack every situation to the exigencies of lyric conventionality. And how they and the composer together managed to turn the notable old points in the tragedy to musical purpose, would have horrified our stern "legitimate" actors. Hamlet's father, for instance, appears with a rumbling and growling of trombones which doubtless caused M. Sax lively satisfaction, but which was a spasmodic agony to the audience. The Ghost is monotonous to a Tartarean degree: his recitative is limited to two notes. Only the picturesque setting of the scene and the excellent acting of M. Faure saved this part of the opera.

The second act proceeds as in the play, the one bright sun-ray amid its profound gloom being the presence of Ophelia. Ophelia, as Nilsson plays the part, is the prop and mainstay of the opera. Beyond the momentary irradiation of her coming and going, all is dulness and atrophy. But even in this bright instance, Ambroise Thomas has to a large extent missed his opportunity: he might have done so much more with such a character and such an artist. This second act contains a duet between Ophelia and the Queen, but a duet which leaves nothing in the memory. She leaves the scene, and the flicker of brightness dies away; the duet between Gertrude and Claudius is dull; dull also the chorus of strolling players, which surely offered opportunity for picturesque color, but the composer is unequal to the demand. Then comes Hamlet's "Bacchic" song—"O vin dissipe la tristesse"—a statement, however, to which poor Hamlet practically gives the lie. It does not dissipate his tristesse, or M. Thomas's. The scene of Gonzago's play was magnificently mounted and acted at the Grand Opera, but here again the music failed: it was sheer noise. The librettists had turned the situation at the end of this scene to appropriate operatic account; had made Hamlet denounce Claudius to his face as the murderer of his brother, and call on the assembled court to "venger la mort du roi par la mort du coupable." With his own hands he endeavors to tear the crown from the culprit's dastard head. Here, at all events, is an opening for powerful musical treatment; but how has the composer dealt with the situation? He gives the exalted Prince a weak melopée with which even Faure could do nothing—an andante devoid of accent, which breaks suddenly off when the musician might have expanded it into a broad and lofty concerted number—and an allegro whose emptiness and inanity not all the big artillery of the orchestra could hide. Compare this miserable poverty of treatment with the finale of the third act of "La Favorita," where a similar dramatic situation—a king denounced and dumbfounded—fell into the hands of Donizetti.

The third act (MM. Barbier and Carré were not particular about transposing the action) opens with the celebrated soliloquy. As well attempt to set a treatise of Spinoza or a thesis of Hegel to music as this. Music ceases at the point where metaphysics begin; yet here is music called upon to express the mental state of one who, in the words of Pascal, "doubts everything, and, doubting even that he doubts, rolls incessantly in a restless circle." Where-with shall music hope to illustrate this frame of mind? with hollow sonorities; with dubious harmonies; with foggy modulations? It is not Ambroise Thomas's worst fault that he utterly fails to realize such subtleties of thought; for what genius could succeed and yet remain comprehensible? Thomas treads on steadier ground in the succeeding trio between Hamlet, Ophelia, and the Queen, wherein an expressive phrase occurs—"Allez dans un cloître, Ophélie!"—and wherein the answering plaint of the young girl is tender and touching. But once more, Ophelia being discarded, out goes the light. The interview between mother and son—the "Look on this picture and on that" scene—is cold and scanty; a tedious recitative cut into fragments occupies the place of a concentrated and inspired motif. Phrases of frigid correctness, learnedly written, accurately modulated, and—wholly destitute of dramatic vigor.

In the fourth act the fog lifts, for this act is devoted to Ophelia; the spell of her sweetness and pathos is upon it, and the audience forget what defects may lie in the music, for they hear her voice and see her. The scene opens with a ballet: peasants are enjoying themselves, holding a mystic fête, when the demented lady enters. On the first night in Paris, the fortunes of the opera took a lively and unexpected turn at this point. A gloom had gradually settled upon the spectators, as the dull work dragged along, and effectless situations followed on each other's heels. But the fourth act opened; the ballet cheered them somewhat, and Ophelia followed. The step, the look, of Christine Nilsson, the first words she uttered in the tender and piteously-sweet voice, enchain every sympathy. It is true that even in this act, as the critic of the Opinion Nationale says, "on danse plus qu'on ne vocalise, on vocalise plus qu'on ne chante;" but Ophelia pervades it, and the audience were more rapt with the manner than the matter. Upon the scene of the revels she enters, fantastically decked with flowers and wisps of straw; slender and sweet; fair, even to transparency; with eyes luminously bright; the weirdness of a fay, the beauty of a virgin. Reason has abandoned mortality only to leave the soul more visible. She sings—lifting an ethereal voice to the lark. Wild rousades, in which the depth and pathos of love mingle with its gayer memories; laughter, in which tears have a part; a joy infinitely compassionate, a pain infinitely dear. She tears the flowers from her hair, and, distributing them, sings a strange wandering melody of Sweden, penetrating in its beauty, luring and tempting, but treacherous in its loveliness, as the voice of a sea-nymph. The shepherds retreat, marvelling; and then she scatters the last of her garlands, and draws near the fatal stream. With the refrain of her lover's song upon her lips, "Doute de la lumière," but feeble as a far-off echo, she casts herself upon the bosom of the water, and floats softly away with the distant chorus of the peasants as an unconscious requiem. You know the picture of the "Young Martyr of the time of Diocletian," the fair Christian girl, drowned, but seeming in a peaceful slumber, with corded hands and a hazy aureole above her head. This picture of Delaroche's was reproduced in the opera; and the beauty of it and its unspeakable truth and tenderness smote every heart and hushed every voice, until the act drop fell and the audience woke to realize that not Ophelia dead but Nilsson living had wrought the miracle.

When Ophelia passes from the opera, dulness once more asserts its sway. The last act takes place in the graveyard. The song of the Grave-diggers lacks character; the romance of Hamlet, "Comme une pâle fleur," evaporates in confused sighs; the chorus of girls lamenting Ophelia is sheer banalité. Desperate with lost love, Hamlet is about to fall upon his sword, when his father's spectre enters and reminds him of his vengeful duty; whereupon the hopeless hero turns the weapon against his uncle—slays him—and is proclaimed king in his stead.

So ends "Hamlet," an œuvre manqué, a failure but for Ophelia. From absolute ruin Nilsson saved the opera; her genius even gave it a fictitious vitality. Paris went over and over again for the sake of the fourth act, and in the beauty of the one impersonation lost sight of the dull and ineffective surroundings. "It is a success, despite all," wrote M. Paul de Saint-Victor, a noted critic; "the Siren attracts the crowd to these stagnant waters. The debut of Mlle Nilsson has had the prestige of an apparition; she appeared at the opera as through the portal of Dreams."

"A woman," wrote M. Hipp. Prevost, "whose talent like her person is all distinction, all purity, all poetry, has performed a miracle. Without gesture, without movement, by the fascination of look, the charms of voice, the touching grace of carriage, Mlle. Nilsson has realized the Ophelia of Shakespeare unto an ideal unsuspected perchance by the genius of the poet himself."

"The physique, the voice, the acting of Mlle. Nilsson," wrote Mr. Alexis Azévedo in the Opinion Nationale, "the nature too of her special talent, concur in producing an effect whose proportions it is impossible to appreciate without seeing the part played by a different Ophelia."

Good artists have often marched to greatness ere now in the van of a great work. But it is only given to the rarest genius to vivify dulness, and to convert a fiasco into a reputable success.

XI.

When Mlle. Nilsson paid her second visit to England last year, the renown of her Ophelia contributed to the prestige of her re-appearance. She was not destined to repeat the entire performance here; but she gave the celebrated scene of the fourth act at Mr. Bonedict's annual concert, and gained as lavish encomiums (personally bestowed, apart from the music) as those awarded by the Parisians. In Italian opera she maintained her own high fame, the knowledge of which was now the wider spread. But it was specially in oratorio that she acquired a new distinction: a triumph gained at the Handel Festival. At that commemoration, which it may be remembered was held at the Crystal Palace on June 16th, 18th, and 20th, Mlle. Nilsson found herself in good company. The principal singers included Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, Mmes Lemmen-Sherrington, and Sainton-Dolby, Mlle. Tietjens and Miss Kellogg; band and chorus numbered four thousand exponents under the well-tryed bâton of Costa. The second day of this celebration was made memorable by the appearance of the Swedish singer, who fairly and easily carried the first honors of the day. The Selection—devoted as a matter of course to Handel exclusively—had opened with the "Epicurean or Song of Triumph," which includes the matchless "Dead March;" the magnificent execution of which by the orchestra provoked a spontaneous burst of cheering from the multitude. They would fain have had it repeated, but Mr. Costa was stern, and the appearance of Mlle. Nilsson on the platform allayed the tumult. Her first contribution was the song of the Israelitish woman in "Judas Maccabæus;"—"From mighty kings he took the spoil." The plaudits of the crowd turned from redemanding the March to welcome the Swedish favorite, and then were hushed into expectation as she commenced the song in praise of the Maccabæe. Anticipation was soon distanced by surprise at the purity, the flexibility, the extent of the young singer's voice, and the fervor of her dramatic expression. Her English pronunciation is crisp and clear, every word uttered with a distinctness rarely attained even by native artists; and as those who had heard her before in opera had only heard her through the medium of a foreign language: the well-pronounced English, vigorously yet elegantly sung, was a new gratification. The animation with which she gave the passage, "He put on his breast-plate as a giant, and girt his warlike harness about him," the force and finish of her vocalization, and the refinement of her phrasing took captive her hearers' hearts. Her pure voice travelled easily and naturally across the large area; there was no straining, yet not a note was lost; her intonation was faultless. If she had been warmly welcomed on beginning the song, it was nothing to the repeated exclamations which pursued her on leaving the platform, and which were repeated when she subsequently stepped forward to sing "Wise men flattering" from the same oratorio. This air is equally exacting upon the singer as the song of triumph, but in a different degree. It demands a greater display of tenderness, more sweetness, an even balance of phrasing. But whatever its exactions, they were fulfilled by the Swedish artist in complete measure, and her perfectly articulated shake won rapturous applause.

Christine Nilsson's part in the commemorative performance was short; for the singers were many and the diversity large; these exigencies and not the will of the audience, limited her share. But enough was heard at the festival to certify the conviction that as an oratorio singer she is unapproached by any other artist whom recent years have produced, and excelled in her sphere by none. The earnestness and refinement of style, which with the sweet and facile voice makes her a lyric of the first grade, are equally felicitous in opera and oratorio. The conjunction proclaims the rare singer. Jenny Lind had it in enviable measure. The second Jenny Lind completes the parallel. The development of Christine Nilsson as the first oratorio singer of the day is a certainty which time will afford. When the opportunity arrives, the great choral societies will find the material—material of a finished and perfect form—ready to hand.

XII.

At the highest point yet attained of her fame Nilsson is with us again, the object of a popularity which each successive appearance and each submitted task have served to increase. Yet it would be wrong to say she has reached the zenith of her reputation. She will achieve yet higher ranges. Her capacities are progressive; her moods capable of expansion; she is still on the upward path. The succession of her labors proves this. Year by year she improves; though excelled only by herself, she nevertheless is excelled. The decay which follows full ripeness is far off, for ripeness is not yet achieved. She is painstaking, conscientious, and young; add these qualities to her rare endowments, and who shall gauge the future excellence of the mature artist?

Fortune has nowise impaired her native modesty or rendered her otherwise than humble and gentle and diffident. Her periodical visits to the home in Sweden are paid without the slightest ostentation. At home, she takes part in the singing at the village church. "I am always glad to assist the poor," she remarked simply on one occasion when she gave her services for charity; "for I have known poverty by experience." Her success in the lyric world she is wont to ascribe to Wartel's excellence as a teacher more than to any inherent merit of her own. After one of her earlier triumphs she wrote to this master a letter which he has carefully preserved. "Cher Maître," she wrote, "je ne veux pas dormir sans vous remercier du bon conseil que vous m'avez donné l'autre jour. Je l'ai suivi, et mon succès de ce soir a été complet. En attendant le plaisir de vous serrer la main et de vous remercier de vive voix, croyez moi toujours votre petite élève affectionnée et dévouée, Christine Nilsson.—Vendredi minuit."

The dwelling which Mlle. Nilsson occupied a short time ago in Paris was simply though elegantly furnished. Her suite of apartments "gave" (as Charles Dickens would say) upon the Tuilleries; the salon was fitted with white and gold, the furniture blue damask. On a white marble chimney piece stood a bronze and gilt ornament of the Louis Quinze period. Flowers formed the principal decoration of the room, and of these Christine has ample provision when she is playing. She has only the trouble of conveying them from the theatre.

Her vocal inspiration—tell it not in Gath—is porter. Let us hope that in England she adopts the loftier substitute, stout. Let us also, hope that the Parisian porter is worthier than the acclimatized name often implies. Judging from its effects it should be above suspicion.

In all respects the private character of Christine Nilsson is a happy complement of the greatness of her public worth. Estimable by virtue of her accomplishments and of the high position her genius has secured, she is no less to be admired for the modesty and gentleness with which she bears her honors. She "bears her faculties so meek," that to have the advantage of knowing her in private is to merge admiration of the gifted artist into esteem for the unassuming woman. (?)—Lond. Orchestra.

Carl Löwe.

When, some months ago, the mournful news reached us that Carl Löwe, the celebrated German ballad writer, had bowed his wearied head in everlasting sleep, far from his home or, at least, far from the place which must be named his home in more respects than one, there was no lack of demonstrations of all kinds, expressing most unmistakably deep regard and grateful remembrance. It might, indeed, be said—and the assertion would be corroborated by the circumstances of the case—that the great majority of the public paid almost unconsciously their tribute of sorrow at the loss of the man and of the composer, when Löwe, even then nearly a wreck in mind and body, left Stettin, when his artistic career might have been justly regarded as completed, since it left the world of art no room for nay; not even a chance of continued hope, but made up for this by the rich stores it bequeathed us. While the heavy and severe loss which the world of music suffered by Franz Schubert's premature death was well expressed in the monumental inscription: "Music buried here a rich possession, but even still fairer hopes;" we can, on the other hand, say with a certain amount of satisfaction with reference to Löwe, who could look back upon a long life of activity, that he had realized to a great extent the fair hopes; that music had not sorrowfully buried there, as in the case of Schubert, but may feel satisfied with the possession, the rich and imperishable possession, which the grave cannot cover, either in the one case or the other, but which still exists and will continue to exist among us, scattering its refreshing influence as though from an inexhaustible source.

Johann Carl Gottfried Löwe was born on the 30th November, 1796, at Löbejun, not far from Halle. He received from his father, the Cantor of the place, his first lessons in science and music. At a very early age indeed the nascent talent of the boy was developed, so that, according to his own assurance, he played the organ and the piano, and sang at sight without the acquisition of the first elements having cost him the slightest exertion. His greatest delight was to wander about the country; there, in field, in forest, and on the wild heath, his imaginative powers gained strength, a love for the beauties of nature characterizing him up to a very advanced age. The fact, too, of being thus frequently out in the open air, under the free expanse of heaven, was well calculated to increase, more and more, the feeling dormant in his breast for what is imaginatively romantic, for he often came across hunters, fishermen, and shepherds, from whom he was fond of hearing all kinds of fairy tales about water-spirits, goblins, and forest spectres, which, with his predominating tendency towards the Romantic, a tendency that explains his great partiality for the composition of ballads, soon obtained complete mastery over his fancy. When he was ten years of age, he went to the school at Köthen, where he soon made many friends by his talent, and his clear, fresh boyish voice. Subsequently he became a pupil at the Gymnasium of the Orphan Home, Halle, where, to develop his musical talent, he was recommended to the then celebrated teacher, Türk, who, after the boy had correctly executed some very difficult tasks, took him in hand, and gave him lessons in theory and singing. Löwe derived especial benefit from this course of instruction, as Türk, at the same time that he taught him theoretically, employed him also, practically, allowing him to take part in what he did himself. For instance, he gave him something to do at his own performances of classical masterpieces, in which the boy sang soprano. Meanwhile the report of Löwe's talent had spread abroad, and therefore we must not be astonished that his then sovereign, Jérôme Napoléon, King of Westphalia, granted him a yearly allowance, so that he might devote himself exclusively to music, under Türk's direction. Löwe left, in consequence, the Gymnasium, and began a strict course of theoretical study, but only to discontinue it very soon, as in 1813, the King lost his throne, and Löwe's master, Türk, was snatched from him by death. Löwe returned to the Gymnasium, and applied himself so perseveringly that, by 1817 he was able to go up to the University of Halle, to study theology. During the three years of his university course, during which he successfully prosecuted his theological studies, he endeavored to perfect himself in pianoforte playing; gave music lessons; attended as tenor the Singacademie, then conducted by Maas and Naue, and belonged also to a private circle where, as was then customary, the most popular operas were performed with pianoforte accompaniment. In his private soldier's coat—Löwe was then serving his year as a volunteer—it was in this circle that he sang, with great applause, his first ballads, among which were "Erlkönig," "Wollhaide," and "Treuerüschon." It was here, too, that he made the acquaintance of his future wife, the talented, and at that period highly popular, Julie von Jacob. In the year 1819-20, he went to Dresden, his visit being attended with rather important consequences, because it laid the foundation for the lasting friendship which sprang up between him and Carl M. von Weber, then at the pinnacle of his fame. Of no less importance for him was a journey he made at the end of the year 1820, to Weimar and Jena, for he then became acquainted with Goethe and the celebrated pianoforte player Hummel. Löwe was more especially well received by the poet-prince Goethe, to whom he had dedicated a collection of songs.

Soon after this there happened in the composer's life the decisive circumstance which caused him to close his theological career, and dedicate himself exclusively to music to the end of his days. We behold Löwe accepting the post offered him as Cantor and Organist of St. Jacob's, and teacher at the Gymnasium, Stettin, the place destined to become his home, and the ground on which his musical and creative talent was developed. Now began his musical exertions, properly so speaking, and that period of his artistic productivity so important in the history of art. The very first year after his arrival, he was appointed Musical Director at St. Jacob's, at the Gymnasium, and the Seminary for Schoolmasters, with a considerable augmentation of salary. In promoting the musical and intellectual life of the town, and the practical cultivation of singing more particularly, Löwe, in his extended sphere of activity, was able to render the most valuable services, particularly after the establishment of a local Singacademie. In addition to the establishment of this society, to Löwe belongs the merit of having been the first to get up at Stettin grand orchestral concerts, of which two generally took place in the course of winter, and the programmes of which consisted partly of orchestral works, above all the symphonies of Beethoven, Mozart, etc., which were then performed before the public for the first time; partly of instrumental solos, that is to say, pianoforte concertos played by himself; and partly of important vocal pieces. He was supported at these concerts by Herr Liebert, violinist, and then Musical Director, as well as by his wife, who was very popular as a bravura singer. Fragments, also, of his more important compositions, such as the opera, Malak and Adhel, were introduced at these concerts, while, at especial church concerts, he produced his oratorios, especially Die Heilands letzte Stunde, Huss, Die sieben Schläfer, and Die eiserne Schlange. After the death of Liebert, who prepared so well the way for Löwe, by rehearsing beforehand the more important symphonies with his admirably trained orchestra, and in consequence of the unfavorable circumstances, partly of a political nature, which distinguished the year 1848, these concerts soon declined, and were first revived by Herr C. Kossmaly, under whose intelligent management they now form an essential component part of musical life at Stettin. If, after these short allusions to what Löwe did in his time, we cast a glance on him as a man, and on the nature of his disposition, we find he was particularly celebrated for personal amiability, with which he gained the hearts of all those who had any kind of dealings with him and enjoyed an opportunity of meeting him in the narrower circle of social life. Devoted frankness, noble self-denial, no less than a childlike mind, untainted by aught that was common, may be mentioned as the predominant features of his character. Equally open and natural, he displayed in his conversation a profound knowledge of his art, a lively fancy, and a poetical mind, which found vent in striking comparisons, pictures, and forms of representation, exciting admiration by their richness and purport. His conversation, which gave evidence of peculiar professional acquirements, was distinguished by a certain humor that flashed from him almost unconsciously. Complacent, arrogant mediocrity, and triviality in art, found in him a severe and unsparing judge; those who were animated by serious and proper motives, he encouraged by appreciative acknowledgment; while he welcomed distinguished artists in the most amiable manner, and with frank, warm recognition.

The publication of several of his works rendered his name very well known in a short time, and it almost seemed as if no shadow was destined to dim the young composer's fresh and indefatigable activity. But even Löwe's life, though rich in sunny brilliancy, was not without much deep shade, at times arresting the vigorous flight of his fancy, though among the enviable qualities belonging to him was an almost unsailable and immovable calm of mind, which, as some one has admirably remarked, enabled him to pass smilingly by so many miseries in life. Though his domestic happiness received a fearful shock by the death of his first wife in 1823, it was destined quickly to recover by the side of his second, Auguste Lange, so celebrated as a painter and a singer, of Königsberg. In nearly one course of uninterrupted uniformity, and without any interruptions worthy of being mentioned, did his life flow on. As we have already said, he displayed in it untiring activity of every kind; now and then only, did he make a short trip somewhere; in the majority of cases for the purpose of producing one of his more important works. In consequence of an apoplectic fit which he had at Stettin some years ago, and which gave unmistakable evidence of threatening his bodily and intellectual existence, he was more and more strengthened in his resolution of giving up his professional labors, and so it happened, two years ago, that he left his home, Stettin, to spend the rest of his life—which was rapidly flitting away, and indeed, almost destroyed even then by the apoplectic fit—in Kiel, where there were two married daughters of his. On Tuesday, the 20th of last April, before the conclusion of his seventy-third year, the composer laid his head down in eternal repose.

If, after these few hasty lines, which are intended for nothing more than a short biographical sketch, we cast a glance over the composer's whole life, we may well say that, in what he created, he has left us the best part of his nature. We may truly assert that a long life flowing calmly onward afforded him the very best opportunity of fulfilling most comprehensively his artistic-historic mission, as we would especially designate his composition of ballads. What the simple German song, or Lied, owes to the creative spirit of Franz Schubert, in whose productions it is represented to us as a work of art which has attained a perfect degree of harmony, in which form and purport are most intimately combined, and in which the whole variety both of form and purport seems to be exhausted—so much, or nearly as much, does the ballad owe to the imaginative and self-creative efforts of Carl Löwe. Löwe has, for this reason, been called the Schubert of North Germany. In this case also, form and purport appear to have reached the most perfect harmony; words and music, ready to follow the sentiment into the nicest details of individual nature, are enhanced by an artistic representation and characterization of the purport, displaying and unveiling all the riches of mysterious human nature. With no less justice is Löwe called, also, a born ballad composer, on account of the extraordinary number of his works belonging to this class, as well as the uncommon skill and ease with which he could overcome the difficulties presented by the words, bring out prominently the really leading idea of the poetry, and envelop it in a garment resplendent with colors and rich ornaments. For characteristic sharpness, certainty of design, and definiteness of drawing; for variety and truth of expression; and for poetic richness of feeling, Löwe, as a ballad composer, stands hitherto unrivalled. For his genuine poetic feeling, which ventured into all countries, at every period of their history, it was an easy task to represent in new and original forms the text, often, as already remarked, difficult to treat, neglecting moreover no opportunity of employing, in piquant touches, a certain style of tone-painting, which he carried out with the minutest details of light and shade. Of this numerous examples might be quoted from every ballad, if it were the object of these lines to illustrate critically, one by one, the catalogue of his works. But since, as a consequence of his efforts to achieve the greatest possible breadth and depth of expression, his treatment of the piano frequently appears overcharged and artificial, and as, too, we have to accept numerous difficulties in the succession of the harmony and numerous archaic forms, as they are called, which at the moment served the composer's purpose, the demands Löwe frequently makes upon the compass and flexibility of the voice, as well as on its powers of endurance, appear by no means inconsiderable, and are probably one of the reasons why—with the exception of some few ballads—scarcely half the treasures he bequeathed us are known to and enjoyed by a very large portion of the public. In two qualities more especially do Löwe's special labors in the domain of ballad-composition strike us as being most effective and significant, and likewise crowned with the happiest success: one is that of the romantic coloring of the North, as it is called, where hobgoblins, elves, and witches form the indispensable background, as in the ballads, "Der Erlkönig," "Held Harald," "Der Todtentanz," "Elvershöh," "Odins Meeresritt," &c.; and the other the fact of his giving utterance to the folk's tone, in all its intensity, and his pouring forth from his lips those fervent melodies which are capable of at once awakening the most lively echo in the hearts of those who hear them. This is true more especially of the ballads: "Der Wirthin Töchterlein," "Graf Eberhard's Weisdom," "Fredericus Rex," "Archibald Douglas," "Heinrich der Vogler," &c. Notwithstanding this however, the composer possesses a rich scale of tones when his tongue overflows with bitter complaint, profound but passionless sorrow, and patient abnegation. For what is highly dramatic, for the incarnation of passion, as it is called, his power of expression, on the other hand, does not appear equally prompt.

In other departments, also, of his art this composer distinguished himself by great productivity. Though his individuality was not here so free, fresh, and unrestrained as in his ballads, we still find, in the domains of pianoforte music, oratorios, and vocal-part compositions, much that is important, original, and as regards form, masterly, from his pen. His least important labors are those in the department of opera. This is to be explained, perhaps, by the fact that Löwe really always held himself aloof from the stage and never sought, by study or otherwise, to become better acquainted with the style of production best adapted for it. However, in consequence of his almost rank luxuriance of fancy, and ease of production, there is scarcely an artistic form, from the symphony down to the simplest waltz, for which he did not, at least, fling a greeting as he passed by. About 140 works of his have been published. Many of them contain, moreover, several numbers. Among them we find sacred and secular part compositions, duets, motets, psalms for male voices, and for mixed chorus; trios, pianoforte compositions, as for instance, the "Zigeuner Sonate," "Frühlingssonate," "Al'enfantaisie," "Biblische Bilder," "Sonaten zu 2 und 4 Händen;" the oratorios: Die Zerstörung Jerusalems, Die sieben Schläfer, Gutenberg, Johann Huss, Festzeiten, Die eiserne Schlange, Apostel von Philipp, and Pohn von Adela; and the opera, Die Drei Wünsche. The number too, is large, of his compositions still unpublished: for instance, the operas, Die Alpenhütte, Rudolph der Deutsche Herr, Malak Adhel; choruses and interludes to Raupach's dramatic fantasia, Das Mädchen in Traum, and to his tragedy of Themistio; "Fest Cantaten"; two symphonies, in D and E minor, respectively; and lastly, an admirable Cantata which he composed for the centenary festival of the Lodge of the Three Circles. In consequence of the limited space at our disposal in these columns, we must abandon the idea of pronouncing a critical opinion on the artistic value of all those works; sufficiently large and important is the rich treasure which the composer has bequeathed us in his ballads—and we reckon them among the imperishable portions of artistic wealth—they are the monuments of brass and stone which Löwe raised in the history of art no less than in the hearts of men, and truly reflecting, as they do, the thoroughly original nature of their creator, they will, most certainly, in times far remote, still continue to excite joy, devout sentiments, and emotion in those who hear them. Just as Franz Schubert has become, in a degree attained by no other person, the genuine and insurpassable Lieder singer for the German people, we would call Loewe the unsurpassed ballad-singer of the same people. Resembling in many traits his predecessor, Zumsteeg, in the domain of ballad composition, though incomparably more eloquent, more poetical, and more intellectual, Loewe, like Zumsteeg, has something classical about him, and, above all things, shares with Schubert and other classical masters, that inartificial and undimmed creative ingenuousness, that clear, transparent structure of his creations, that something so well designated as "lightness and freedom from all earthly pressure." Just as with Franz Schubert, it is more especially the romantic element which suits Loewe's nature, and is best adapted to that of his Muse from that element; as from a sanctuary, as from his own especial nature, did his most beautiful and most sublime strains soar upward, through, as a rule, immeasurably more developed towards mysticism than was the case with Schubert. With Loewe as with Schubert too, it is rather the world of inward and profound than great and passionate sentiment, in which their works find the soil wherein to strike root. While, however, with Loewe and the modern Lieder composers, the effort to bring out strongly form and purport is manifested particularly in pointed, and frequently self-conscious characterization, in harmonic, rhythmical, and declamatory variety of expression, it is in Schubert's case exhibited principally in an inexhaustible store of melody, nay, more: in an unlimited melodious plastic power, which, like a blessing of tune, that seemed as though it would never end, presented us its blossoms and fruit in almost prodigal magnificence. Notwithstanding this, however, Loewe, also, belongs to those singers to whom the secrets of their art were unclosed without trouble or effort, and displayed in unconstrained melodies. We may say of Loewe, too, that, unconcerned about material advantages, about fame, and about earthly splendor, he sang simply because he felt compelled to sing; because the power of song had been granted him, and because there was a restless desire at work impelling him to manifest to others in tone the rich treasures of his inward sentiments. We must not, however, conceal the fact that his productive faculty could not divest itself of a certain one-sidedness, which, resulting primarily from his being entirely wrapped up in his own subjectively musical existence, unfortunately diverted only too soon his glance from the present, causing him to forget altogether the latter and its musical creations, and rendering him incapable of aught in common with the artists and the art-productions of his own age. It is easy to understand how this loosened the bonds connecting him and his works with the present. While the music of our times falls unfortunately but too often into a certain speculative tendency, while reflection and abstraction threaten to remove us more and more from natural music, properly so-called, we find, in Loewe, a poetic soul, that expresses itself unfettered in music and through music, and the artistic efforts of which were the results of an inward impulse, of an ingenuous, believing enthusiasm, which, conscious of its high aim, seldom incurred the danger of missing that aim.

We began by speaking of a civilizing historical mission which Loewe was destined to fulfil as a ballad composer, and, therefore, we must not conclude without here acknowledging in his works a certain ethical and moral significance. Contrasting with the rapid workings of the current of thought at the present age, a current tainted with the poisonous breath of materialism, and which most of our music serves to reflect, Loewe's music contains a goodly amount of the still fresh vitality of genuine art; his art enables us to obtain an extensive view of the depths and heights of the mind; exercises a purifying and elevating influence upon those who hear it, and frees them, as it were, from the burden weighing down everything belonging to the earth. But, if we are able to ascribe valuable qualities, which in their highest excellence characterize the indescribable worth of classical music, to Loewe's modest muse, we may speak, also, of treasures which the deceased has bequeathed to after-generations, and we fulfil only an imperious duty of pious veneration and of gratitude, in not neglecting to prepare in our hearts, for Loewe's name and works, a place of permanent remembrance, of thankful recognition, and of profound respect.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 25, 1869.

THE NATIONAL MUSICAL CONVENTION, so called, summoned by Mr. TOURJEE, the energetic head of the N. E. Conservatory, and organizer of the Jubilee Chorus, was in session in the Music Hall, all day Wednesday and Thursday of this week. Some permanent organization was adopted; after which papers were read, followed sometimes by discussions, with agreeable interludes of organ-playing and vocal music. We can speak now only of the first day, and of a portion of the exercises. There seemed to be a general vagueness in the plan, few having very precise ideas of why they were assembled or what to do, but rather waiting to see what would be done with them: and much of the talking was vague, and sometimes "hifalutin." But there were good papers also, containing sound and valuable ideas, simply and directly put forth. Among these was the plea for music in the Public Schools, by Mr. D. B. Hagar. The examination and the exercises which followed introduced by Dr. Upham, of children from our schools, from the Primary four and five-year-olders, to the young ladies of the High and Normal Schools, were of real interest, at least to those unfamiliar with our system. Mr. Monroe's paper, also, on "The Physiology of the Voice," with illustrations, must have supplemented them admirably.

But there was one paper which contained so much sound sense and jumped so exactly with our own notions about Organ Playing, going straight to the mark, without superfluous rhetoric or sentimentality, that we have begged the privilege of printing it, and have put other matters aside to make room for the larger half of it, reserving the remainder for our next number.

Organ Playing: Its Uses and Abuses.

A Paper read by J. P. MORGAN, of New York, before the National Musical Convention, Sept. 22, 1869.

I. THE ORGAN IN THE CONCERT ROOM.

These thoughts on organ playing are presented to the Convention in the hope that they may serve to begin a discussion, leading to an effort, which shall be extended throughout the land, to correct the many evils which, you will all agree, prevail in our concert room and churches,—in the former, if only for the sake of Art,—in the latter, for the sake of Art and Religion,—that we may in the practice of our art glorify God, and not insult Him by an abuse of one of His most beautiful gifts.—

First we will consider the use of the organ as a Concert instrument.

As a result of an increasing interest in music throughout the country, and of the enterprise of organ builders, we have already a few organs of sufficient capacity to be used as concert instruments, exclusively, (chief among them, of course, the magnificent instrument which the country owes to the true musical feeling and enterprise of Boston), and we cannot doubt that before many years we shall see in many of our cities concert halls provided with excellent Organs, containing all the mechanical appliances which inventive talent and industry can devise.

It becomes us, therefore, to inquire: How are we using the means now at our command? Are our efforts as concert players such as will tend to our own improvement as artists? Do those who have mastered the technical difficulties accompanying Organ playing in so far as to be able to select programmes without restriction,—in other words, those who are competent to appear at all as concert players, select programmes so as to attain the most desirable results?

The question now arises of course, what are the highest aims and most desirable results of concert playing?

Let us inquire, first:—Is the mere display of technical skill for the sake of exciting the wonder and admiration of the audience a high aim? Every right-minded artist will answer No!

To most men possessed of great technical skill, the temptation to excite admiration and perhaps wonder by its display is a strong one, especially when there is a prospect of adding to their income by increasing the market value of their services as organists.

That it is always wrong to yield to the temptation in a degree, we do not believe. It is right that skill acquired by patient study and long years of practice, should be admired; but this exhibition of skill should always be a secondary consideration in a performance claiming to have for its object the production of works of art; and we do not hesitate to affirm that, if the artist cannot, during the performance of a composition worthy of an artist's attention, lose sight of this aim, and rise above this desire to make himself the object of admiration and wonder, his performance must become a failure as far as artistic rendering is concerned.

A second inquiry is:—Is affording a pleasant pastime to an audience a high aim in Concert playing?

That it is a good-natured, amiable aim, we will readily admit; that a great artist may find pleasure in helping to afford pleasant recreation now and then even to a Concert audience, is quite conceivable; but that in so doing he is practicing his art in any high sense, or that he can be induced by any consideration less than fear of actual want, to devote his best efforts, or any considerable portion of his efforts to such an end, we firmly believe to be impossible. No artist who has a correct conception of the exalted mission intrusted to him with the talents God has given him, can thus squander His gifts. We speak of artists in general, but we believe this to be particularly applicable to organists, whose calling it is to interpret works of art by means of an instrument capable of expressing the noblest thoughts, with a voice, the majesty of which surpasses that of all instruments invented by man, and which always seems disgraced by being made to utter what is meaningless, frivolous or commonplace. And yet, what do we hear at our popular Organ Concerts? Too often compositions so utterly devoid of connected, sequential thought, so frivolous, so dismally thin, that the soul of an organist who appreciates the powers and understands the voice of his instrument, must sicken if compelled to listen.

We may now properly ask: To what end should an artist's efforts be directed in a Concert performance?

Surely to the production of great compositions in such a manner as to realize their legitimate effect, in other words, reproduce the same emotions and trains of thought in the hearer, which called the work into being, in the mind of the composer, or were chiefly active in his mind when occupied with it. Here we meet with the objection so often urged against the performance of so-called classical music, before audiences composed largely of persons not musically educated; viz.: that they do not understand it, and are therefore not interested and entertained by it. Those who object to its performance on this ground say: "Your Fugues and Sonatas may be very interesting to you and to a few musical people, but the great mass of the audience had much rather hear something else." Granted,—but the great mass of the audience are scarcely susceptible of musical impression at all, or do not attend a concert for the sake of any intellectual enjoyment or benefit they hope to derive from it, but to be amused, without any effort at thought on their own part.

Is the artist to gratify those people at the expense of his own artistic life and the instruction and legitimate pleasure of the highest and noblest sort which it is in his power to afford the few whose ears and minds are able to receive it?

The habit so universal in this country of regarding a concert room as a place to be amused, to pass away time, a place to visit because it is fashionable to go to concerts, is to be sure the result in great measure of a lack of cultivation among the people of a comparatively young nation, but has been fostered and encouraged by the persistent course of a great number of merely mercenary performers (we will not call them artists) who have regarded nothing as worthy of pursuit but "Cash."

All the strength to be obtained by united effort and mutual support, which we may hope will result from the present or any future Convention of Musicians, may well be devoted to overcoming this pernicious habit of the American people.

If we are to be respected as artists, we must act as if we respected ourselves and our art.

Again, the prejudice, so common, against highly intellectual music is, in a measure, due to the manner in which such music has been produced; and organists have sinned grievously in this regard, by yielding to the temptation to make effect pieces of everything. Assuming that the audience cannot understand or enjoy the music as music, the attempt is made to astonish them by a display of technical skill in performing it.

How common it is for a fugue of Bach to be placed upon the programme of an Organ concert, because it is supposed to be difficult to play Bach, and it is due to the reputation of the performer that the people should understand that all this sort of thing is nothing to him,—why, he can play anything! But when he begins the Fugue, remarks like the following begin to circulate among the audience: "Well, that may be very difficult, but I don't understand it, and I wish he'd get through," etc., etc. And no wonder; the organist himself does not understand it, or he sins willfully against the composer and against art by perverting a noble work of a great master into an effect piece with which to display his execution to the audience.

This racing through Bach's fugues has done more towards creating a prejudice against them than anything to be found in the fugues themselves.

There is much still remaining to be said upon this branch of the subject, but the limits of this paper will not admit of it.

A favorite idea among organists and people generally, but we believe a very false and injurious one, is that the great office of the Organ, and particularly of a Concert organ is to imitate the orchestra. The consequence of this opinion is that most of our organists devote a great deal of study to what they call orchestral effects; and orchestral Overtures and movements from Symphonies, arranged for the Organ, form, we may say, the chief part of most of our programmes of Organ concerts claiming to consist of compositions of the Masters.

This practice has prevailed to such an extent, that we can see already its injurious effects upon the art of organ building in America. Builders are aiming to produce, not noble toned organs, furnished in every department with the means to meet all the demands of great organ compositions, having a largeness of tone in the diapasons, a brilliancy in the octaves and mixtures, and a gravity resulting from the sixteen-foot manual registers, together with such fullness in numbers, and in power of the pedal registers that the pedal couplers are not required to make amends for a deficiency; organs with a great variety of eight-foot stops carefully voiced so as to afford the contrasting colors of tone necessary for Trio playing, in which each of the simultaneously progressing voices may be heard distinctly in all its progressions,—no, they are striving to produce "orchestral organs," as they call them.

We have no space to discuss the question whether the art which has for its highest aim to imitate a work of art is worthy of pursuit—we think not,—but when, as in this case, the real character of the artistic means to be employed is ignored in the attempt to imitate a means of artistic representation already in common use and brought to great perfection. We maintain that the whole thing is a misdirected effort.

If it were true that the organ is like the orchestra, or capable of producing the effect of an orchestra; if all attempts of organ builders and organ players in this direction were not substantially unsuccessful, we should not so wonder that they are persisted in. The fact is, the nature of the instrument renders success impossible.

Undoubtedly the idea that the organ is an orchestra arises from the fact that there are certain points of correspondence, e. g. certain tone colors of the orchestra are also found in the organ. Again, we can bring into combination and contrast the different tone colors; lastly, the tones of both can be sustained, and a crescendo produced; here the resemblance ceases.

Every orchestral writer knows that the foundation of the orchestra, its very life, is the string quartet; that the power of accent and attack, that power of expression which the bow affords, often consisting in a change in the character of tone after the attack, is an essential feature. This the organ never can reproduce. We hear the tones, but the delivery and inflection, if we may so call it, are wanting. If the same passages were played by the orchestra so as to sound as they do upon the organ, any conductor would pronounce the performance a failure.

Again, the reeds of the organ have neither the effect of the reeds nor of the brass of the orchestra. Here, too, the attack and flexibility after the attack are wanting. The flute and clarinet of the organ are similar to those of the orchestra only in tone-color.

This fundamental difference in the nature of the means points to a difference in the ends to be attained; and if those organists who expend such an amount of time and patient study upon orchestral effects, would devote a part to organ effects and organ music, and the remainder to the study of orchestral composition and orchestra scores, the result would be a better knowledge of the organ, the orchestra, and the best musical literature.

We are glad to acknowledge the skill displayed by talented organists, in these attempts at orchestral imitation, but regret deeply this waste of time and strength uniformly resulting in a musical failure, and an act of injustice towards the composer of the orchestral composition; and, the fact is that, while working in this field, these organists neglect almost entirely the rich store of real organ music, both ancient and modern, now accessible to all:—music which can find adequate expression only by a proper use of the resources peculiar to the organ.

ERNST PERABO, after a year's rest from concert playing, proposes to enter the field again this winter, and will be welcomed with much joy. He intends to give two series of chamber concerts. One, a series of four, beginning October 29, in which he will play a number of the rarely heard Sonatas of Beethoven's latest period; besides some fine arrangements, by Henselt and Pauer, of several Beethoven Overtures; and the "Kreutzer" Sonata with Mr. Listemann. Nor will Bach and Handel be forgotten.

The other series, beginning Jan. 7, will be Historical, the brothers Listemann bearing part in them. The concerts will be eight in number,—once a fortnight.

Our notice of the HUMBOLDT FESTIVAL is unavoidably left over.

Bach's Passion Music.—A Word to the Chorus.

MR. EDITOR:—It marks a step in the musical progress of our city, when its oldest Choral Society, dependent as it is upon the favor with which its performances are received by the public for its financial prosperity, dares to undertake the production of a work like the Passion Music of Bach. Especially is it gratifying, at a time when Boston has gained for itself such questionable fame in the eyes of the musical world, that it should have an opportunity of showing that the word great, in its vocabulary, is not a mere synonyme for big. But the thought immediately occurs, will such a difficult work prove a success from a musical point of view? And this brings me to my point.

It is well known that a small minority of a chorus, by negligence and absence at rehearsals, may render nugatory all the practice and care of the majority; and it is no secret that this minority is largely responsible for the more obvious inaccuracies in the choral singing of the Handel and Haydn Society. The officers of the Society, about two years ago, adopted a custom of checking the attendance of members at rehearsals. Its results have been good, noticeably in the Triennial Festival in the spring of 1868; but as no penalty was affixed to a continued absence, the difficulty before spoken of, of unpractised singers coming in at the last moment, was not entirely met. I would suggest, therefore, that if a rule should be made that only those who were present at some fixed proportion (say one-half) of the rehearsals for any given performance, should be admitted to the chorus on that occasion, the result would be seen in a great improvement in the accuracy, power and unity of the singing, and, in the particular case of the Passion Music, might make the difference between success and failure.

I would make this suggestion through the columns of your paper because, although it must ultimately be addressed to the officers of the Society, it is a matter which concerns the whole musical public, and more immediately the chorus itself, which, I doubt not, would uphold its popular Directors in any action they might take to insure a more successful consummation of its labors.

Music Abroad.

NORWICH FESTIVAL.—The fifteenth of the triennial festivals began on Monday, Aug. 30.

As for the artistic staff, this numbered among the principals Milles, Tietjens and Ilma de Murska; Meses. Talbot Cherer, Patey, and Trebelli-Bertini; Messrs. Vernon Rigby, A. Byron, W. H. Cummings, Santley, Signori Bettini and Foli. The orchestral and choral force was sufficiently strong for the realization of the effects of combination in the several important works included in the programme. The band consisted of nearly eighty performers, most of them being members of the opera establishments; and Messrs. Henry and Richard Blagrove, Lazarus, Harper, Watson, Hutchins and Anderson having the leading parts assigned to them.

The chorus was in good proportion to the instrumental force; consisting of 279 voices, divided into 72 sopranos, 35 contraltos, 28 altos, 67 tenors, and 77 basses. The nucleus of this body of vocalists was contributed by the excellent Norwich Choral Society, with some few additions from the Cathedral choir, and from other provincial sources, but few choristers being required from London. Over these constituents, Mr. Benedict, as conductor, presided.

The Musical World's reporter, writing at the end of the first day, says:

At 10 o'clock this morning, band, chorus and principals assembled for rehearsal, which, with the exception of a short interval for luncheon, lasted till nearly 5 o'clock. Mendelssohn's Lobpreisung, Handel's Acis and Galatea (both to be performed this evening), the selection from Mr. Pierson's Hezekiah (parts of which Mr. Benedict caused to be repeated three or four times), the whole of Rossini's Mass and the new "Song of Praise," conducted by the composer, Mr. Horace Hill, Mus. Bac., (Cantab., son of the late and brother of the present chorus-master), were all gone through during this long and trying day, which is to close with a concert of certainly more than three hours' duration. Thus for nearly ten hours will the walls of St. Andrew's Hall have resounded to the "concourse of sweet sounds."

The report is continued thus on Tuesday.

The greater part of to-day has been again given to rehearsals. Handel's Dittchen Te Deum, portions of Hezekiah (once more), and a variety of pieces for the evening performance have really taxed the energies of those members of the band whose familiarity with many of the works would have rendered repetition altogether unnecessary, but who are compelled to go through the infliction for the benefit of the amateur or incompetent element of which I have already spoken.

The performance of last evening was successful, in both an artistic and financial point of view. True there might have been an improvement on the lady to whom was confided the soprano music, in Acis and Galatea, and whose engagement for so important a post as that of seconda donna can hardly be explained except by reference to that source of so many mistakes—local influence; but if the representative of the love-stricken nymph fell short of perfection, the amorous swain, the gentle shepherd, and the revengeful giant of the most charming pastoral ever written, found in Messrs. Vernon Rigby, Cummings, and Santley representatives of the highest capability, while the chorus (which is particularly noticeable for the beauty of the soprano and bass voices) did full justice to the ever fresh and tuneful music of Handel. Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise (which, in proper order, should have been mentioned first, inasmuch as after the National Anthem it opened the concert), was admirably sung and played throughout, Mlle. Tietjens sustaining the soprano, and Mr. Cummings, the tenor part; "Praise thou the Lord," by the former, and the famous "Watchman" solo by the latter, producing a marked effect.

Then came one of those miscellaneous evening concerts in which the John Bull appetite has not a rival. Twenty-three pieces on the programme,—to which add four encores! We cite the curiosity in full:

- Reformation Symphony.....Mendelssohn.
Prayer, "Ruler of this awful hour," (Oberon), Mr. W. H. Cummings.....C. M. v. Weber.
Cavatina, "Lacris ch'lo planga" (Rinaldo), M. Patey.
Handel.
Aria, "Salve dimora" (Faust) Mr. Vernon Rigby. Violin obbligato, Mr. H. Bligrove.....Gounod.
Quartet, "Il cor e la mia fe" (Fidelio), Mlle. Tietjens, Mlle. Talbot-Cherier, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Signor Foll.....Beethoven.
Aria, "Nacqui all'affanno," "Non più mesta" (Cenerentola), Mlle. Trebelli Bettini.....Rossini.
Romanza, "Deserto in terra" (Don Sebastian), Signor Bettini.....Donizetti.
Gran Scena ed Aria (Medea), Mlle. Tietjens (first time of performance in England). Conducted by the Composer.....Rendegger.
Song, "The Wreck of the Hesperus," Mr. Santley.
J. L. Hatton.
Melodie for four Violoncellos and Contrabasso ("Souvenir de Curia"), Messrs. Pague, Clapp, Guest, Pettit, and Howell.....Pague.
Aria, "The Shadow Song" (Dinorah), Mlle. Tina di Murata.....Meyerbeer.
Quartet, "Over the dark blue waters" (Oberon), Mlle. Tietjens, Mlle. Trebelli Bettini, Signor Bettini, and Mr. Santley.....C. M. v. Weber.
Overture, (Fernand Cortes).....Spontini.
Air, "Huge, thou angry Storm" (The Gipsy's Warning), Signor Foll.....Benedict.
Duet, "Now let every sorrow vanish" (Der Berggeist), Mlle. Tietjens and Mr. Santley.....Spohr.
Duo, "Dis-moi ce mot" ("One Word"), Mlle. Trebelli Bettini and Signor Bettini.....Nicola.
Air, "Yes, let me like a Soldier fall," (Maritana), Mr. Vernon Rigby.....Wallace.
Song, "Water parted from the Sea" (Artaxerxes), Mlle. Talbot-Cherier.....Arne.
National Chorus, "Ye Mariners of England," By the Choir.....H. Hugo Pierson.
Song, "The Last Rose of Summer," Mlle. Tietjens.
Song, "Draw the Sword, Scotland," Mr. W. H. Cummings.....Booth.
Romanza, "Comme à vingt ans," Mlle. Trebelli Bettini.....Durand.
Grand March (Tannhäuser).....Richard Wagner.

The "Reformation Symphony" fell dead, it seems, in spite of a fine rendering. Of Sig. Rendegger's composition the reporter says:

The scena is divided into four movements—a recitative, andante, a second recitative, and an allegro. Written originally for Mme. Rudersdorff, and produced last winter at the Leipzig "Gewandhaus" with great success, it commanded the warm admiration of the German public in general, and the praise of a no less competent judge than Ferdinand Hiller in particular. Signor Rendegger might feel quite secure of his position in submitting his work to the test of an English audience, more especially as Mlle. Tietjens, whose embodiment of Medea (Cherabini's) is one of the grandest efforts ever witnessed in the lyric drama, was to be the exponent. All the wonderful fire and energy, the grand declamation, the thorough earnestness, and evident desire to do the fullest justice to the composer were exhibited by the great prima donna, and in saying that the composition and the singer were alike worthy of each other, a fitting tribute is paid to both.

Wednesday Morning was occupied with a selection from Mr. H. Hugo Pierson's new Oratorio, "Hezekiah, King of Judah."

The oratorio begins with Hezekiah's announcement of his purpose to purify the Temple and re-establish the exercise of true religion. He summons the priests and Levites to resume their ministrations. He celebrates a memorable Passover, which is kept with extraordinary demonstrations of joy.

Part II is chiefly occupied with Hezekiah's illness and recovery, which (as most commentators now agree) must have preceded the Assyrian invasion, although placed after it in the Scripture narrative. No movement from this part of the oratorio is included in the present selection.

Part III. contains the most highly dramatic, and spirit-stirring scenes in the work. Hezekiah addresses his officers and troops in a tone of calm and dauntless confidence in God's protection. He receives a haughty missive from Sennacherib, proceeds to the Temple, spreads the letter before the Lord, and pleads long and anxiously for deliverance.

A Divine message is sent in reply by Isaiah, assuring him, not merely of final victory, but that the heathen invader shall not even be permitted to attack the sacred city. The catastrophe follows, but here the author has found himself compelled to make use of secular resources, since the account of the destruction of Sennacherib's army, as given in Scripture, is scarcely capable of being rendered musically. With a triumphant chorus the oratorio concludes. Parts of the prophecies of Isaiah uttered during the progress of the invasion, as well as passages from Psalms 46, 75, and 76, which are known to have been written with direct reference to it (possibly by Hezekiah himself), are embodied in Part III.

The hall was about half filled, and the applause which found vent from time to time seemed to be led rather by the partisans of Mr. Pierson, than dictated by the spontaneous feeling of the general public. True, this is no criterion; for people who could sit unmoved through Mendelssohn's Lobgesang, can hardly be accepted as competent judges of such a work as that produced this morning. The most genuine expression of approval was drawn forth by the air with chorus, "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem," a compliment quite as much due to the exquisite singing of Mlle. Tietjens, as to the merit of the piece. The greatest possible pains to ensure a perfect performance was taken by Mr. Benedict (whose labors this week are most trying), while Mlle. Tietjens and Messrs. Cummings and Santley all exerted themselves to the utmost in the various solos allotted to them. From the "argument" it will be seen that the selection is very unconnected, and with mere disjointed fragments of a word, which, if heard at all, should be heard in its entirety, it may, perhaps, be thought hardly fair to pronounce a definite judgment. Still, I am bound to record the fact that the opinion of all those with whom I have had an opportunity of communicating, quite agrees with my own,—that the oratorio has achieved, at the best, but a local succès d'estime, and that beyond Norfolk and Norwich Mr. Pierson's fame is not likely to extend.

We add the Orchestra's opinion:

As far as the music could be judged Mr. Pierson's inspiration reaches respectable mediocrity; but a final judgment cannot fairly be recorded in respect of a work of which only a small portion was given. Certainly there is nothing in the Selection to warrant the high position claimed for this gentleman by his friends: indeed we should hardly think that "Hezekiah" can equal the previous "Jerusalem." Mr. Pierson doubtless possesses great technical knowledge, and the hearer is not offended by the crudities which have found place in some modern attempts at oratorio; but the master-mind is wanting which should produce an enduring work of this kind.

Spohr's "Fall of Babylon" completed the morning's programme. The evening concert again offered 23 pieces,—although it was shorter than that of Monday. Part I. was wholly devoted to excerpts from Mozart, two of which were instrumental and rather novel: viz. the Overture to Der Schauspieler Director, and a Serenade for two principal violins, viola and contrabasso, accompanied by violins, violas, 'cellos and tympani, composed at Salzburg in 1776; the unpublished autograph manuscript (No. 239 in Von Koechel's Catalogue) is owned by Sig. Rendegger. Part II. gave Songs, &c., by Virginia Gabriel, F. David, Rendegger, Meyerbeer, Beignani, Boyce ("Hearts of Oak," Santley), Handel, and Arthur Sullivan, preceded by the Overture to Frey-schütz, and followed by that to Zanetta.

The selections for Thursday were a Sacred Cantata by Mr. Horace Hill, and Rossini's Messe Solenne; and for the last day, the Messiah. Of these next time, when we shall also have reports of the Worcester Festival, which was to follow.

PRAGUE.—Herr Carl Loewe's oratorio of Johannes Huss is to be executed here at the festival in honor of the great Bohemian reformer and martyr. Singers from every local association in Bohemia will take part in the performance.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

My darling Sadie. 3. D to c. G. A. Varzie. 35

A sweet ballad in popular style, which has the peculiarity of a chorus longer than the solo part, ingeniously arranged, and which would by itself make a good quartet.

Wake us at Dawn, Mother! 3. D to c. Nish. 35

A very taking description of the sunny hours of childhood, when the whole earth seemed "a beautiful garden of flowers," and the day was not half long enough for the play-times, which left off too soon. Very good melody, and a nice chorus.

The Daisy Valley. Nish. 35

Ba, Be, Bi, Bo, Bu. " 30

Two pretty songs of different characters, the "Daisy" song being a pleasing ballad, and Ba, Be, Bi, Bo, Bu, a comic song of that innocent kind that takes so well among children. "No school should be without it," as the numerous mis-spellings amuse the juveniles hugely, while all will be ready to join in the "Ba, Be, Bi, Bo, Bu," at the end of each verse.

Listening on the hill. Smart. 30

Pleasing ballad by a good composer.

Mendelssohn's compositions are yet too recent to have gone through all the transformations which have brought out the many-sided beauties of airs of older composers. So we have, probably for the first time, an extended list of his songs, arranged for the piano alone. They are graceful and pleasing, well arranged, and proper companions for the well-known "Songs without Words."

Sunny Side Waltz. 3. Bb. Fernald. 35

Not only Sunny-sided, but sunny all around. A light and cheerful waltz.

Florence Schottisch. 3. C. Lemon. 35

Of striking beauty. Will be a decided favorite.

Pot-pouri. "Fra Diavolo." 4. Wels. 75

Fra Diavolo is a fine opera to be thus arranged. Try it.

Overture to Pique Dame. 4 hds. 4. F. von Suppe. 1.00

A bright and rattling thing, which is, in addition, quite novel.

Evening Calm. Melody. 4. Eb. E. M. Lott. 30

A very graceful and soothing piece, very satisfying while it lasts, and is not long enough to weary.

The Musical Drama and the Works of Richard Wagner.

From the French of EDOUARD SCHURR.

To this noisy and grotesque night succeeds a radiant day. The third act gives us the interior of Sachs' house. The shop has a holiday air. The table glitters. All is in order. The modest windows, garnished with pots of flowers, admit the morning sunshine. The master sits in a low voice, then louder. Sachs never stirs, and the youth, in anxiety lest his master is very angry, begins to beg in suppliant tones the pardon for last night's misdeeds. At last the book is closed with a loud noise, and the frightened apprentice drops upon his knees. But the master is as serene as one just come back from the other world. He kindly bids the lad recite the verses for the day, then sends him off to dress for the fête. Master Sachs is a true philosopher. When he reads in his "History of the World," when he meditates upon human destinies, he understands all things, and does not allow trifles to disturb his composure. Left alone once more, he goes on with his reflections, and thus we get a glimpse of this manful and gentle soul. Going over the events of the past night, he asks himself what imp of mischief could have stirred up the peaceful citizens of Nuremberg to such violence. "It is the old madness," he says; "it is the everlasting illusion, which is needful for success, and which must be mastered at all hazards. After the foolish night comes the day! Let us see if Hans Sachs cannot bring some grand thing out of this hour of madness."

At this moment Walter comes in. "Courage," says the old man to him. "Compose for me a master's song!" Walter smiles. He has given up all hope of a reconciliation with the school, and is not willing even to hear it mentioned. Sachs does not agree with him, and promises him the victory if he will bend his genius to certain rules. "How shall I do it?" "Relate to me your dream of this morning." This dream, like all its kind, is vague, but all the more delicious for that. He seems to have been wandering in a garden, radiant with dewy flowers, where a beautiful woman, an Eve in loveliness, calls him to the tree of life and bids him gather the fruit. Fascinated, he has fallen asleep under the glances of his enchantress. Night falls, and through the sombre foliage he sees a crown of stars which hovers above the head of this wondrous-eyed woman. As related by Walter, it takes the form of two melodious strophes of a sweet and noble rhythm. The master is delighted. In the joy of his heart he writes the words down upon a piece of paper. "And now," he says, "all we need is courage. Let us prepare for the fête."

Hardly have they left the room, when in comes the Recorder, who has been roaming about in the streets. He makes his appearance walking lame, for he has not forgotten his serenade of the preceding evening, and its variations. He chances to see the piece of paper which lies upon a table, where it has been accidentally left. He recognizes the handwriting of Sachs. A love song by him! Has the old shoemaker the audacity to aspire to Eva's hand? The thought strikes him like a flash. At this moment the master comes in, in gala-dress. Beckmesser overwhelms him with sarcasms and reproaches. "I have never intended to compete for the prize," says Sachs, with a smile, "and in proof of it I am willing to give you the verses. You may do what you please with them." Beckmesser falls head foremost into the snare, and goes off with the poem, believing that now he has victory safe in his pocket.

Next arrives Eva, robed in white, richly arrayed for the festival. Sachs compliments her on her appearance, but with a sad and petulant air she reproaches him with not knowing where the shoe pinches. The shoemaker takes her at her word, has her put her foot up on a bench, while he examines the ill-disposed shoe. Too large here, too small there,—Eva finds all manner of faults with it. Suddenly Walter appears in the door-way, and stands nailed to the spot before the dazzling apparition. The starry crown, which he saw in his dream floating over the head of his ideal Eve, now in reality shines in Eva's hair, and it is a crown of betrothal. The dream is accomplished, the poetic vision is become a living reality. In his delight, the third strophe of his song escapes from his lips, and resounds with its harp accompaniment like a true hosanna of betrothal. Eva listens, motionless as a statue. "Very good," Sachs says, as he gives back the shoe. "Is it right now? Try, walk a step and see!" Now, at last, Eva sees how the good master stands her friend, and she falls upon his neck. After a paternal embrace, Sachs releasing her, Walter springs forward and clasps her in his arms. David and Madeleine have arrived as if by accident, and the scene ends with a quintette, in which all hearts unite in a hymn of joy and hope.

The curtain falls a moment and rises upon a grand popular scene. A wide meadow extends along the banks of the Pegnitz. In the background, the towers and citadel of Nuremberg. At the left a stage is raised. Country people arrive in boats and are received by the apprentices, who, dressed as heralds, gaily brandish their ribboned sceptres. The corporations follow, and set up their banners around the tribune of the master-singers. The tailors, the shoe-makers and the bakers, sing a couplet in honor of their patron; the trumpets of the city sound a flourish, and the people applaud. The festivity is at its height, when a boat arrives filled with peasant girls. The apprentices run to claim them, the fifes strike up a rustic tune, couples are arranged in the twinkling of an eye, and the dance begins. A sudden outcry cuts short this extemporized ball. The girls fly into corners, the apprentices form ranks respectfully, while the brass instruments, resuming the solemn march of the overture, announce the arrival of the master-singers. They take their places upon the tribune, Pogner conducting his daughter, who bears in her hand the wreath for the victor. Hans Sachs comes in last. Perceiving their favorite, the crowd no longer restrain their enthusiasm, but with a common impulse join in a beautiful ode on the Reformation, of which the words are really composed by Sachs himself. The effect is superb. There is something at once gentle, and yet terrible, and which strikes to the very marrow of one's bones, in the suave pianissimo, which swells from note to note to most resounding fortissimo. One would say, the voice of a nation, moved in the depths of its soul with a religious, tender emotion, then suddenly lifting its tremendous rejoicing to the skies, in a cry of liberty. Twice, the heavy roll of drums is heard beneath these brilliant strains, like a far-off clash of arms; you can detect the muttered thunder of a revolution. It is the very soul of reform which breathes through this ode,—not a narrow and limited reform, but that great and eternal revolution which has for its motto: freedom to mankind, the free expansion of the soul, the brotherhood of the whole human race. It was the thought of a great artist to preserve the protestant tinge in this ode, and yet to fill it with so liberal a sentiment. The effect is so majestic that one may compare it with Schiller's Hymn of Joy, which has been placed by Beethoven at the end of his Ninth Symphony.

Sachs receives this homage with calm dignity. Standing motionless at the edge of the tribune, he looks far beyond the crowd into the distant horizon, as if his gaze buried itself in the future. The performances commence. Beckmesser first enters the arena. His manner at once occasions laughter in the crowd; his singing completes the ludicrous effect. The unfortunate Recorder gets the words wrong in Walter's composition, and makes complete nonsense of it; then he sings the incongruous verses to his own serenade, plentifully garnished with flourishes and ritournelles. After the first strophe, the masters exchange glances of surprise; after the second, a stir comes in the crowd; after the third, follow peals of laughter.

Then Walter steps forward and bravely confronts the assembly. A murmur of approbation greets the young man, and amid profound silence he resumes the first strophe of his Hymn. The noble melody spreads wide its majestic waves over the enchanted crowd, and a sympathetic shiver runs through the audience. Assured, henceforth, of success, Walter yields himself to the demon of inspiration; his bold thought ventures a new flight. For the first time he has felt his power over men. In the murmurous voices of the crowd he has detected the echoes of his own inspired voice, he has experienced the magnetic vibration of hearts. At this supreme moment of his existence, the secret of his destiny reveals itself to him, the mystery of his splendid vision is unveiled before his eyes. It is now no longer the Eve of Paradise, nor is it the simple young girl of Nuremberg; a more sublime bride is shown him. The muse herself, the muse of his nation appears before him, in her sacred and smiling beauty. She calls him to the sacred fountain; her presence is to him like a baptism of fire. It is she whom he seeks, whom he has at last found, and whom he hails with a daring song of love. The crowd is carried away by these hitherto unheard accents, which bear them to another world upon the wings of poesy, and the master-singers, moved and conquered in spite of themselves, cannot control their admiration. Walter advances to the tribune, and, kneeling before Eva, receives from her hand the myrtle and laurel crown. So ends the victory of the true poet. The apprentices clap their hands, the crowd wave hats and banners, and the curtain falls amid repeated cries, Long live Hans Sachs!

IV.

A detailed sketch of this drama appeared to us indispensable in order to give the reader an impression of the originality of the work. There is no trace here of the absurdities and platitudes of the conventional libretto. Life circulates, broad and free, through the drama. A noble thought rules it, and that which strikes the hearer most of all, is its perfect unity.

Walter and Sachs are the heroes, and from this mutual relation of theirs is suggested a thought that is not without grandeur. The dénouement of the drama is at the same time the victory of an idea. It is by the alliance of the poet of noble race with the popular poet that the victory of poetry is achieved. They come from opposite regions, to meet at the same point. The knight has grown to manhood in the isolation of his feudal château. His soul has awaked amid the murmurs of the old forest, amid the eternal youth of nature. During his long vigils, he has read "the old books left him by his grand-sire," and the great inspired ones of the heroic ages have appeared to him. Then arose in his heart dreams, broad as the vast forests, thoughts, lofty as the sky; but for whose sake shall it flow, this fountain which springs up in his heart? He desires to lavish it upon beings as noble as himself. But where do they live? He must find them. This drives him out into the world; he flies forth as an eagle from its eyry, with full heart and wide-spread wings. Sachs, on the other hand, is but a poor artisan, growing up among the people, one of themselves. Supported by his daily labor, he has lived his life. Day and night he has handled the hammer and the awl, in his little workshop, in the heart of the busy city. All the time his brave spirit is never idle. The people, who are so dear to him, inspire him with his enthusiasm and his good humor. They sing with him, and for him, night and morning. He scans his song to blows of the hammer.—what matter, so it is gay? He looks merrily upon humanity, as into a magic lantern, where peasants, lords, kings and people, dance a fantastic sara-band. He watches with calm eyes this strange world. He is strong and firm upon his native soil; he feels that he is the voice of his people. Thus we see the old workman in the decline of life, still young in soul and free of heart, salute with manly song the dawning of the great day of reform. This Hans Sachs is at once a resurrection and a creation. The artisan-poet of the sixteenth century, whose name is still revered in Germany, here appears with his true portrait transfigured by an ideal ray. He represents the inventive spirit, the untiring imagination of the people, in its frankness and simplicity. How healthy, rich and profound the nature! Towards the outside world, the rough exterior, the simplicity, the sly jokes, of the artisan; under the rugged bark, behind which he shelters himself against the foolish and the mischievous, depths of tenderness and poetry, of revery, of manly sadness, and at the very heart of all, a wise man, full of strength and joy. Different as they are, Hans Sachs and Walter von Stolzing were made to understand each other and be one another's complement. One arrives from the sublime heights of ideal thought and dream, the other comes from the inner heart of the common people; one burns to come down and share his inspiration, the other would fain ascend and bathe in purer air. Proudly the knight lays his hand into the rude hand of the artisan, in the presence of the people. They applaud, for they feel that it is the alliance of revealing enthusiasm with national tradition, of grand art with simple art, of genius with nature.

This work, regarded as a poem only, has all the elements of vitality; from the music, however, it receives an intensity of coloring and a power of expression which one would not expect from reading it. Detach the music from the words, and you have fragments, grand or graceful, as the case may be, but the meaning is a sealed book; restore the drama to its place, and all is lighted up with the clearest radiance. The overture is, like that of Tannhäuser, an abridgement of the drama itself. It commences effectively, with the grave and formal march of the master-singers. Soon a dreamy phrase, commencing with the flute, taken up by the hautboy and continued by the violins, comes to interrupt. It steals like the breath of some perfumed zephyr through the heavy columns of a church. It is the motif of Walter, as yet only a floating and mysterious germ, whence shall emerge a whole symphony. From this moment commences a warfare between the two motifs. The march, taken up by the trumpets, persistently and inflexibly returns; but the melodious phrase steals upon it, wraps it in its wavy outlines, hides it at last under its tuneful stress. It is like exuberant vegetation, pushing among the broken flags of some ruined cloister, twining around the massive pillars with its tufts of foliage, at last, hanging from the highest arches in its wild flowering festoons. Here we have an image and a forecasting of the strife between Walter and the school.

The original and captivating charm of this music consists in the active part it takes in the developing of the characters. The orchestra has a richness of coloring, glowing tones, effects of chiar'oscuro, which strike and fascinate. Not only does Wagner sketch his characters by means of the most remarkable motifs; to each he ascribes a particular timbre, giving us the immediate and intense apprehension of the peculiar temperament, and, so to speak, the inner vibration of the being of each. One could make a study of the unfolding of character of Walter and of Sachs in the music, of the interesting part played by the worthy Pogner, of the amusing Beckmesser, and of David the apprentice, laughing boy, with heart worn on his sleeve. It is enough to say that the music acts directly upon the soul, without involving the reasoning faculties, if only one will yield one's self willingly to its effect. Though some scenes are certainly very long, the melody in the dialogue is always lively and original. For instance, in the charming scene between Eva and Sachs, there is neither aria, nor song, nor recitative, and yet how much melody! The hautboys, the violins, the horns, outline a charming figure, which extends its cadenced rhythm through all the scene. Eva's insinuating questions, the master's mischievous replies—all that caressing and happy dialogue twines its capricious loveliness around the instrumental outline, as gracefully as a branch of honeysuckle in the trefoil of a pointed arch; and all is so animated, so carefully shaded, so true, that you forget they are singing; they seem to be speaking, and that, too, accurately, and exactly to the point.

The future will show, with more certainty than we are able to do now, what have been the imperfections and the asperities which were, perhaps, inevitable in the work of so bold a reformer as Richard Wagner. This one can safely affirm, he has made a decisive step in the history of the opera. His ambition is bold, but valiant and generous. Poet at heart, no less than impassioned composer, he has dreamed for the opera a nobility of idea, grandeur of characters, energy and mirthfulness of expression, and a profound and harmonious sympathy between the words and the music. Carrying out the idea of Gluck, he claims for the musical drama, in which all the arts join hands, the human beauty and the high social dignity of the Greek tragedy. No man can possess with impunity faith and courage like this. He who seeks to introduce a new spirit into an institution that is already strong and deeply rooted, has against him all those who, nearer or more remotely, are connected with this institution. Such was the event in Wagner's case, when he pronounced for the first time these words—"The Musical Drama." Directors, musicians, actors, believed themselves invaded in their rights, threatened in their privileges, and, imagining the house was on fire over their heads, cried out against the incendiary. But let an idea have truth in it, and it makes its own way. The idea of the musical drama is not dead—far from it. Always attacked, never thrown down, a hundred times pompously interred by the high priests of German criticism, a hundred times resuscitated in the open theatre before an astonished crowd, it has gained gradually upon all who frankly and bravely desire progress. As to Wagner's musical works, they have always powerfully seized upon the public mind. In Germany their success grows more secure every year. Tannhäuser and Lohengrin have become national types, and have inspired painters and sculptors. The Master-Singers was a victory hotly applauded by the public, timidly contested by the opposing camp. Since Munich—Dresden, Vienna and Karlsruhe have given the work entire. Whether one regrets or rejoices, the musical drama is now no longer only an idea; in Germany it has become a fact.

What will be the destiny of this new form of opera in France? Time alone will tell. It is natural not to accept, at the first attack, things which make their appearance in an unaccustomed form. It is in the French character to distrust works coming from a foreign land, and breaking thus with all tradition. Let us be just, however, and above all, let us be clear-sighted. Let us not shut our eyes to what goes on among our neighbors, when a series of events give ground to believe that an inevitable movement of mind in a new direction is preparing itself. Now in Germany, as in France, the élite of authors, of critics and of the public, are tending instinctively to give up the old form of the opera. This movement tends logically towards the musical drama. Do we say that in admitting this new form one implies condemnation of the immortal chefs d'œuvre of the past? Such a view is most narrow. As an opera, nothing can ever be more perfect than Don Giovanni. But art does not remain stationary; it is infinite as nature in the forms which it puts on, from age to age. To assign it limits is as idle as to restrict the flora of the globe to a single family. Every new form which develops itself with the vigor and unity of a living organism, has its right to exist. The musical drama, inaugurated by Gluck, taken up and enlarged by Wagner, is certainly one of the most vital and grand forms of art.

Wagner has by no means said the last word; but we ought to recognize his mighty effort towards that ideal. He has been the first to make out its principles, and to apply them with a courage and a perseverance which will make him forever famous. To imitate servilely his method and his processes would be absurd. Every great artist makes his system, or, to speak more truly, carries it ready made in his head, and can only put it in formula after he has applied it. This Wagner does. At the same time, among the general principles affirmed by the author of Lohengrin and The Master-Singers, there are some which must prevail even among those persons who are avowedly hostile. They are these: In the musical drama, this truth is incontestible, though often forgotten, that the poem is of the chief importance; the drama is the end, not the means. There must then be a depth of true inspiration—the action strong and simple, and the characters living and vigorous. As to the music, it is there, not alone to charm the ear, but to express the poetic thought in all its richness. This principle once admitted, two others follow naturally. Whatever the musical forms selected by the composer—to be truly persuasive, to satisfy us fully, it will not do to join beautiful melodies to commonplace words; the words and the melody must be alike beautiful, that the music may seem to spring out of the verse and be, as it were, its flower. Finally, if the orchestra is to move us in aid of the drama, let it have a constant part in the action, support the pantomime of the dramatis personæ, concur in the delineation of character. Is it needful to say that these principles apply to the most varied subjects, and to individualities the most diverse? All the great composers have been guided by them in the finest parts of their operas; but have they done it with that consistency and fidelity which is called for at the present day, by our need of dramatic truth? Yet to create works perfectly harmonious and intelligible, they ought to have applied exactly these principles faithfully. That the musical drama, thus conceived, demands a concurrence of talents, of strength, of devotion, of resources, truly extraordinary, and especially, a true poet and a true musician working together—a thing rarely met in one and the same person—is certainly true. But because this is difficult, it does not follow that it is impossible. The future strife between the opera and the musical drama can thus be foreseen. Those who ask on the lyric stage only the most gorgeous spectacles, ornamented with superb fragments of vocal and instrumental music, will follow the opera of tradition; those who do not look at it as a musical entertainment solely, who desire, as in the declaimed drama, an opportunity to represent before the public all the power of man, all the grandeur of humanity,—these will attach themselves to the musical drama. It is the glory of Gluck that he has marked out this road; it is the honor of Richard Wagner that he has gone forward in it.

The Story of Mozart's Requiem.

By WILLIAM POLE, F. R. S., Mus. Doc., Oxon.

In conclusion, now that we know all that we are likely to know of the history of the Requiem, it is desirable to sum up the evidence we have as to the part which Mozart had in its composition.

We may consider it absolutely demonstrated that the work was not completed by Mozart. The manuscript which at one time led to that belief has been proved to be a forgery by internal evidence, and the external testimony entirely corroborates this judgment. He was interrupted by the hand of death in writing out a copy; that imperfect copy is preserved, bearing the most positive signs of being what it is stated to be, and it is impossible reasonably to believe that any perfect copy could have been prepared by him, or to doubt that the completed copy must have been written by Süßmayer.

To explain clearly the state of the evidence in regard to the authorship, it is necessary to divide the work off in three portions, as follows:—

- A.—Portions known to be entirely Mozart's—
No. 1 Requiem and Kyrie.
- B.—Portions known to be essentially Mozart's—
No. 2 Dies Iræ.
3 Tuba mirum.
4 Rex tremendus.
5 Recordare.
6 Confutilla.

Part of No. 7 Lacrymosa, namely, the first eight bars.
8 Domine Jesu.
9 Hosanna.

- C.—Portions in which it is not positively known that Mozart had any part at all—
No. 7 From the ninth bar to the end.
10 Sanctus.
11 Benedictus.
12 Agnus Dei.

We will offer a few remarks on each of these heads.

A. The first class refers to those portions of the work which are known to be entirely Mozart's, having been completed by him. This class unfortunately comprises only one number, the Requiem and Kyrie. These, in the original manuscript, formed a part of the score delivered to Count Wallsegg, and about them there can be no question.

B. The second class comprises the portions which are known to be essentially Mozart's work, having been completed by him in the more important parts, but left unfinished in the less important ones. The essential features were all either completed or clearly indicated. The vocal parts were written out fully, together with the fundamental bass completely figured. The instrumental accompaniments were the only parts left unfinished. These were always put in where they had to go without the voices; and where they had to accompany the voices the commencement was written, so as to indicate clearly how they were to be carried on. Thus the work of the completer was confined to carrying out these indications, and filling in the accompaniments in accordance with the composer's intention. Composition, in the highest sense of the word, there was none to do.

Süßmayer appears to have been the most suitable person for this work that could have been found, as he had not only been often employed by Mozart to do work of a similar character, but had had, as he confesses in his letter, special and frequent communications with Mozart as to the carrying out of this very work. It must be admitted that he has done his part with great ability, but, as it involves nothing original, we may look on this portion, which really forms the main body of the Requiem, with almost as much satisfaction as if every note had been written by Mozart himself.

C. But now we come upon different ground altogether, namely, to those portions in regard to which there is no positive evidence of Mozart's authorship in any way. Not a scrap of his writing having reference to any of these portions has ever been produced; nor is there the least definite testimony that even any indications for them were at any time made by him. And yet, strange to say, some of these parts are among the most popular of the whole Requiem, and those which the admirers of the work and of the master are the least willing to abandon his claim to. On this account, it is necessary to state carefully how the evidence stands on either side. The arguments against Mozart's authorship are almost all external; those in favor almost all internal; and it is very seldom, in historical investigations, that the two kinds of argument are so opposed to each other as they are here.

Süßmayer claims this part as "ganz neu von mir verfertigt." The verb verfertigen is rather a peculiar one; it undoubtedly admits of the meaning "to compose," in the sense of writing entirely original music, and no doubt this is the most obvious interpretation of his claim. But I am told by German musicians that the more proper meaning of the word has a narrower signification, namely, "manufactured," "made up," "prepared." As an illustration of this meaning, an eminent Leipzig professor said to me, pointing to a part of his clothing, "This is verfertigt." It is, therefore, not impossible that Süßmayer may have intended the expression to admit of the interpretation that he had "manufactured," "made up," or "prepared," these portions, using therein material furnished him by his great instructor. It may be well to see what degree of credibility generally Süßmayer's letter bears. In the first place, all his other statements were, with some slight exceptions, subsequently proved to be true. This important letter gave the first clear indication of what Mozart did. It gave it in full detail; and it corresponded with what was shown by the manuscripts discovered long afterwards. The points where Süßmayer's statements were wrong were, that he included No. 1 among the unfinished portions, and that he gave Mozart credit for only six bars of the Lacrymosa, instead of eight; but as he, in all probability, wrote from memory of what had taken place ten years before, these slight discrepancies ought scarcely to be considered as detracting from the weight which the general corroboration of so large a body of detailed assertions gives to his testimony. This fact, combined with the air of modesty and straightforwardness about the whole letter, and the diffidence with which he speaks of his own work, in comparison with that of Mozart, render it difficult to set him down as a presumptuous impostor, whose aim was to assume the position of the "crow in peacock's feathers," he himself so pertinently mentions.

But Süßmayer's claim does not stand on his own assertion alone. His statement is distinctly corroborated by the widow, and with much greater weight by the Abbé Stadler. The legal investigations which took place on Count Wallsegg's behalf shortly after the publication of Süßmayer's letter, must certainly have led to the exposure of his imposition, had it been such; but so far from this, we are told that in this investigation the respective parts of the two composers, very nearly as described by Süßmayer himself, were distinctly pointed out to the Count's advocate.

The only external evidence pointing to the work of Mozart in these portions of the Requiem, is contained in the statement of the Abbé Stadler, as follows ("Defence," p. 16):—

"The last verse of the 'Lacrymosa,' the 'Sanctus,' the 'Benedictus,' and the 'Agnus Dei,' were composed by Süßmayer. Whether he made use therein of any of Mozart's ideas cannot be proved. The widow told me that, after Mozart's death, there were found on his writing-desk some scraps of paper with music (einige wenige Zettelchen mit Musik), which she gave over to Süßmayer. What they contained, and what use Süßmayer may have made of them, she did not know."

It is difficult to suppose that these scraps could have referred to anything but the Requiem, as for some time before Mozart's death this had wholly engaged his attention. It was his practice, on journeys, to carry little scraps of music paper on which to write down passing thoughts; and he was accustomed to make preparatory sketches of works of importance, particularly such as required contrapuntal treatment. Hence, it is quite possible that he may have jotted down on these little scraps of music paper any important ideas that might have occurred to him, in anticipation of his writing them out in the score. It is quite conceivable, for example, that the opening of the Sanctus, the subject of the Osanna, some of the ideas in the Benedictus, or the violin figure, and other parts of the Agnus, may, any or all of them, have been sketched out in this way, and that the movements may have been still "verfertigt" by Süßmayer, as he claims.

Then we must consider the possibility and, indeed, the probability of Mozart having communicated some of the ideas to Süßmayer personally. The latter says, in his letter,—

"It was known that, during Mozart's lifetime, I had often played and sung through with him the parts already set to music; that he had very often conversed with me about the working out of this composition, and had communicated to me the principal features (den Gang und die Gründe) of his instrumentation. I can only wish that I may have succeeded, at least, in so working that connoisseurs may here and there find some traces of his never to be forgotten teaching.

The following testimony also bears out this fact. The widow, at a later time, said to Stadler, "When Mozart felt weak, Süßmayer had often to sing through, with him and me, what was written, and so he obtained formal instruction from Mozart. And I can yet hear how often Mozart would say to Süßmayer, 'Ah, there again stick the oxen fast upon the hill; you are yet far from understanding that!'" A reproach which, considering the relative position of the parties, does not so much tell against the pupil, as confirm the pains taken by the master.

Now, though probably these remarks were intended, both by Süßmayer and the widow, to apply chiefly to the parts which Mozart had already begun, may it not apply, to some extent, to the others also? What more natural than that Mozart (who was well known to compose everything perfectly in his head before he wrote it down) while he and Süßmayer were playing and singing together the parts he had already written, should also have played over the parts he intended to write? And if so, we may be sure that such indications would not fall barren on the ear of such an apt scholar. At any rate, this supposition, taken together with the fact about the scraps of music, form the whole of the external evidence as to the possibility of Mozart's having had a share in this part of the Requiem.

But now, what as to the internal evidence? This is more delicate ground; and, fortunately, every musician who is a student and admirer of Mozart's works (and what musician worthy the name is not?) has, in the score itself, the means of forming his own judgment. It may, however, be well to add a few remarks which will aid in the consideration of the matter, and to put on record the opinions expressed by some competent critics.

In the first place, it will not do to dismiss Süßmayer's claims too summarily on the ground of his being an unknown man. It is often said by those who hear of his pretensions for the first time, and to whom his name may probably be entirely unknown, that if he had been able to write works like these, which would pass as Mozart's for half a century, he would not have remained so obscure, but would have made for himself, by other and acknowledged compositions, a character that would have preserved his name from oblivion. But this argument must be used with considerable reserve. It must be recollected that the popular knowledge of musical composers of the past age is exceedingly limited, particularly in England, where fashion has such large influence, and where some five or six of the most eminent composers are allowed to engross the whole public attention. Everybody who has looked into the less known music of the Continent must have met with the works of many very meritorious composers, whose names have hardly ever been heard on this side of the Channel; and Süßmayer was undoubtedly one of these. The sketch already given of his life, will show he was no unknown person in the musical circles of his time. Gerber, in his Lexicon, calls him "one of the most popular and meritorious dramatic composers of the present age." He speaks of his Moses as containing "many noble, pathetic, and masterly traits." Fétis, in his Biographie des Musiciens, called him a "compositeur de mérite," and a "compositeur distingué." Mozart himself had a high opinion of him, and called in his aid in the composition of La Clemenza di Tito, for which he wrote the recitatives, and filled in largely the instrumentation. Seyfried,* who was a fellow-scholar with Süßmayer, under Mozart, calls him "Mozart's inseparable companion," and adds as follows: "The hourly communication imbued him thoroughly with the master's spirit, particularly in his peculiar and novel style of instrumentation. He had appropriated Mozart's individuality so perfectly, that many works in the serious style are known to me which I should unconditionally hold to be Mozart's work were I not assured of the contrary."

Sievers speaks very highly of an opera of Süßmayer's, produced about 1790, Der Spiegel von Arcadien, a masterpiece of its kind, the production of a cheerful, genial humor, and containing evidence of surprising depth. He says it excited universal admiration throughout Germany, and was ranked near the Zauberflöte. The reason it disappeared from the stage was the very bad text. He cites several portions which he remembers with admiration, and among them a bass air which was as popular, in its style, as Mozart's "In diesen heiligen Hallen." The opera was arranged over and over again in all sorts of ways, and published in all parts of Germany.

Jahn says he was informed by Hauptmann (the eminent professor of composition at Leipzig) of instrumental compositions by Süßmayer, which would pass for lighter works of Mozart. He examined the work so approvingly spoken of by Sievers, and found an easy but superficial inventive power, a clear and smooth workmanship, and almost throughout an obvious imitation of Mozart's manner. He adds that both this and another opera, Soliman II., composed in 1800, were widely known and admired, and were occasionally given at later periods. A ballet by him, Il nocce de Benvenuto, was received in Milan, so late as 1825, with great applause. Gerber mentions an opera buffa, called I due Gobbi, which Süßmayer composed jointly with Paer, and which obtained extraordinary popularity in London, in 1796, some airs out of it having been published in this country.

The writer of this essay has not been able to get sight of any acknowledged composition by him; but in the great Thematic Catalogue of Mozart's works, lately brought out by Herr von Köchel, it is shown, on good authority, that the Mass in B flat (No. 7 of Novello's collection) generally attributed to Mozart, is really Süßmayer's composition. And if we look to the work in the Requiem itself, which we know Süßmayer did, namely, the filling in of the instrumental parts (which, he it remembered, the Hofkapellmeister Eybler had attempted, but given up in despair), we cannot help seeing traces of considerable skill, and a perfect appreciation of Mozart's intention. The Requiem, for example, among its many transcendent beauties, is universally admired for its exquisite instrumentation; but we know that much of this is entirely filled in by Süßmayer.

We may, for these reasons, fairly conclude that, although we must not attribute to Süßmayer powers capable of producing original works stamped with a genius like Mozart's, he was unquestionably a musician of much talent, thoroughly imbued with Mozart's spirit and style of composition, and who, moreover, in this particular case, was working under the rare advantage of having received Mozart's special directions.

[Conclusion next time.]

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, SEPT. 28.—The musical season has fairly commenced, and already we have entered upon a brilliant campaign. Week before last there were two or three benefit and complimentary concerts, and Madame Parepa's season of English Opera began at the French Theatre. On Wednesday of last week a short season of French opera (not bouffe) was opened at the Academy, with artists hitherto unknown to fame, at least among us. On Sunday evening Sept. 19, Mlle. Filomeno—the Chilian pianist—gave a concert in aid of the Cuban cause at Apollo Hall. She was assisted by various people of more or less ability, and also by a small and rather incapable orchestra. It does not seem that she has in any way made any artistic progress since last season.

On Sunday evening, Sept. 25, occurred the first of the "Patti concerts." The artists were Mlle. Carlotta Patti, Theodore Ritter (pianist), F. J. Prume (violinist), Habelmann (tenor); and there was also an orchestra of some thirty-five under the direction of Max Maretzek. I quote some portions of the programme:—

Overture, "Tell.".....Rossini.
P. F. Concerto, C minor [Mr. Ritter].....Beethoven.
3d Violin Concerto, [Mr. Prume].....Vieuxtemps.

Mr. Prume has self-possession, much execution, and a very good, if somewhat thin, tone. His faults are a certain scrappiness and an inordinate tendency to an excessive use of the violin bow. He received some applause, but created no very decided sensation.

Mr. Ritter played the difficult Concerto in a technically accurate and wonderfully clear manner, and seemed thoroughly at ease and devoid of the embarrassment supposedly natural upon such an occasion. I may mention that about twenty-five hundred people were present, and that at least twenty-four hundred and fifty found the Concerto hopelessly uninteresting and tedious. Mr. Ritter also played, in the second part of the programme, a Gavotte (D minor) by Bach, and a morceau of his own called "Les Courriers." These were so admirably played—particularly the latter—that he was tumultuously encored. He then played, in a perfectly delicious way, a light, airy Barcarolle in A major, in which he displayed an amazing dexterity of finger, and a touch of exquisite delicacy. His manner, quiet and unassuming, is grace and ease itself, and there was no kid-glove fussing, or any such ridiculous operation gone through with.

I have omitted to mention one thing: the cadenza in the Beethoven Concerto was composed by Mr. R. I regret to say that in style it was essentially Frenchy and totally infelicitous.

Mlle. Patti achieved a genuine success, and took the audience by storm. Her voice is a clear, pure, penetrating soprano, of unusual compass, exceedingly strong in the upper and middle register, and less so in the lower ones. Of course it lacks the grandeur, the richness and the incomparable volume of Mme. Parepa's; but its bird-like quality is very charming, and her execution is something astonishing. She touched, with no apparent effort, the upper E, and indeed trilled upon D flat and E flat, which is rather a difficult thing to do. She might perhaps throw Adeline (her sister) in the shade, if her unfortunate lameness did not prevent her going upon the stage. She is unquestionably the freshest and best soprano who has visited us in many years always excepting Mme. Parepa.

The orchestra—evidently a "picked up" affair—was hopelessly bad. In the first place, it was poorly balanced, for there was too much brass for the strings; in the second place, there seemed to be neither concord nor unanimity of purpose; in the third place, the luckless contrabassists would persist in playing a quarter of a tone below, which produced an eminently pleasing effect. All these matters must be seen to by Mr. Strakosch, if he wishes his concerts to be successful. There will be three more of the present series during this week.

Mr. Theo. Thomas has given nearly 160 of his concerts at the Central Park Garden, and these charming entertainments will cease on Tuesday evening.

CHICAGO, SEPT. 21.—For a long time we were woefully deficient here in good organs and good organists. Our best instruments were old-fashioned affairs, on which no fine effects could be produced (they were so poorly voiced), and with pedales so meagre as to forbid adequate performance of severe organ music. About three years ago the First Baptist Church erected a large organ from the factory of Wm. A. Johnson, of Westfield (Mass.). This instrument has three manuals, a pedale of six stops, and in all about fifty four stops. The case, which was built here, is a very imposing one. The organ itself, although scarcely equal to the claims set up for it, is one worthy of respectful consideration. It gave an impulse to all after-coming building-committees. The following year the centenary Methodist Episcopal church bought an organ of the Messrs. Hook. This beautiful instrument has forty-four stops, three manuals and a pedale of four stops. The centenary organ was regarded by its builders as a very perfect piece of voicing and mechanism, and stands to-day, by general consent, the most perfect organ in Chicago. Some time later, the Hooks built two other similar instruments here, and one very fine one of two manuals and ten composition pedals. Johnson also erected three or four very full two-manual organs, which were well received by the public generally. Still we had no men especially strong in organ-playing. True, we had a round dozen of good average accompanying organists, every man of whom had a few fugues (comfortable ones), and a few Batiste and Wely pieces.

About a year ago, however, Mr. Louis Falk returned from three years of study in Germany, of which one year was in Leipzig, and the remainder under Volkmar. Mr. Falk has good technique, but lacks the skill to temper the wind of classic music to the shorn lambs of the public, and so failed to make much impression.

Presently there followed him Mr. A. J. Creswold, from England, a gentleman with that peculiar faculty of regarding his own efforts with sublime complacency, undisturbable by any ordinary fault-finding. Mr. Creswold has a good idea of organ effects, and a somewhat showy but superficial technique, with a great facility of manipulation.

Then came Mr. Dudley Buck, whose Eastern reputation is such as to make it unnecessary for me to refer to him more at length, except to say that he is unquestionably the most competent organist we yet have. Then came Mr. Penfield, of whom you recently made a notice, who is also a strong man. So that at present we have four strong players, all of whom are well versed in the better class of real organ works.

Just now, however, still another development has been made. Mr. Dudley Buck has erected a little music hall, about twenty-five feet by fifty, adjoining his residence, and in it Mr. Wm. A. Johnson has placed an organ, the largest ever built for the use of a private individual, and of this I subjoin a specification:—

Three Manuals, C C to A3.....58 Keys.
Pedals C C C, to F.....30 Keys.

Great Organ.

1. Principal, 8 feet, metal.....58 Pipes.
2. Gamba, " " " " " " " "
3. Rohr Flute, 8 " wood and metal. " " "
4. Octave, " " " " " " " "
5. Mixture, 2 ranks. " " " " " "

Solo Organ.

14. Keraulophon, 8 feet
15. Dulciana, " " 17. Flute Harmonique, 4 feet
16. Melodia, " " 18. Piccolo, 2 feet
19. Clarinet, 8 "

Pedale Organ.

20. Principal, 16 feet
21. Bourdon, " " 22. Flute, 8 "
23. Swell to Great.
24. Swell to Solo.
25. Solo to Great.
26. Solo to Great (sub-octave).
27. Pedal to Pedale.
28. Great to Pedale.
29. Solo to Pedale.
30. Tremulant.
31. Pedal check.
32. Engine.

Mechanical Movement.

- 1 and 2 act on Great Organ.
- 3 and 4 act on Solo.
- 5 and 6 act on Swell Organ.
- 7 acts on Pedal Ventil.
- 8 acts on Great to Pedal coupler.
- 9 acts on Tremulant.
- 10 acts on Solo to Great, sub-octave coupler.

The exterior is very lovely. Many have pronounced it the most artistic they have ever seen.

The voicing of the string toned registers is considered very superior. The flutes are fine. The diapason is perhaps a shade too stringy, but has a good body and resonance. The tone of the full organ is well-balanced and telling. Taken singly and in combination, the stops are so appropriately voiced as to meet the complete approval of the distinguished organist for whom it was built, and of the most discerning critics who have had opportunity to examine it.

The mechanical appliances are very complete. The couplers are placed just over the swell manual. The "great to pedal" coupler operates both by the draw-knob and by pedal. The pedal is so contrived that when pressed down it always reverses the condition of the coupler. If it were previously on, the pedal takes it off. If it were off, the pedal brings it on. And it never fails to operate, however the knob may have been shifted. The ten composition pedals have ivory labels placed over the great organ keys, each name in a vertical line over the corresponding pedal.

The instrument is blown by one of Stannard's "Organ-blowing Apparatus." This water engine, although the second ever built, is a most complete success. The organ, you will observe, is larger than average church organs. Yet this engine, which is smaller than the regular size, fed by a two-inch stream of water, at a pressure of twelve to fifteen pounds to the square inch, furnishes all the wind wanted, adapts itself instantly to the shifting demands of the organ, according as more or less wind is required, and keeps the top of the bellows within three inches of a uniform height. That is to say, after a soft passage, during which the engine has slackened its efforts, when the full organ is taken, the top of the bellows runs down about three inches before the engine can so accelerate its action as to meet the increased demand; but in a few seconds the bellows is full again. Moreover, if a loud passage be suddenly succeeded by a soft one, you never hear wind escaping. The engine stops instantly, if necessary, to prevent the bellows from overflowing. Furthermore, the wind is perfectly steady. Not the slightest wavering is perceptible.

So, taken all in all, with his fine accomplishments, his elegant and convenient hall for receiving friends or pupils, and his beautiful organ for lessons and practice, it will at once be seen that, thanks to Mr. Buck, Chicago has begun to show, in respect to the organ and organ playing, some of that enterprise she manifests in other respects.

I ought to mention, further, that at least four more large organs will be erected here within a few months or a year. But, the present incumbents of the several positions intend to play them. So let no one cast longing eyes hitherward!

Music Abroad.

NORWICH FESTIVAL.—Of the fourth day, Thursday, Sept. 2, the Musical World's reporter says:

The scheme of this morning formed an agreeable contrast to that of yesterday, when the portions of Mr. Pierson's labored, pretentious, and unsatisfactory Hezekiah, and Spohr's Full of Babylon, which, notwithstanding all its cleverness, is heavy (at times to dullness), constituted the programme. How the committee came to place two such compositions in juxtaposition, is one of those things that, as Lord Dundreary says, "No fellow can understand."

The sacred cantata of Mr. Horace Hill, first presented to the public to-day, is smoothly written, lying well for the voice, nicely scored, and, if not distinguished by any great originality, reminiscences of Handel, Mendelssohn, and Spohr (whose school Mr. Hill seems to have mostly affected), frequently fitting through one's mind, it has, at any rate, the merit of being pleasant to listen to, not necessitating any violent strain on one's powers of attention, and, as a whole, leaving an agreeable impression on the hearer. Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Patey, Messrs. Cummings and Santley, sang the principal parts, with the greatest care and efficiency, the composer conducting the work, and receiving very general and deserved applause, both on entering and quitting the orchestra.

As in Paris, London, and wherever it has been performed, Rossini's Messe Solennelle made a most profound effect. Mr. Benedict has rearranged the organ part (which is an improvement), and took all possible pains to ensure a perfect ensemble. The principal artists were Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Trebelli-Bettini, and her husband, with Mr. Santley, a quartet that it would be almost impossible to surpass, and the result was that the music has never been heard to greater perfection.

After the almost sensuous strains of Rossini (described in the printed programmes as G. Rossini, for fear of mistakes), and the fully developed resources of the modern orchestra, of which the Italian maestro has so freely availed himself, the music of the grand old Saxon giant, Handel, in the Melting Te Deum, sounded at first strangely—a greater contrast than the two works could hardly be imagined—each a masterpiece in its way, but having nothing whatever in common beyond illustrating the widely diverse range of art, and being both productions of great masters.

Now let the Orchestra take up the strain and bring it to a close, somewhat cut short on our part:

On Thursday evening the last of the miscellaneous concerts came off with the following programme:—

PART I.

- Overture—Leonora.....Beethoven.
Song—"The Ray of Hope," Clarinet Obligato (Mr. Lazarus).....Sir H. Bishop.
Aria—"Sorgete," Maometto.....Rossini.
Quartet—"Ecco quel fiero istante"—Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Trebelli-Bettini, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Santley.....Sir M. Costa.
Mandoline—Signor Bettini.....Paladine.
Cradle Song—"Peacefully Slumber"—Mme. Patey with accompaniment of Pianoforte, Violoncello, and Violoncello.....Handegger.
Cavatina—"Nulla da te"—Mr. Vernon Rigby, Benedict.
Aria—"Bel raggio"—(Semiramide)—Mlle. Tietjens, and Chorus—"The Forging of the Anchor"—Benedict.
Aria—"Gli angeli d'Inferno," (Flauto Magico) Mlle. Irma de Murka.....Mozart.
Song—"The Angel of Home," Mr. W. H. Cummings.....H. Smart.
La Serenade, "Quand tu chantes," Mme. Trebelli-Bettini.....Gounod.
Chorus, "Sound, immortal harp".....H. Hugh Pierson.

PART II.

- Overture to Kleist's Drama "Der Prinz von Homburg".....Benedict.
Aria, "La mia vendetta" (Lucrezia Borgia) Signor Foli.....Donizetti.
Romance, "La fiancée du Marin," Mlle. Tietjens.....H. S. Oakley.
Song, "The Thorn," Mr. Vernon Rigby.....Shield.
Song, "O fair Dove," Mme. Patey.....A. S. Gatty.
Duo, "Sera mi ogor" (Semiramide), Mlle. Tietjens and Mme. Trebelli-Bettini.....Rossini.
Cavatina, "O luce di quest'anima" (Linda) Mlle. Irma de Murka.....Donizetti.
Song, "I wish to tune my quivering lyre" Mr. Santley.....A. Sullivan.
Duet, "Per valli, per boschi," Mme. Trebelli-Bettini and Signor Bettini.....Bianchi.
Cornelius March.....Mendelssohn.

The new compositions of Mr. Benedict—his overture and the descriptive song—created great interest. The first—taking them in order of performance—drew down a warm encore. We notice that Mr. Boucicault is anxious that he should not be accredited with the authorship of the words of "The Forging of the Anchor." He simply adapted them from somebody else—much as he adapts his plays. Mr. Boucicault is not a poet, and has the courage to confess it. Of Mr. Benedict's overture to "Der Prinz von Homburg" good report may be made. There is in the opening movement in D minor some happy employment of the brass, forming a capital foil to subsequent effects with stringed instruments. The allegro in D major swells into spirited strains, which evidence the composer's capacity for climax and his mastery over every form of orchestration. The overture was much applauded. An earnest plauditory compliment was also paid to Signor Handegger's pleasant cradle song, sung by Mme. Patey. Mr. Pierson's chorus "Sound, immortal harp," was more suggestive of the sound than the immortality.

On Friday, as usual, the festival closed with the "Messiah." Mlle. Tietjens, Mmes. Talbot-Cherier, Patey, and Trebelli-Bettini, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Signor Foli, and Mr. Santley, were the solo vocalists. The band mustered in full force, the chorus were irreproachable, and nothing failed to render the performance thoroughly satisfactory. The full-dress hall, in St. Andrew's Hall, attended by about 400 ladies and gentlemen, who kept up dancing till three o'clock, wound up a gathering the success of which must be measured with an artistic rather than a financial footrule. For the fact cannot be ignored that the Norwich Festival of this year has turned out, pecuniarily, a failure.

WORCESTER FESTIVAL.—The 186th gathering for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the poorer clergy of Worcester, Hereford and Gloucester, began in Worcester Cathedral on Monday, Sept. 6. After the religious celebration, and the Mayor's breakfast in the Guildhall, the Musical Festival proper began at noon with Mendelssohn's Elijah. The orchestra numbered 70 instruments, the chorus 250 singers: conductor, Mr. Done, the Cathedral organist; principal singers: Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Sherrington, Mme. Trebelli-Bettini, Mme. Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Santley. Attendance large.—There was an evening concert in the College Hall. Mr. John Francis Barrett's cantata, The Ancient Mariner, occupied the first part, confirming the favorable impression at Birmingham in 1867. The rest was miscellaneous. We hasten to what is said of the much expected work of Arthur Sullivan, and let the Orchestra lead off.

On Wednesday a considerable degree of interest centred in the production of Mr. A. Sullivan's new sacred cantata, "The Prodigal Son." The position which Mr. Sullivan occupies in the world of Art—a position in advance of his years, but gained by progressive triumphs, all of which have testified to the true vis in him—evoked much expectancy as to his first step in the highest of all musical achievements, the composition of an oratorio. The work in question was composed for the Worcester Festival; and its production justified the good things anticipated of it. The conception formed of his subject, and the mode in which he has set to work it out, are elucidated by Mr. Sullivan in his preface, which runs as follows:—

It is a remarkable fact that the Parable of the Prodigal Son should never before have been chosen as the text of a sacred musical composition. The story is so natural and pathetic and forms so complete a whole; its lesson is so thoroughly Christian; the characters, though few, are so perfectly contrasted, and the opportunity for the employment of "local color" is so obvious, that it is indeed astonishing to find the subject so long overlooked. The only drawback is the shortness of the narrative, and the consequent necessity for filling it out with material drawn from elsewhere. In the present case this has been done as sparingly as possible, and entirely from the Scriptures. In so doing the Prodigal himself has been conceived, not as of a naturally wicked and depraved disposition—a view taken by many commentators with apparently little knowledge of human nature, and no recollection of their own youthful impulses; but rather as a buoyant, restless youth, tired of the monotony of home, and anxious to see what lay beyond the narrow confines of his father's farm, going forth in the confidence of his own simplicity and ardor, and led gradually away into follies and sins which at the outset would have been as distasteful as they were strange to him. The episode with which the parable concludes has no dramatic connection with the former and principal portion, and has therefore not been treated.

Mr. Sullivan's memory slips when he assumes that the Parable of The Prodigal Son has not previously been set. Dr. Arnold's oratorio of The Prodigal Son was given in 1773, being the third original oratorio of this composer. It was received most favorably, and in consequence of "its superior renown" it was given at Oxford on the installation of Lord North as Chancellor. Dr. Arnold, then Mr. Arnold, thought the occasion a fit and proper one for proceeding to the degree of Doctor in Music, and accordingly wrote an exercise which he sent to the then Professor of Music, Dr. William Hayes. The Professor returned the exercise unopened, giving as his reason that it was quite unnecessary to examine an exercise composed by the author of The Prodigal Son. Two years afterwards Dr. Arnold produced the oratorio of Elijah; or, the Shunamite, the libretto from the pen of Mr. Thomas Hull. It was given in the Haymarket Theatre, and "most deservedly added to the composer's reputation." Dr. Arnold speaking of the extraordinary memory of Jonathan Buttishill said, "Buttishill played from memory several songs from my oratorio of The Prodigal Son which he had not heard for twenty years, and which I had myself nearly forgotten."

The present cantata is divided into seventeen vocal numbers, opening with an overture in F flat (?) on a pastoral subject sustained by the violin and the lighter wind instruments, leading to the first chorus in D major, "There is joy in the presence of the Angels of the Lord;" a decided felicity in choral effect, in which there is a peculiarly happy contrast. A solo for tenor which follows on the words, "A certain man had two sons," shows again the composer's power of antithesis: the allegro in G minor, "Father, give me a portion of goods," has an agitato accompaniment of violins intending to represent the trembling eagerness of the demand. This portion of the narrative is interrupted with admonition and aphorism in the prevailing manner of oratorical composition of the day; thus the father's claim for attention, "My son, attend to my words," is followed by a cantabile "Trust in the Lord with all thy heart," and a coda, "The path of the just is as a shining light," in the treatment of which Mr. Sullivan has been particularly successful. Instrumentation forms a prominent part in the illustration of the various emotions of eagerness, regret, hot youthful desire, and paternal tenderness. After the soprano recitative, "And the younger son gathered all together," the revel is introduced in rather boisterous form, which however alternates with the warnings given to chorus and contralto solo: the latter beautifully sung by Mme. Trebelli-Bettini: "Love not the world" is the title of an air singularly simple and sweet, and full of poetic beauty. Then more agitation in the orchestra, expressive of the rapid waste of health and wealth and content; and then the soprano takes up the story of riot and famine, the latter pathetically indicated on the words, "And no man gave unto him." At this point an air is assigned to the soprano, who has hitherto merely recited the history—a full, pathetic melody, set to the reproachful admonition, "O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments." The most réussi effort of the composer is the treatment of the verse "I will arise," so often treated before. It begins with soft arpeggios on the reflection upon the father's hired servants, till the prodigal conceives the resolution to return, at first humbly expressed, then gathering fervor as it proceeds, and displaying the fullness of contrition and emotional agitation in the confession, "Father I have sinned." Soft and sustained chords denote the sinner's repentance, and are replete with expression. Nor could a better execution of the solo be conceived than that of Mr. Sims Reeves, to whom it was assigned. After a little more aphoristic reflection on the part of the chorus, the incident of the return is reached, and the duet between father and son follows, in which the alternation of penitence and joy, of remorse and forgiveness is shortly—too shortly—exemplified. The full fatherly satisfaction is reserved for a following number, "For this my son was dead and is alive again," which is much happier, and a brilliant passage for violins illustrates the deep gratitude which takes shape in the aspiration, "Blessed be God, who hath heard my prayer," pointing the choral moral in F minor, "O that men would praise the Lord." The episode of the envious brother is not introduced: Mr. Sullivan has no heart to devote to the petty vices. Penitence and forgiveness are his theme, and the religious spirit in which he has set to work to expound them admits of no qualification. In only one instance does the worldly character intrude—in the revel scene, and here he may defend himself on dramatic grounds. The work is a high work, full not only of pretension but of admirable performance. We may have opportunity to refer to it on a future occasion, merely taking here occasion to remark on the excellence of its execution at the hands of Mme. Tietjens, Mme. Bettini, Messrs. Sims Reeves, and Santley. Mr. Sullivan conducted in person.

A selection from "Judas Maccabeus" filled up the remainder of the morning, including the overture, several of the finest choruses, and most of the favorite solos, by Mlle. Tietjens, Mmes. Lemmens Sherrington and Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby and Mr. Lewis Thomas.

The concert of the evening included a selection of Rossini's works under the title "Hommage à Rossini," comprising the Preghiera from "Mosè in Egitto," the overture from "Guillaume Tell," the quartet, "Cielo il mio labbro." Mmes. Lemmens and Bettini, MM. Bettini and Santley were the artists. In addition to the Rossinian element the music to the "Waldpurgianacht" and a selection from "Oberon" were given. The excellence of the programme will thus be recognised, and we may add, it was as excellently carried out.

Mr. Sullivan's star seems to be in the ascendant, all critical England ringing with his praises.

The Opening Season.

The Organ Concerts lately show that Bach is in the wind. Our musicians are aware that the Passion Music is to be taken up in earnest by the Handel and Haydn Society,—after a sop or two to Cerberus in the shape of Naaman and what not. Such straws as these are lifted: Mr. THAYER, in his last two performances on the Great Organ, has introduced what may be called experimental arrangements of three of the choruses from the Passion Music: viz., that trustful and reposeful one: So schlafen unsre Sünden ein ("So slumber shall our sins befall"), which alternates with tenor solo: Ich will bei meinem Jesu wachen; the tremendous one, calling down Heaven's wrath on the great wrong: "Ye lightnings, ye thunders, in clouds are ye vanish'd?" and the profoundly beautiful threnody which concludes the work: Wir setzen uns mit Thränen nieder. The second seemed less manageable on the organ than the other two, which proved deeply interesting.

Then the Toccata in F has been revived, both by Mrs. FRODOCK, and by the young organist from Worcester, pupil of Mr. Lang. Mr. G. W. SUMNER, who made his debut at the Great Organ, playing also one of the Mendelssohn Sonatas, winning praise from those who know what organ playing should be. Then again one or more of the Orchestral Suites, or parts of them, are prominent candidates for a place among the novelties of the coming Symphony Concert season. Mr. LANG, at one of his last turns at the Organ, played one of Schumann's Fugues on the letters of Bach's name, besides a Mendelssohn Sonata, and (are we sorry that we did not hear it?) a transcription of Liszt's "Preludes"!

Very interesting, in another way, was a little affair on Thursday afternoon, Sept. 30, at Chickering Hall, when by invitation of young Mr. SUMNER (alluded to above) and Mr. G. ARTHUR ADAMS, another young pupil of Lang's, a room-full of music lovers listened to "a performance of the following piano-forte music":—

Rondo in C major, for two piano-fortes (posthumous).
Chopin.
Capriccio in B minor, Op. 22.....Mendelssohn.
Concerto No. 5, in E flat major, Op. 73.....Beethoven.
Concerto in E minor, Op. 11.....Chopin.
Romance—Rondo.

We know not what we are coming to:—so many young men and young women spring up among us, who in a quiet way have in some sense mastered the highest tasks in classical piano-forte music! Here is a still, pale Massachusetts boy, the first we ever knew of whom was hearing him on this occasion actually play with certainty and power and good aplomb the greatest of Concertos, the "Emperor" of Beethoven. That Mr. Adams's rendering had all the fineness of mature conception, or sympathetic depth of nature, which we look for in a real artist, we of course do not say; but it was remarkably well done, making due allowances. Mr. Sumner showed to equal advantage, and even greater in respect to musical feeling, so it seemed to us, in the Chopin Concerto. In both cases Mr. Lang sketched in the orchestral parts on a second piano. Indeed the whole programme, consisting of the choicest things, was well read, clearly and effectively interpreted, and without any outward fuss or unnecessary waste of force. The whole air of both the young men was quiet, self-possessed, ingenuous and modest.

What Next?

The full and proper opening of our musical season will come with the first of the SYMPHONY CONCERTS of the Harvard Musical Association, on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 4. This will be the fifth season of these concerts, and there will be ten of them (in the subscription series), as there were last year, given once a fortnight, except that there will be an interval of three weeks between the five before and the five after New Year. Already the guaranty subscription among the members of the Association is rapidly filling up, and the sale of season tickets will be open to the public by the 19th or 20th of this month. The musical arrangements are nearly completed. Mr. ZERRAHN will conduct an Orchestra fully as complete and excellent as that of last year (notwithstanding the absence of the Quintette Club), with Mr. BERNARD LISTEMANN at the head of the violins. Among the artists who will play piano Concertos will be certainly PERABO and LEONHARD, probably Miss ALIDE TOPP, Mr. PARKER, and others. There will be violin solos by Listemann and others; vocal solos, choice, but sparingly introduced; and probably some chorus singing by the German Clubs uniting round the Orpheus as a nucleus; a mixed chorus also may be called into service once or twice.

The first programme is definitively agreed on, opening with the Zauberflöte Overture by Mozart, followed by the beautiful Aria of Pamina in the same opera. "Ah, lo so," &c. (Ach, ich fühl's, es ist verschwunden), to be sung by Miss WHITTEN; then the Symphony: "Weihe der Töne" (Consecration of Tones) by Spohr, concluding the first part. Part second begins with Beethoven's Overture in C, op. 115; followed by a couple of the Soprano Arias which Robert Eranz has exhumed and arranged with all his sympathetic art from the scores of Handel's Italian operas (about which buried treasures we had an article a few numbers back). These are gems of fresh and noble song, full of the genius of Handel's youth. The two to be sung by Miss Whitten are: "Sommi Dei" from his Radamisto, and "Il vostro Maggio" from Rinaldo; and we are much mistaken if this first taste do not create a pretty eager demand for more of them; Franz has already published twelve, to be followed by twelve more for each of the other voices. The concert will close with one of Boieldieu's genial and graceful Overtures: to "Jean de Paris." All of these selections, except the Mozart Overture, will be new to the Symphony Concerts, while the Overture by Beethoven and the airs by Handel will be heard for the first time in Boston. The remaining programmes are not yet quite determined, but here are some of the ingredients:

Symphonies: Haydn: in B flat, No. 8, (second time), and perhaps a new one. One or more by Mozart. Of Beethoven, at least the "Eroica" and No. 4, in B flat. The great one in C, by Schubert, which was not heard last year. Mendelssohn's "Italian," perhaps. Of Schumann: No. 1, in B flat, and No. 2 in C; also (first time here) his "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," op. 52. Possibly a new Gade Symphony (No. 3, in A minor.)

Overtures. Gluck: to "Iphigenia." Beethoven: "Prometheus," "Coriolan," and "Leonora, No. 3. Cherubini: "Lodoiska" (first time), "Meden," and "Wasserträger." Weber: "Euryanthe" and "Oberon." Schubert: "Alfonso and Estrella" (first time) Schumann; Genovera, and (first time in these concerts) "Manfred." Spohr: "Der Alchemist" (first time). Mendelssohn: "Hobrides," "Melusina," "Ruy Blas." Spontini: "Vestale," (first time). Gade: "Ossian." Bennett: "Wood Nymph." Perhaps others; though there is already danger of a surplus, if not of a surfeit.

Orchestral Suites, &c. Suite by Bach, in D; perhaps also the Gavotte from his B-minor Suite, preceded by the Pastoral Symphony in his Christmas Oratorio. A Suite for all the strings by Otto Grimm (modern).—A serenade for wind instruments by Mozart is under consideration.

Concertos, &c. Beethoven: in C minor, and in E flat; also his Choral Fantasia (first time) in C. Schumann: in A minor. Chopin: in F minor. One by Mozart (first time). For Violin: Beethoven: in D. Spohr: "Scena Cantante." Others perhaps, and the Chaconne, or something else, by Bach.

Of the vocal selections it is hardly seasonable to speak at present; but there will certainly be a Bass Aria (first time) by Mozart, and more of the Handel Opera songs; perhaps one or two Arias by way of foretaste of Bach's Passion Music. The German clubs will sing, among other things, the Chorus of Priests in "The Magic Flute," and the great Finale of the second act to "William Tell."—It will be seen that the real trouble in the making up of ten such programmes is the embarrassment of riches. After four such seasons, there is a natural desire to extend acquaintance into new fields of Symphony, &c. How to do this and yet to gratify the never ceasing call for so many grand old favorites, is a dilemma; one is reminded of the greedy hand in the slender-necked pitcher.

But now, to stand more on the order of their coming, the musical events in prospect are these:

CARLOTTA PATTI and her concert troupe will appear in the Music Hall on Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings next week.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, on Saturday, the 16th, at Chickering's, will give us a Farewell on the eve of their departure westward. They will have the assistance of a new singer of distinction, Miss JENNY BUSK, who is to go with them, and of leading artists of the city, and the programme no doubt will address itself to their best audience.

We are to have a flying foretaste of Orchestral Music too, immediately before the Harvard concerts. No less an opportunity is offered us than that of hearing Mr. THEODORE THOMAS's famous New York orchestra in three concerts at the Music Hall. The programme will embrace both classical and popular, and doubtless will introduce to us some interesting compositions of the writers of to-day.

Mr. PERABO's first series of Chamber Concerts will begin on Friday, the 29th inst., as we said before. The brilliant favorite, Miss ALIDE TOPP, too, has a short series of Piano Concerts in contemplation for the city which has received her with enthusiasm from the first.

There are furthermore announced: a Sacred Concert to-morrow evening, in aid of the Catholic Fair at the Music Hall; and three "Grand Promenade" (Gift Enterprise) Concerts in the ruins of the Coliseum, for the thousands who desire a chance to draw its $15,000 worth of lumber, flags and furniture.

The late "National Musical Convention," resulting in a "National Musical Congress," is still too vague and big for us to form a very clear opinion of it; and as all objects occupy much room just in proportion to their vagueness, and we had little room to spare, we must forbear for awhile at least.

We learn that Messrs MASON BROTHERS, of the city of New York, have just disposed of their large and valuable catalogue of music books to OLIVER DITSON & Co., the well-known music publishers. The Mason catalogue embraced upwards of seventy books, many of them of wide popularity, and included the "Mason and Hoadley Piano Method," "Root's Cabinet Organ Instructor," "New American Tonne Book" (now in press), "Carmina Sacra," "Temple Choir," "Jubilee," etc., etc. We are informed that this acquisition to the already very extensive catalogue of Ditson & Co., makes it equal in extent and value to that of all the music publishers in the United States combined.—New York Tribune.

"Who Can Refute a Snee?"

MR. EDITOR:—At one of the sessions of the Musical Convention, recently held in your city, a prominent member of the Convention, in the course of some admirable remarks on the music of our churches and the bad taste and ignorance too often exhibited by those having charge of this important part of Divine worship, made a statement which seems to require a little explanation. He said that "on the last Sunday but one" he attended the service of a very large Episcopal church, where the full "cathedral service" was performed by a large and powerful choir. When the proper time for the anthem arrived, the clergyman announced that it would be sung, and the organist commenced the prelude; he was astonished to hear the familiar strains of an old college song, and could scarcely believe the evidence of his ears until the choir commenced the hymn, "While shepherds watched their flocks by night," to the once well known melody, "Drink to me only with thine eyes."

He further added that after diligent inquiry he learned that the rector of this very important parish directly encouraged this sort of thing.

This is the substance of the gentleman's statement; now let us see if it will stand without qualification.

The beautiful hymn which he quoted, it is well known, is appropriate only to Christmas-tide, and it is very remarkable if it was sung in any Episcopal church on the "last Sunday but one," which was, according to the church calendar, the Sixteenth Sunday after Trinity. It is not usual anywhere, and particularly not in places where the choral service is used, to announce an anthem and then to sing a metrical tune in common measure. And in regard to the encouragement said to have been given by the rector to such a style of music,—by which I suppose the gentleman meant the deplorable and, unfortunately, too common practice of debasing God's service by adapting sacred words to the popular melodies of the street, the concert room and the opera—is it not possible that the melody, said to have been used, may never have been known in any other connection by those having charge of the music of the parish? The song is rarely heard at present, and perhaps the fault may rest with the adapter, rather than with the users.

Why did the gentleman lay such stress upon the fact of this having been done in an Episcopal church? He did not think it necessary to inform the convention of the denomination of the churches in which he had heard Batti, batti and Che fard, and of which he gave such capital illustrations. I take no exceptions to the general tone of the gentleman's remarks. They were admirable, and I thank him for having made them; but if he will explain the points to which I have referred, he will greatly oblige

RIPIENO.

The Humboldt Festival.

The Centennial Anniversary of the Birth of Alexander von Humboldt was celebrated throughout this country, wherever there were Germans, and in some cities also by Americans. Music lent its aid so largely, and in most instances so fitly, that it would be interesting, had we room, to chronicle the programmes furnished by the various Männerchöre and orchestras. By far the most complete, significant and beautiful of all the celebrations was that held in the Boston Music Hall, under the auspices of the Boston Society of Natural History. There the great naturalist of our day, our own AGASSIZ, spoke of his great friend and master. His running up of the vast labors, the contributions to science and human progress, the rich, full, noble life, and generous spirit of his hero,—so simple, glowing, fully rounded and complete—was in itself a symphony; and so the great orchestral music which formed the prelude and the postlude to it, those master strains of Mozart and Beethoven, seemed in perfect keeping with the spoken word, a fit ideal frame to it, and sounded more significant than ever. This was the programme:

Organ Prelude: Toccata in F, ..... J. S. Bach.
J. K. Paine.

Chorus: Hymn to Music, ..... V. Lachner.
Orpheus Musical Society, and other German Clubs.

Prayer by Rev. James Walker, D. D.

Overture: "Magic Flute," ..... Mozart.

Address by Professor Agassiz.

Symphony, No. 7, Introduction and Allegro, ..... Beethoven.

(a). Chorus of Priests: "O Isis and Osiris," with Orchestra, from Mozart's "Magic Flute."

"The splendor of the sun scatters the gloom of night. Soon feels the noble youth new life. Soon will he be wholly dedicated to the service of Truth. His spirit is bold, his heart is pure," &c.

(b). Part Song: "Wenn Gott will rechte Günst' erweisen,"

Mendelssohn.

"To whom God special favor grants.

Him sends he out into the wide world,

Shows him the wonders of creation

In mountain and forest, stream and field," &c.

Orpheus and other German Clubs.

Many in that audience, hearing that Overture and Symphony movement in an atmosphere of kindred great thoughts, felt their beauty and their meaning as they would not perhaps in other circumstances. The Orchestra, conducted by Zerrahn, played finely. Bach's Organ Toccata, at once intricate and full of a rejoicing, lusty life and enterprise, was no less true to the scientific thought and key-note of the hour, the pursuit of unity through infinite variety.

The pieces by the German Clubs, some 80 voices, were sung with fine effect. The first, the "Hymn to Music," had no special application, but was a rich and manly piece of harmony, which also helped to set the right tone. Unfortunately the Priesterchor, that solemn, noble strain of Mozart, the consecration of "the noble youth" to the "service of truth," could not be sung for want of parts; but the short, serious strain to Goethe's lines, "Unter allen Gipfeln ist Ruh," by Lenz, which was given in place of it, was so beautiful that the audience were hardly satisfied to hear it only once. The Mendelssohn part-song came very fitly at the end, in allusion to the project of a "Humboldt scholarship."

Our German fellow citizens had their own peculiarly German celebration, with an address by Mr. Karl Heinzen, in the same Hall, in the evening. This was the music:—

Organ: Grand Fugue in E minor, Handel, Mr. H. P. Chelius; Jubel-Ouverture, C. M. Von Weber, Orchestra; Hymne an die Musik, Lachner, Chorus; Volkslied: Fuerstenlob auf der Wartburg, Liszt, Orchestra; Wanderers Nachtlid, Lenz; Der frohe Wandermann, Mendelssohn, Chorus; Triumph-zug ant der Oper "Conradin," F. Hiller, Orchestra.

Organ Playing: Its Uses and Abuses.

(Conclusion of Mr. J. P. Morgan's Paper.)

II.

We now turn our attention to the other, more important, use of the organ.

ORGAN PLAYING AS A PART OF DIVINE SERVICE.

Surely no one will deny that here much which we have said in speaking of its use as a concert instrument applies with greater force.

Here the powers of this majestic instrument are to be employed in assisting us to bring most fitly our offerings of prayer and praise to our Maker,—to beautify the services of God's house by presenting and contemplating in his presence the best and purest results of the use of his gift to man, of the power to create and the soul to feel music. Who can doubt that the music, like the architecture, of God's house should be such, and such only, as shall most fitly lead our souls away from all that is impure, from all which can remind us of the selfishness and vanity of man, to Him who is the author of all our gifts and to whom our account of their use or abuse shall be rendered?

What can, then, be more foolish and impious than to abuse our responsible position as organists by a vain exhibition of ourselves and our accomplishments, to introduce a mere show of gymnastic feats to excite the wonder of our foolish fellow men? God forbid that we should do this knowingly, but many of us do it thoughtlessly and in ignorance.

What should, then, be the character of organ playing as a part of divine service?

We answer: It should be the utterance of dignified, pure musical thought. Grandeur is in place; delicate and elaborate beauty is in place; these are fit offerings to bring, and the contemplation of them and a full entrance into their spirit is calculated to prepare the mind for participation in the exercises befitting the hour of worship. This is the reason why so much of the music of Bach is, beyond all other, appropriate for the church.

Many object to fugues as voluntaries, because they say the people do not understand their construction and hence cannot be impressed by them. Neither do people understand the construction of the simplest melody, song, or chorul. People do not understand the construction of a Gothic cathedral, of a painting or any work of art, without having first become familiar with it and studied it,—and yet they are impressed, if it be really grand or beautiful.

A great fugue is the embodiment and expression of the very essence of musical truth. In it a simple, noble idea is brought to the most complete development, as regards form and accompaniment, known to art. Simplicity and purity are its essential elements. It is thoughtful, forcible, and often majestic, by virtue of its very nature as fugue. It is the most highly-wrought dramatic form conceivable, on account of the individuality necessarily preserved by each of the voices engaged in the discussion of the theme; and, if it be rightly performed, is impressive to him who is musically susceptible, whether he be an educated musician or not, provided it is not so strange to him as not to be listened to with thoughtful attention. It is this very lack of frequent hearing, of familiarity, which is the cause of the unsatisfactory result of the few attempts of organists who love them, to play fugues as voluntaries.

We consider the organist unfortunate who, from a lack of capacity in his organ, or want of ability as an executant, is obliged to dispense with fugues as a part of the church service where he presides. Of course other kinds of organ music are appropriate—music of a supplicatory character, movements of a purely joyful, even ecstatically jubilant character, but never anything sentimental or frivolous.

We wish to speak lastly of a species of organ composition, playing a very important part in the church music of Germany, but almost entirely unknown in our churches. We refer to the Choral Prelude.

This is a composition based upon a choral and played as introduction to it, the choral itself being afterwards sung by the congregation, and, of course, familiar to the people generally. The prelude is frequently in the form of a trio, perhaps of a quiet, thoughtful character, with carefully contrasted registers upon the different manuals and pedal, the strains of the choral being heard at intervals brought out by some prominent register. Again, when the choral is of a joyful or majestic character, the prelude takes the form of a movement for the full organ, in which a theme from the choral is treated as subject of a fugato, or each strain in turn becomes subject for polyphonic treatment.

It is plain that such composition may assume an endless variety of forms, each having its particular beauty and fitness for especial purposes.

The great advantage of this form is that its use enables the organist to preserve much greater unity in the service than would be possible without it, and to present to the ears of the congregation elaborate organ compositions built of material so familiar that they can hardly fail of appealing to the intellect as well as the sensibility; and a great point is gained in the attempt to educate a congregation, when we succeed in inducing it to regard the music as an object of thought.

We have some chorals in common use in our churches, affording excellent material for compositions of this species, and a very attractive field, as yet almost untouched, in which organists of ability as composers may accomplish much good.

It is in this form, also, that an organist having the requisite contrapuntal knowledge can most profitably exercise himself in improvisation. If time permitted we might well say much upon this point, knowing well the predominance of an aimless, formless style of extempore playing, in which the organist often forgets even the key in which his voluntary is begun, wandering at large, oblivious of everything except, perhaps, his talent for modulation and the new chords he has learned. But we have already taxed your patience too long.

We hope that this Convention may be able to exert such an influence, by the expression of our common convictions upon these important subjects, that organists in this country may be emancipated from their too common position as slaves of vain and ignorant congregations, and, learning to respect themselves and their office as they should, make such use of the talents bestowed upon them as to glorify the Giver.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

My darling Sadie. 3. D to c. G. A. Veazie. 35

A sweet ballad in popular style, which has the peculiarity of a chorus longer than the solo part, ingeniously arranged, and which would by itself make a good quartet.

Wake us at Dawn, Mother! 3. D to c. Nish. 35

A very taking description of the sunny hours of childhood, when the whole earth seemed "a beautiful garden of flowers," and the day was not half long enough for the play-times, which left off too soon. Very good melody, and a nice chorus.

The Daisy Valley. Nish. 35

Ba, Be, Bi, Bo, Bu. " 30

Two pretty songs of different characters, the "Daisy" song being a pleasing ballad, and Ba, Be, Bi, Bo, Bu, a comic song of that innocent kind that takes so well among children. "No school should be without it," as the numerous mis-spellings amuse the juveniles hugely, while all will be ready to join in the "Ba, Be, Bi, Bo, Bu," at the end of each verse.

Listening on the hill. Smart. 30

Pleasing ballad by a good composer.

Mendelssohn's compositions are yet too recent to have gone through all the transformations which have brought out the many-sided beauties of airs of older composers. So we have, probably for the first time, an extended list of his songs, arranged for the piano alone. They are graceful and pleasing, well arranged, and proper companions for the well-known "Songs without Words."

THE FALLER STAR.—HAFSA.

A star, from his chill and glittering splendor,
Fell in the grass, warm, fragrant, green, tender.
He saw around him the flowering meadow;
Oh, how he loved its sunshine and shadow!
The herds played near him, their little bells swinging;
Pleased was he with that silvery ringing.
He saw the steed o'er the desert heath flying,
The leafy woodland beyond him lying,
The hamlet, breathing contentment unspoken,
Himself on the earth, lost, clouded, broken;
All filled him with joy, starry joys exalting,
No more cared he for his heavenly dwelling.
Glad to have fallen from his desolate splendor,
He lay at peace in the spring-grass tender!

HAFSA'S BEAUTY.—MIRZA SCHAPI.

In the public Bazaar I sang
The song of Hafsa's beauty;
Its lofty arcades loud rang
With the song of her soft-eyed beauty.

Frank and Moslem, Tartar and Kurd,
Hark's sons, at their stations fruity,
To silence were all allured,
By the song of her rose-cheeked beauty.

And the singers were listening there
To word and tone as a duty;
All over the world they bear,
Now, the praise of her perfect beauty.

Far away the close veil is flung,
That shaded thy flower-sweet beauty;
Familiar to old and young
Is the fame of thy foam-fresh beauty.

For my boldness let this atone:—
Thy bloom may become Time's booty;
But ages its charm shall own,
In the song that sings of thy beauty!

LOUISE.—LILIE.

Bright Sultana of all hearts,
Laughing, lovely Frank, Louise,
Source of soul-felt cares and smart,
Captivating young Louise!

Fiery spears the heart impale
Of each fated youth who sees her;
Yet may never cruel veil
Hide the face of sweet Louise!

Joy to Islam I have lost,
I can think but how to please her;
By a heretic passion tost
For the peerless Frank, Louise!

Though, my soul, this love should bear
These where tortures burn and freeze,—ah!
Say, would'st count that price unfair,
Could I thereby gain Louise?

Mr. Sullivan's Oratorio.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette, Sept. 9.)

Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan's oratorio, The Prodigal Son, was heard yesterday in Worcester Cathedral. Its composer's ability has now been put to the severest test, and we know with sufficient accuracy what he can do. There is some cause for congratulation in this. Mr. Sullivan has long been the hope of English music; the man whose promise for the future seemed most trustworthy. Till yesterday the musical world looked to him expectantly, and though it expects still, it is with a difference.

Mr. Sullivan could have taken no more decisive step than the composition of an oratorio. We may congratulate Mr. Sullivan upon the modesty and sound judgment displayed at the outset of his task. Looking for a subject, he took no heed of the many grand but exacting themes which must have presented themselves. The stories of patriarchs, prophets, kings and apostles were passed over in favor of the touching and life-like parable which, more familiar than any other, also excites a deeper sympathy. Mr. Sullivan has not given to the world a grand religious drama—the time for that may come with riper powers and larger experience; he has been satisfied to illustrate a simple tale of repentance and forgiveness. The limits he thus set himself were narrow, yet wide enough for work the greatest master might in one sense undertake. To what purpose Mr. Sullivan has used the opportunity we shall presently see.

The general design of The Prodigal Son resembles that of Professor Bennett's Woman of Samaria. There is very little attempt at dramatic effect, the didactic form being almost exclusively employed. Hence, though the music of the son is confined to one voice, and that of the father to another, there are, strictly speaking, no characters in the oratorio. The story is told, not enacted; while both soli and chorus are used to comment upon the various incidents described. Mr. Sullivan has chosen his words, on the whole, happily. The appropriateness of each text cannot be disputed; though, perhaps, objection might be made in certain cases where the words do not readily submit to musical treatment. Such a passage as "No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterwards it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness," must have been more trouble than it is worth, besides being too prosaic even for a didactic oratorio. There is, however, little room for such fault-finding.

It follows from the plan of the work, as well as the character of the story, that the music is essentially religious. Dealing only with such themes as sin, repentance, forgiveness, and the joy of reconciliation (the querulous "elder brother" is ignored), Mr. Sullivan, like Professor Bennett in The Woman of Samaria, had no choice but to write with sober and sustained dignity. His task was thereby made the more formidable. Variety of subject and incident, and plenty of room for "tone-painting," are the best friends of oratorio composers; securing relief to powers both creative and receptive that might otherwise tire. Not the least important feature of The Prodigal Son is the success attained without this help. Piece sedately follows piece, yet neither ear nor mind grows weary and cries for change. Giving Mr. Sullivan the praise he has thus justly earned, we must, at the same time, express a wish that he had kept the religious character of his work undiluted. In so serious a homily a description of the prodigal's revels is out of place; they should be suggested, not actually introduced. The noisy riot breaks in upon the sweet gravity of the oratorio like a coarse and vulgar intruder, whose coming is a pain which only his departure can relieve. However treated, the carouse would be open to this objection; but Mr. Sullivan has made matters worse by going to the barbaric for his chief effect. Adopting the unvarying repetition of a short phrase, which is a characteristic of eastern music, he has sacrificed much for its sake. In deference to this bit of realism he has cramped his "revel," and given additional cause for rejoicing when its one-bar theme is heard for the last time. With Mr. Sullivan's workmanship we find no fault. The idea is carried out in a strikingly clever manner, but our objection is to the idea itself.

Mr. Sullivan begins his oratorio with an orchestral movement in E flat major, of quiet and unpretending character. Its themes are independent—that is to say, they are not borrowed from subsequent numbers; and the music, chiefly in four-part harmony for strings, has no very obvious connection with the story. It is, however, extremely pleasing, and aptly prepares the ear for the suave melody given to the sopranos at the commencement of the first chorus, "There is joy in the presence of God." The latter is in D major, and to pass smoothly from the key of the introduction without offending the ear compelled a lengthy modulation. Mr. Sullivan, doubtless, had good reasons for his choice of keys, but they are not on the surface that all may see them. Having reached the chorus just named, few will trouble themselves about the way—so charming is the entire number. Adopting the Mendelssohnian form of two well-contrasted subjects, worked separately, and also more or less in combination, Mr. Sullivan, thus early in the oratorio, shows himself a master of choral effect. The ear-haunting first theme, so full of tender beauty, sets off, and, in turn, is set off by the bold "fughetto" which follows; while the coda, "They shall hunger no more," has a touching character altogether its own. After this evidence of power, the most sceptical must have faith in what is yet to come. The solo for tenor, "A certain man had two sons," affords another striking contrast. An agitated accompaniment suggests the feelings with which the prodigal asks for his "portion of goods," not less happily than the steady march of the orchestra, after a change to the tonic major, illustrates his firm belief that "every man should eat, drink, and enjoy the fruits of his labor." The effect of this solo chiefly depends upon the orchestra, and in a masterly fashion have its resources been employed. An air for bass, "My son, attend to my words," embodies the father's grave advice in answer. It is broken into several distinct portions, the chief being a beautiful cantabile, "Trust in the Lord with all thy heart," followed by a coda, "The path of the just is as a shining light," which we recognize as one of the most legitimately successful portions of the work. A recitative for soprano, "And the younger son gathered all together," introduces the "revel;" the latter in turn preceding a recitative (for contralto) and chorus, "Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning." We have already said we think the treatment of the "revel" somewhat injudicious; but nothing could be more solemn than the choral unison which in measured tones declares that all unholty joys must end. A solo for contralto, "Love not the world," belongs to the class at the head of which stands Mendelssohn's "O rest in the Lord." It is smoothly written, and aptly illustrative of the quiet, unwavering confidence expressed by the text. An agitated orchestral episode heralds the story of the famine and the prodigal's misery. In this recitative (for soprano) there are some effective touches; as, for example, when the unaccompanied vocal cadence in A minor, on the words, "And no man gave unto him," is followed by the dominant seventh, of G major, leading at once to the half-reproachful, wholly pathetic, air, "O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments." The latter is a stream of broad, pure melody, in which—for the accompaniment is simplicity itself—reliance is chiefly placed for effect. Mr. Sullivan well judged its power. The ear asks for nothing more than that flow of delicious tune. In setting the familiar words, "I will arise and go to my father," Mr. Sullivan has accomplished the greatest effort in the work; an effort so great in point of fact, that it alone would justify any belief, however sanguine, as to the composer's future. Soft arpeggios begin the movement, leading to passages of repeated quavers on the tonic pedal, which introduce the reverberation, "How many hired servants of my father have bread enough and to spare!" Then follows the resolve to arise and go home; at first quietly expressed, but gathering warmth as it proceeds, till, on the words, "Father, I have sinned," the repeated quavers of the accompaniment give way to long-sustained pianissimo chords, with a touching effect which must be heard to be appreciated. The air is still further developed, always happily, and not least so in the closing bars, where a chromatic passage of sustained notes for violoncellos, from the dominant to the seventh of the scale, set off by fitful chorals from the other instruments, is worthy of anything that has gone before. The whole number belongs to the highest order of sacred music, and as such, if there be any justice in public opinion, it will rank. In a short but weighty chorus, "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit," Mr. Sullivan makes the tenors give out the first theme of his opening chorus, accompanied by massive five-part harmony for voices and organ. The construction of this number is singular, but success justifies its form. No more purely religious music, as religious music is understood among us, was ever written. The meeting between father and son—the supreme incident of the story—is treated, we cannot but think, in a manner scarcely adequate to its importance. To this event all that preceded has led up, and from it all that comes after flows. It was reasonable, therefore, to expect that Mr. Sullivan would devote to it all his power. He assuredly has done nothing of the kind. The scene is brief and dangerously near to the commonplace. Happily, the mischief can be remedied in some such moment of inspiration as that which suggested to Mr. Sullivan the prodigal's great air. In the recitative, "Bring forth the best robe," and song, "For this my son was dead and is alive again," the composer once more has done his best. He has given vigorous expression to the father's joy, and invested his solemn aspiration, "Blessed be God who hath heard my prayer," with a devotional feeling nothing short of intense. Hardly less interesting than the air itself are the brilliant accompaniments which show conclusively enough the composer's mastery of orchestral writing. "Oh, that men would praise the Lord for His goodness," is the most elaborate chorus in the work of which it forms really the climax. A short andante maestoso leads to a canon on the major ninth for basses and sopranos, with an accompaniment of detached chords. The canon is repeated by the other parts, after which a change is made to the tonic major, and a modification of the theme appears as a canon on the fourth, for basses and sopranos, in combination with a "free" canon, also on the fourth, for tenors and altos. The number concludes with a fugue and an extended coda. We have no space for an adequate analysis of this remarkable example of the composer's science, and must be satisfied to call it remarkable in the strictest sense of the word. After long-sustained attention to Mr. Sullivan's devices and the excitement of a splendid coda, it is not easy to appreciate the smoothly flowing air for tenor, "Come ye children, hearken unto me." This, however, differs in some respects from any previous solo, and is a good example of placid devotional music. The melody is charming, but not a little of the effect produced arises from tasteful instrumentation—a branch of his art in which Mr. Sullivan's excellence has never been questioned. An unaccompanied quartet, "The Lord is nigh," calls for no special remark; but the concluding chorus, "Thou, O Lord, art our Father," while making no pretension to the importance of "Oh, that men would praise the Lord," is animated and vigorous.

There is little to say further about Mr. Sullivan's important work. Much, however, might be said about its consequences. Mr. Sullivan now occupies a very different position from that in which he stood before the production of his atrio, and he is not likely to be unmindful of able se oblige.

Wagner's "Rheingold."

The latest work of Richard Wagner has been rehearsed at Munich, and the rehearsal has led to a postponement of the production. In connection with Wagner and his vagaries we may notice that a paragraph has been going the round of the musical press of this country and America referring to a burlesque upon Das Judenthum in der Musik, at Mayence, wherein the name of the chief character is Richard Demence. The information appears to have been furnished by some French paper, since the nom de théâtre is not Demence but Walnsinnig, a parody of Wagner. As walnsinnig signifies "demented," the French informant seems to have translated it freely, and the English papers copied from the Frenchman. We mention this slight matter because at first reading it does not appear at whom the satire involved in a Richard Demence is aimed. Even when the German joke is fully explained, it is heavy and remote enough.

"Rheingold" is the prologue to the Nibelungen trilogy which the composer contemplates. Its rehearsal, which is equivalent to a first performance, occupied two hours and a half; and we gather from the account furnished by Mr. Chorley to the Athenæum from Munich, where he has been residing, and where he witnessed this rehearsal, that the production was as dreary as could well be imagined. For the occasion the orchestra of the opera house had been strengthened, especially in the harp department; it had also been sunk out of sight. Both innovations, the writer states, had a poor effect; the accompaniments sounded weak, wiry and ill-balanced, the harps no more potent than so many gnats. Much was anticipated from the scenic resources to be lavished upon "Rheingold;" but even these were inferior to what has often been witnessed in Paris, London and Berlin. Concerning the scope and purpose of the opera we leave Mr. Chorley to speak for himself.

"Das Rheingold" consists of four scenes—the first framing three swimming and singing nymphs, who caracole up and down the hill-peaks at the bottom of the Rhine, with painfully acrobatic gestures, to a gibberish of vowel sounds, recalling similar cries in the Fraust of Berlioz, and—proph pudor!—the barking dogs in M. Offenbach's Roi Barakouf! After this water-music enters the hero, to the following euphonious line—

Garstig Glatter glitsch'riger Glimmer.

The entire libretto is wrought out in language varying between such hideous cacophony as the above, and an emphatic alliteration no less remarkable, the source of the verse considered. The march of the story (which marches not) is no less singular and Wagnerian. The legend is conducted by a series of monologues, with the occasional production of bystanders who have nothing to say and do. There is small apparent reason why (Herr Wagner's courage holding out) it should not have been prolonged for some ten hours and as many scenes more! And Das Rheingold, be it recollected, is represented as only the first of a series of four Festival Performances!

It had been supposed that the "Rheingold" would reveal an entire change in Wagner's style; that it would be composed of intelligible melody. Nothing of the sort is manifested. It is fully as complicated, tortuous, rebellious, as those former productions which have rendered him the most impayable composer of the century. In lieu of original melodic phrases Wagner has appropriated in the most unblushing manner ideas from these very composers against whom his wrathful satire has been aimed.

The opening prelude on a meagre four-bar phrase may be said to produce a monotonous and flowing water-effect by its repetition and climax. There is a stately entrance for the bass voice at the second scene. The appearance of the Rhine Nymphs is announced by a phrase judiciously borrowed from Mendelssohn's "Melusine" overture. Later, in the music for the giants, Meyerbeer's resuscitation of the Nuns in "Robert," with its peculiar 9/8 rhythm, has been no less coolly appropriated by the unblushing insulter of Judaism in music. The diatonic descending scale, which marks the character of one of the giants, is noticeable in the dearth of better ideas. On the other hand, a chromatic progression ascending and descending becomes most tiresome to the ear, because of its unmeaning triteness. The perpetual use of the tremolando to support the recitatives is no less significant of poverty of resource. The vapidity and ungraciousness of the declamatory music will make itself most wearily felt by all who remember what Gluck and (perhaps a fairer comparison) Weber could make of their dialogue. I cannot but think that the orchestra is ill handled. As has been formerly observed in Herr Wagner's scores, the stringed quartet is lean, and wants the support of central sound in its tenor portion; even in his use of the harp our iconoclast is puny and ineffective as compared with Meyerbeer and Berlioz.

The performance went off very lamely: even the faithful were forced to make excuses, while the majority of amateurs, who had been attracted to Munich out of curiosity, did not attempt to disguise their opinion.

The announcement of the performance, more than once postponed, had drawn together a large and intelligent audience of dilettanti artists and critics, some from places as far a-field as London, Paris and Florence, proud to get admission to the rehearsal, and the majority, at least, disposed to believe and accept whatever the arch-image of modern German opera might vouchsafe to set before them. Curious it was to observe how the most fervent of the congregation began to shrink and look anxiously hither and thither as the "allegory" at the bottom of the Rhine was unfolded—nay, should I not rather say, enveloped in fresh mystery? There was a weak attempt at moribund enthusiasm when all was over; but this was as significantly transient as it was weak. Subsequently the faithful have made some attempt to rally in nooks and corners by the declaration, as old as theatrical defeat, that the work had been too hastily produced and unfairly treated.

All manner of excuses were sought to account for the scant appreciation of the work.

For the utter absence of anything like cordiality at the rehearsal on the part of the audience, "packed" as it was, some reason must needs be given, and Herr Richter is said to have pleaded for more rehearsal, being seconded by telegraphic instructions to that effect from Herr Wagner. The scenery was not good enough for the music, or the music did not fit the scenery, or the actors failed to act properly (where there is nothing to act), or to sing correctly music (in every scene of which a hundred false notes, more or less, would make not the slightest difference). Thus ran the excuses, after ten weeks' intense and arduous preparation! To this a peremptory refusal was returned by the Court manager of the theatre, Baron von Perfall, and, it may be presumed with the consent of Herr Wagner's "kindly friend,"—Herr Richter was, on the spot, suspended, and, to my certain knowledge, half a dozen Kapellmeisters, who had been drawn to Munich by curiosity, were tempted to assume the dangerous responsibility. All save one declined. But matters, as I left them, were at a dead lock, owing to the assumptions of Herr Wagner, who is nothing if not persecuted, or when brewing a storm.

The idea of eking out meagre music with gorgeous scenery is, if not new, at least more unfortunate than usual. The notion of a practical rainbow, up which certain of the characters should ascend is at all events novel, but even this sensation has enjoyed but a poor result.—Orchestra.

The Story of Mozart's Requiem.

BY WILLIAM POLE, F. R. S., Mus. Doc., Oxon.

The portions of the Requiem we are now considering have been well studied by German critics with a view to discover in them the traces of Mozart's hand. At the time Breitkopf and Härtel published Süßmayer's letter, they hinted at a critical comparison between these parts and Süßmayer's known compositions; and Weber, in the very article attacking the Requiem, declared that Mozart's spirit shone specially out in the parts claimed by Süßmayer; adding, it was scarcely possible for such flowers to have grown entirely in Süßmayer's garden. He instances the Sanctus, "so truly worthy of the most High," alluding to the indescribable effect produced by the entrance of the bass on the C natural in the sixth bar; also the Benedictus, so wonderfully noble and sublime, and at the same time so simple and devotional. "Are we not tempted to suspect," says he, "that among the sketches there may have been here and there some little scraps more than are acknowledge in Süßmayer's letter; such, for example, as a very little morsel of the Sanctus, or of the Benedictus, or a wee bit of paper containing the beginning of the Agnus, and so on?" Other reviewers in the Cecilia corroborated their chief's opinions, adding that Mozart's genius undoubtedly shone out through these parts, though in a different spirit to that of the other portions.

Marx,* one of the first musical critics of the age, says: "Where is there in the Requiem a single movement that does not show at least a trace of Mozart's art? Test this view by the Agnus Dei. Who can attribute to Süßmayer the violin figure, and the three phrases, Dona eis requiem? If Mozart did not write these—well! then is he who wrote them a Mozart!"

Seyfried says it is "more than probable" that Süßmayer must have found sketches of these parts.

Rochlitz, in his review of the first publication of the work, and of Süßmayer's letter, says: "That a great part of the instrumental accompaniments may belong to Süßmayer, is quite possible; but his works already known subject his assertion of an important share in the Requiem to a tolerably severe criticism." He says of the Sanctus, "A true Sanctus, full of exalted simplicity, magnificence and dignity. What mortal has more powerfully portrayed the repose and the immeasurable fullness of eternity, than is done here by the strengthened unison on the C natural, and following passage? The Benedictus is indisputably one of the most simple, agreeable, and universally captivating compositions either in the Requiem or elsewhere, on account of the easy, comprehensible, and natural melodies and harmonies which prevail throughout. It is impossible to extract separate beauties; on account of the great unity, and almost unexampled resemblance and correspondence of the separate parts, the beautiful and varied connections and combinations, saying nothing of many other excellencies, it would be necessary to bring up the whole." Regarding the Agnus Dei, he says, "This chorus also has many prominent characteristic beauties, particularly the noble, touching, and passionate expression of the prayer for eternal repose, three times repeated, in different keys, to the words, Dona eis requiem." He concludes: "After the opinions I have formerly expressed about Süßmayer, can it be supposed that I should attribute to such a composer compositions which I consider worthy of such praise as this?"

Rochlitz believes that the repetition of the first movement was an intention of Mozart's, and that if the altered introduction to it be not his, it is as he would have written it.

Mosel wonders how the Abbé Stadler could have put faith in Süßmayer's exclusive claims; and expresses his astonishment that Süßmayer could have newly composed three essential movements in such a way as to have deceived the first art connoisseurs, for forty years, into the belief that they were Mozart's work.

Zelter, Mendelssohn's master, said of the Benedictus, in his correspondence with Goethe, "The Benedictus is as excellent as it is possible to be, but the school decides it cannot be by Mozart. Süßmayer was acquainted with Mozart's school, but he had not been thoroughly initiated in it, had not practiced it in his youth, and indications of this are found here and there in the beautiful Benedictus."

Oulibicheff, whose masterly work deserves to share in the immortality of its hero, speaks strongly, fully, and repeatedly, in favor of Mozart's claim to these portions of the Requiem. He says:—

"Süßmayer claims to have composed these; we have no proof in his favor, nor have we any evidence to the contrary. And if in matters of art we had to give a judgment as in matters of civil law, we must admit his claim, as no one comes forward to dispute it with him. But criticism is not bound down to the forms of law; the true proofs of the authenticity of a master-work lie in the work itself. The traveler who boasted that he made an extraordinary leap in Rhodes, may be asked by the critics, 'Why do you not also jump as high or as far here?' I do not wish to be thought unjust to Süßmayer, but, among his many works, not one has outlived him, and he owes all his present notoriety to Weber. If he, however, as a young man, was capable of composing three movements of the Requiem which, although they stand, in certain things, below the former ones, do not contrast unfavorably, either in idea, or style, or coloring, with a score which is acknowledged to form the highest masterpiece of the greatest musical genius of all time;—if this is so, we must necessarily admit one of two things; either Süßmayer has therewith begun to be Mozart and ceased to be Süßmayer, or the spirit of the master has come down from heaven to the scholar, for the purpose of inspiring him with the conclusion of the Requiem; and in this case we must admit that this celestial visitor has never paid him more than one visit. If we must believe in one of these miracles, I prefer the latter.

"We are certain (so far as there can be a moral certainty about anything) that Süßmayer did not compose these things entirely afresh. Whether he found any written indications for the fundamental ideas in them, or whether he received them from Mozart at the piano, with verbal explanations as to the instrumentation, will now never be fully known. So much, however, is certain, that some indications must have served him as the guide to his work. I will go further, and assert that the places are easily to be discovered where the indications have been sufficient, where they were insufficient, and where they were entirely wanting.

"For example, in the Benedictus and the Agnus, Mozart's ideas were indicated with sufficient clearness to make it possible to carry out these movements to the extent originally designed. In the Sanctus, on the contrary, this was not the case, as it is only at the commencement that it promises to surpass every other Sanctus in sublimity. What solemn grandeur! We prepare to listen with our whole soul, and we strain every auditory nerve;—but in a moment all is gone by it. Who would be liberal enough to make a present of these ten bars to Süßmayer? Nobody; not even Weber. The Osanna, however, is only the beginning of a fugue, which reminds one of Handel's finest subjects, and which deserved more development, if the writer had been in a position to carry it out. Süßmayer himself has indicated where the leading-strings failed him. Where the master stops, the pupil stops also. He says: 'In order to give the work more uniformity (?) I have taken the liberty of repeating the Kyrie fugue in the words, Cum sanctis tuis.' A fine way, indeed, to give a work more unity, to conclude it with the beginning! What sensible man would be satisfied with such a miserable excuse? If he was able to compose three new movements, he would certainly have composed the fourth also. We see from all this what extraordinary care Süßmayer took to avoid doing more of his own than was absolutely necessary. He would not place himself in the position of the 'crow in peacock's feathers,' and for this the world owes him eternal gratitude."

Oulibicheff, in another place, lays great stress on the "scraps of paper," which, he insists, must have been for the unfinished portions of the Requiem, and which he concludes Mozart must have written in bed in the same manner as he was accustomed to write similar scraps in travelling. At the end of his book he returns to the subject again. In the Benedictus, he mentions the admirable and enchanting variety of the thematic ideas, instancing the passage in thirds and sixths between soprano and tenor. It is, he says, only a passage of thirds and sixths, and yet it forces from one a cry of admiration! All this, he adds, says indeed much for Süßmayer!

In the Agnus, he agrees with Marx; and, indeed, as to this movement there are no two opinions. And again he takes up the former strain:—

"How wonderful! I repeat it again! Süßmayer, who gives himself out for the author of the ten sublime bars of the Sanctus;—of the altogether admirable Benedictus;—and of the angelic, or rather divine Agnus Dei;—Süßmayer avoids developing the fugue of the Osanna, and, when he arrives at the Lux eterna he can find nothing better to do than to repeat the Requiem and Kyrie! I ask again, is not this the strongest and most striking of all imaginable moral proofs, that Süßmayer has carefully avoided introducing, in his work as composer, or rather as intelligent copyist, a single idea that did not belong to the master? In spite of the absence of material evidence as to the three last numbers of the Requiem, the Almighty has not willed that even the least reasonable doubt should lie over a work which is not only one of the finest monuments of his worship, but, under its historical teaching, one of the most shining manifestations of his Providence!"

Otto Jahn, in his great Life of Mozart, devotes much attention to this question, not only as a very competent critic himself, but taking advantage of all that had been written on the subject before him. He calls attention in the first place, to the much more copious use of the trombones through the whole of this portion of the Requiem, than in the former parts, as an evidence of a decided change; for, although these instruments were, at that time, much used by church writers in support of the voices, it was Mozart's custom to use them very sparingly. The conclusion of the Lacrymosa he praises for its grand solemnity. The Sanctus and Osanna he scarcely holds to be decisive; for he does not think that the general character of dignified magnificence, and the truly majestic point of the C natural, are sufficient to disprove Süßmayer's claim. He believes these movements to be not equal to the best of the preceding; and though there is nothing to show that Mozart could not have written them, yet it would be difficult to find certain proof that they might not have been produced by a talented and well-instructed musician like Süßmayer.

† I do not see the force of this remark. Nearly all Handel's grandest efforts are very short, as, on obvious æsthetical principles, they ought to be.

The Benedictus Jahn considers in another category, as he agrees with Zelter that the school decides against its being entirely Mozart's composition. He says:—

"The first motivo, and the idea of the several voices replying to each other, may well be Mozart's; but the working out certainly cannot be. The motion is obviously interrupted when the soprano, after the alto, again enters in the tonic; and the passage into the dominant is very lame. Still lammer, after the close of the first part, are the laborious continuance in F major, and, (instead of the development naturally expected here) the immediate return by the chord of the seventh to the first part, which is then repeated entire. Neither the design nor the execution of all this is worthy of Mozart. And further, it is hardly credible that, in the interlude, he would have copied the Et lux perpetua, from the first movement, in such a strange fashion as it is here done, without any reason for an allusion to that place."

Then he alludes to the thick and full instrumentation, which appears more closely connected here with the general design than in other movements, and which is so unlike the rest, particularly in the use of two trombones, which Mozart never used elsewhere, and which here supply the place of horns. Finally the character of the whole is not only soft and delicate, but in many places somewhat effeminate and luscious, and contrasts remarkably in this respect with the severe earnestness of the other movements, even of the Tuba mirum.

With the Agnus Dei we come, says Jahn, into a totally different region. Here we find the deep inner feeling, the noble beauty, and the individuality of invention, which we so much admire in the first portion of the Requiem. The fine, expressive flowing violin figure pervading the whole of the first period, is admirably enhanced by its harmonic treatment, to which the soft counter phrase in its peaceful motion gives a most soothing conclusion. The repetition twice over is effectively varied, and the close is brought out more prominently by a novel and beautiful turn. Everything is perfect and masterly. He has seen nothing, he adds, in Süßmayer's works which can warrant the ascription of this movement to him, and is convinced that at least the chief ideas must be Mozart's, and that Süßmayer can scarcely have had a more important hand in this than in the earlier movements.

Süßmayer's claim to the whole of this part must, he remarks, be considerably shaken if a well-grounded doubt can be thrown on any single point; but he does not venture to assert with confidence that in the Sanctus and Benedictus, Süßmayer must have availed himself of sketches by Mozart himself.

Mr. Macfarren, one of our most esteemed musical critics, and an enthusiastic admirer of Mozart, has favored me with the following communication:—

April 10th, 1869.

MY DEAR DR. POLK,—Since you ask for my views as to the intrinsic evidence of Mozart's authorship of the pieces in the Requiem claimed by Süßmayer, I offer you the following:—

Lacrymosa.—From the entry of the voices in the third bar, to their full close in the key of F, on the word "Domine," in the nineteenth, is one continuous musical idea. It seems to me utterly impossible that any man can have entered into another's incompleting thought, and carried it on in unbroken unity of phrasing and of feeling, as Süßmayer pretends to have done in this instance; and, commencing after the word "favilla," in the fourth bar, as he says, to have self-appropriated the original intention so as obviously to have fulfilled it. As well might it be assumed that any stanza of poetry had been finished by another imagination than his who conceived the first line,—that any sentence of an argument could be completed by another power of thought than his who indited the initial words. I am certain that the first seventeen bars for the voices were comprised in a single progressive thought, and that the mental process of their composition had no interruption. Whoever conceived the first four bars, then, included the next thirteen in the self same action of the mind. I think that Mozart never wrote anything more identical with his own peculiar manner than the beautiful phrase to the words, "Huic ergo parce Deus, pie Jesu. Jesu Domine." If, as I cannot doubt, this be his, so, certainly, must be the antecedent. The next bars are a repetition, for instruments only, of these last. Then follows a resumption of the opening phrase, and, with a new completion of this, the movement is rounded to its conclusion. Hence, I believe that the whole was the work of one mind, if not of one moment, which mind was Mozart's.

Sansus.—The grandeur of the opening is worthy of any one; but the stupendous effect of the high C for the basses upon the word, "pleni," with all the string instruments in unison upon the note, and the magnificent rendering of the idea in the text, are evidence of the greatest genius under happiest inspiration. I cannot believe this really sublime thought to have emanated from a man of whose many attested works not one note is remembered.

Osanna.—This might have been written by any sufficiently practised contrapuntist; but I know of no evidence that the pretended composer was a sufficiently practised contrapuntist.

Benedictus.—The beauty of the melody, and its admirable sustainment, moreover, the peculiar turn of its phrases, all indicate Mozart as the originator of this piece. The device of changing the modulation into F for the soprano, for a modulation into E flat for the tenor, when, in the second part of the movement, the melody needs modification to induce its close in the original key instead of that of the dominant, is a stroke of great mastership. The allusion to the passage with brass instruments in the Introit on the words, "et lux perpetua," may have been accidental; it may have been designed to suggest that "He who cometh" is the "perpetual light." It is a good relief in the general coloring of the piece; and, whether upon this purely technical ground, whether with such suggestive design as has been hinted, or whether by mere accident, its appearance is admirably effective, and may well betoken the work of a master-hand. Scarcely so does the half close in the key of F that ensues, with the recommencement with the bass voice in the same key. I suppose that Mozart might have made the instrumental interlude terminate with a full close, as a confirmation of the foregoing vocal cadence; and might have made the passage for the voices that brings about the return to the subject continuous of this, instead of a new beginning. This is a supposition only, and must be received as such. I am still more doubtful of Mozart's having touched the instrumentation of this piece, further than to indicate the employment of the bass in the passage to which allusion has been made. I think that he could not have sanctioned the frivolous use of the alto and tenor trombones that stands in the score, nor the duplication of the bassoons in some passages that seem to demand the delicacy of a single instrument, nor the want of symmetry which there is in the treatment of the vocal theme in F, and the recurrence of the same in B flat. The same evidence of a stranger's interference, however, is notable in the inappropriate passage for the trombone, in the "Taba mirum;" and I am disposed to think that if, as is alleged, this stands in Mozart's writing, he can only have set down the notes sketchily, to preserve the idea, intending always to transfer them to the part for some other instrument.

Agnus.—The figure for the violins, the infinite beauty of the first passage to the words, "dona eis," and the character of the whole, strongly indicate the power of Mozart throughout this piece,—strongly protest against the claim of any one but himself to its authorship.

I think that there being no complete copy of the work in his writing no more disproves Mozart's having written one, than the same fact disproves Shakespeare's authorship of Hamlet. Even the questionable orchestration in the pieces above noticed may have been a mask, purposed to screen the fraud of an impostor, who concealed or destroyed the completed autograph, in order that he might take to himself the incredible credit of having had part in the master's masterpiece. I can aver that one musician has played an unwritten piece to another, who has reminded him of the entire flow of his own thought when himself has forgotten it; Mozart may have played to Suessmayer some portions of the Requiem which he lived not to write; Suessmayer may have recollected the purport, but not all the details of these, and he may have composed when he could not remember. He may, however, be worse knave than fool, in wilfully altering what I suppose to be the points of weakness.

Faithfully yours,

G. A. Macfarren.

I have spoken with many other eminent musicians on the subject, and find generally the same opinions held as in Germany, but with perhaps an inclination to attribute a larger share to Mozart. Professor Sterndale Bennett, however, speaks strongly of the unevenness of the work, and, in particular, is disinclined to admit Mozart's hand in the "Lacrymosa."

For my own part, after an earnest endeavor with the aid of a tolerable knowledge of Mozart's music, to arrive at some discrimination between what is and what is not to be ascribed to him in these parts of the Requiem, I am content to give up the problem as insoluble.

Such is all the evidence we can bring to throw light on this interesting question. It amounts to this; that although no historical proof exists of Mozart having had any part in these portions of the Requiem, yet the fact of the scraps of music being given to Suessmayer, and his personal communications with Mozart, render it possible that the ideas of the great master may have been used therein; a supposition which the testimony of the music itself, as interpreted by the best critics, renders more than probable, if not absolutely certain.

But be this as it may, there is enough in the work, taken as a whole, to identify it as the grandest effort of the genius of this immortal composer, and to justify the emphatic designation of it with which we commenced this wonderful story, "OPUS SUMMUM VIRI SUMMI."

The Hof Theatre at Dresden.

Beautiful Dresden, famous for combining the twin charms of nature and art, has been deprived of one of its principal attractions. The Theatre is burnt down. An architectural masterpiece, and tenanted by one of the best troupes in the country, it was equally celebrated for symmetry of construction as for accomplished performances in every department of the dramatic art. Many a traveller, I dare say, on reading these lines will remember the pleasant evenings he has spent in this finished home of the Theban goddess, where all the muses in rare concord united to provide a feast for eye and soul. In a single hour all this beauty was annihilated. About noon on the 21st ult. the roof of the building was suddenly enveloped in smoke. A few moments later a lurid glow lighted up the windows of the upper story. Another few seconds and red flashes were seen flickering inside, until, with terrible simultaneousness, the glass panes were burst open, and the flames leapt forth to the sky from every aperture. Within fifteen minutes the stately pile, quiet, majestic, bearing the same solid front for so many years, was conquered by a whirl of merciless flames.

But out ran a bevy of ballet-dancers, with a number of little girls in white, youthful élèves of the theatre, surprised in the middle of a rehearsal. Out jumped from windows, or slid down ropes, artizans, scene shifters, and other employés, fearfully disturbed in their preparations for the evening's entertainment. Before all could escape, the friezes and statues round the roof began to fall from their pedestals. The deadly work proceeded with overwhelming and, it seems, unparalleled rapidity. By the time the first engine arrived on the spot the building was doomed. One after the other the different wings assumed a fiery prominence. Now it was the northern side whose sheets of liquid flame rose high above the volcanic crater formed by the rest; then the raging element shifted to the west; then the centre sent up a million sparks out of a mantling volume of dense, dull smoke. At last, if it be appropriate to speak of first and last in an occurrence which occupied little more than an hour, and to the stunned spectators appeared much less, the whole structure stood in ruddy glare, a seething cauldron of fire. As though the theatre meant to be true to the last to the purpose it had served during a short but honorable existence, there was a perfect theatrical climax in the process of destruction.

A vast crowd had assembled in the neighboring square, on the bridge, and the Brühl'sche Terrasse, to witness the awful spectacle. In its palmyest nights the house had never delighted so vast an audience inside as now gazed with mingled feelings from every possible point of view on the beautiful but terrible closing performance. The brigade, which had turned out in force, stood by, looking on impotently. There was nothing to be done but to protect the adjacent buildings. For hours during and after the conflagration the Hotel de Belle Vue—about as well known a resort of travelling humanity as Rigi Kulm, or the Grimsel Hospice,—the Catholic Church, the small popular restaurants on the banks of the river, and, above all, the Picture Gallery, with its invaluable and unreplaceable contents, were drenched with water. Fortunately the wind, which had been blowing for a fortnight, subsided on that fatal day. But for this lucky circumstance, Raphael's Sistine Madonna, Holbein's Virgin, and Vandyke's Charles I., might now exist only in copies.

At one time the prospect of preserving the Gallery appeared so precarious as to cause the best pictures to be removed from the front to the back wing. It is, or, at any rate, ought to be, unlikely that the theatre, with its multitude of inflammable stuff, will be rebuilt in its old place. By 3 o'clock the house was converted into a smouldering ruin. An empty shell, the four walls stood, enclosing waste and rubbish. From a projecting corner of the roof Riet-schel's famous group, "Orestes pursued by the Furies," looked down on the desolation below, rendering it more palpable by its own intactness. Hähnel's frieze representing the Barchantes, from an admired piece of art, was reduced to a heap of broken stones, and Weber's statue in the promenade at the back, melancholy as ever, had now a vis à vis suited to its mournful expression. With the theatre were destroyed a costly collection of mediæval arms and furniture, the gift of Royal munificence for dramatic purposes. The greater part of the side scenes and costumes, as well as the library, the scores and most of the musical instruments, not being kept in the house, remain for future use. Notwithstanding that these valuable things have been saved, the loss is estimated at a million thalers (£150,000), of which sum little more than a tenth is insured.

The accounts concerning the origin of the fire, conflicting as usual on a sudden and rapid catastrophe, seemed to leave no doubt that it might have been easily obviated, or, at any rate, more effectively contended against when once kindled. In a loft immediately above the centre chandelier some workmen were employed in preparing canvases for transportable gas-pipes. For this purpose they used a solution containing benzoin, and notwithstanding the inflammable nature of this stuff, were permitted to light pastilles to drive away the unpleasant smell. Now this was a threefold blunder. It is unwise to apply benzoin for such a purpose at all; it is equally so to put it on within the walls of a theatre; and it is an additional aggravation to permit the fire to be brought near such a combustible substance, especially in a place so liable to blaze up on the shortest notice. As to the prudence of selecting for the commission of these careless tricks the driest room in the house, exposed to the sun all day, and to the ascending heat of the chandelier a good portion of the night, we will say nothing. But it deserves to be noticed that, though the accident occurred at mid-day, and with plenty of people in the house, no one thought of turning off the gas. It was this oversight which made the case hopeless from the very outset. If it had been intended to experimentize on the velocity with which the igniting spark is capable of being communicated throughout a large structure, no better provision could have been made than to erect such a mass of wood and canvases, overlay it with a network of gas-pipes, and keeping the main pipe open, light it from the top where the draught is strongest. There seems to be a fatality about these theatres at Dresden. Several have been burnt down within the memory of man, and the present house, the finest of all, has stood only 20 years. It was the work of Semper, the most renowned German architect of the day. Until a new theatre can be built, a task of years, the performances will be given elsewhere, probably in the Riding-School or the Gewand-Haus. Dresden, deriving such advantage from strangers and travellers, less than any other town can afford to miss this prolific source of entertainment. There are 20,000 resident foreigners in the place, not to speak of the shoals of itinerants visiting the Saxon capital during six months of the year. Large enough to offer all the conveniences of a refined civilization, situate in a picturesque neighborhood, and not too expensive for residents, it has long maintained an eminent place among those German towns where the various enjoyments of life can perhaps be procured more easily than anywhere else. Compared to Berlin, which is as expensive as London, as tightly ground down to work as New York, and begins to be again as intellectually active as it was in the more stirring periods of its history—compared to this money-making, money-spending, and excited capital of Germany, Dresden is an elysium of ease, peace, and cultivated repose. In Dresden, the theatre was an institution, and the performance a rite; in Berlin the one is a speculation and the other a pastime.—Lond. Mus. World.

Handel's Acis and Galatea.

Just a century and a half ago the illustrious German composer—of whom an eminent writer, Aaron Hill, said, "The Spirit of God, which directly inspired the songs of David, and has since been concealed, has reappeared in the soul of Handel!"—composed, in 1721, this elegant and beautiful poem-in-music at the magnificent mansion of "Cannons," the ancestral seat of the English Mæcenas, the wealthy and bountiful Duke of Chandos.

Besides the liberality and patronage of genius for which this nobleman was so eminently distinguished, there is an incident in his domestic life which may interest our fair readers, and which shows that he had also a deep appreciation of the charms of the gentler sex, having taken upon himself Hymen's rosy chains no less than three times. The story of his third marriage is a romance in reality.

One day, when the generous and kind hearted Duke was absent from his home on a journey, he saw at the door of a rustic inn, where they stopped to change horses, a groom or stable helper brutally beating a young servant girl with a horsewhip.

Touched with pity for this helpless victim of barbarity, the Duke went to interpose, when he was told that interference was useless, as the groom and the girl were man and wife. Such was the state of the law at that time in this country, that husbands were permitted to beat their better halves to any extent that stopped short of death. Thank Heaven, we have changed all that! The groom, thinking he saw a chance of getting rid of his bargain, accosted the Duke with the offer that he might rescue his wife at once and forever by buying her if he thought proper, a proposal which the Duke accepted on the spur of the moment. Such sales were not then regarded in the monstrous and unnatural light in which we should now consider them. But when the bargain was struck the Duke was puzzled what to do with his new acquisition. He was not then a widower, his second Duchess being still in existence, so he sent the poor girl to school, and had her educated, and ultimately raised her to the elevated position of third Duchess of Chandos, a station in which, it is said, she comforted herself with perfect dignity. As if to remove all obstacles and scruples as to the legitimacy of her union with her noble husband, her former tyrant had previously drunk himself to death with the purchase money that had been paid for her.

It was at this nobleman's princely mansion, that "Acis and Galatea" first saw the light, in 1721, its composer being a guest there, as was also the writer of the poem, the simple hearted, gentle mannered poet Gay, who was aided in his work by other literati who also frequented there. The words of the beautiful trio, beginning, "The flocks shall leave the mountains," are by no less a writer than Pope, and the really charming lines, full of poetic grace and delicacy, "Would you gain the tender creature?" are by the poet Hughes, contributions being also levied on a work of Dryden's.

Its first regular public performance took place in 1732, and it is curious to read the announcements, and compare them with those that have so recently appeared in this year of grace 1869—the similarity is striking. Here is the opening paragraph, or what Mr. Puff, in the Critic, calls "the puff preliminary," from the Daily Post of the 2d of May, 1732:—

"We hear that the proprietors of the English opera will very shortly perform a celebrated pastoral opera, called 'Acis and Galatea,' composed by Mr. Handel, with the grand choruses and other decorations, as it was performed before his Grace, the Duke of Chandos, at Cannons. It is now in rehearsal." Four days after this was followed by the regular official announcement:—

"At the new theatre in the Haymarket, on Thursday next, the 11th of May, will be performed, in English, a pastoral opera, 'Acis and Galatea,' with all the choruses, scenes, machines, and other decorations, as performed before his Grace, the Duke of Chandos, at Cannons, being the first time it was performed in a theatrical way. The part of Acis, by Mr. Moutier, being the first time of his appearing in character on any stage; Galatea, Miss Arne."

This lady was a relative of the afterward celebrated Dr. Arne, and it was under the auspices of his father, a cabinet maker and upholsterer in King street, Covent Garden, that this enterprize at the English Opera House was conducted. The performance was postponed in consequence of it "being impossible to get ready the decorations, scenes and machines before that time," till the 17th of May, when it took place, though apparently without the sanction or approbation of the composer, and, strange as it may now seem to our strict notions of the law of copyright, close beside his own theatre, the Opera House in the Haymarket, which he then conducted. Handel, however, took up the gauntlet of rivalry which had been thrown down to him, and on the 5th of the June following, issued an announcement in the Daily Journal, to the effect that, "In the King's Theatre, in the Haymarket, on Saturday, the 10th of June, will be performed a serenata, called 'Acis and Galatea,' formerly composed by Mr. Handel, and now revised by him, with several additions, and to be performed by a greater number of the best voices and instruments. There will be no action on the stage, but the scene will represent, in a picturesque manner, a rural prospect, with rocks, groves, fountains and grottoes, among which will be disposed a chorus of nymphs and shepherds; the habits, and every other decoration, suited to the subject."

The several additions are of a nature to surprise us, and would probably provoke criticism if attempted at the present time by a manager, though then introduced by the composer of the piece, prompted doubtless by the desire to increase the attraction to his own theatre. What Handel added to the original score were several Italian airs and one chorus in Italian; and, as the leading parts of Galatea, Acis, and the giant Polyphemus were undertaken by Italian artists; Signora Strada and Signori Senesino and Montagnana, the result was the performance of the pastoral in an olla podrida of Italian and English, which must have had rather a droll effect. This masterpiece of grace and freshness in musical composition does not seem to have hit the English taste on its first production, since it was only performed four times in that, and the same number in the following season.

We must pass over succeeding revivals, with the exception of one that took place in 1739, when Handel returned to the simplicity of his English version, and which is further remarkable as being the occasion when he added to the original work the delicious chorus, "Happy, happy, we;" and the later one of a century after, when the eminent tragedian and accomplished scholar, William Charles Macready, placed it with all the luxury of scenic and stage embellishment upon the Drury Lane stage. To come to the last production of this beautiful pastoral opera by Mr. George Vining, on the occasion of the reopening of the Princess's, on the 2d of August, 1869 and which, produced on the model of that of 1842, may be justly described as a perfect combination of the most exquisite music, admirably illustrated by the perfection and classic correctness of the scenic and stage accessories.

The scenes, which are all copied from the original designs of Clarkson Stanfield, are beautiful to a degree; in particular the opening one of the rolling wave which, now dashing in foaming billows, now gently rippling over the smooth sands, bears the sea nymph Galatea in her shell on its sparkling bosom.

The story is short as it is simple. The scene is laid on the coast of Sicily. Galatea, a beautiful Nereid, occasionally visits the shore to disport with her nymphs. Under the influence of Cupid she falls deeply in love with Acis, a shepherd youth, who returns her passion; but their happiness is interrupted by the giant Polyphemus, a hideous Cyclops, who also becomes enamored of the charms of the beautiful sea nymph and longs to make her his own. Fired with rage and jealousy at her refusal of his loathed caresses, he causes the instant death of his hated rival by hurling a huge rock upon him which crushes him to death. Galatea, after bitterly mourning her lost love, resolves to exert her supernatural powers, and by means of these Acis is turned into a river god.

This simple mythological story Handel has enriched with some of the choicest effusions of his divine genius. The beautiful chorus of vinegatherers, that opens scene 2, "Oh, the pleasures of the plains," as well as the fine "Wretched lovers! fate has passed," in which the affrighted shepherds announce the approach of the dreaded monster Polyphemus, are, each in their separate way, models of beautiful writing. The last is highly dramatic, and it is only fair to add, is rendered in truly admirable style by the well-trained chorus at the Princess's. Among the most exquisite of the morceaux are the two soli for the soprano Galatea, "Hush! ye pretty, warbling-choir," with its fine recitative, "Ye verdant plains," and the florid but melodious finale, "Heart, the seat of soft delight." The duet between Acis and Galatea, "Happy, happy, happy, we!" is a gem of pure melody, as is the air for Acis, "Love in her eyes sits playing," and that for Damon, "Would you gain the tender creature?"

Much of the music, in particular the famous scena for Polyphemus, "Oh, ruddier than the cherry!" a truly noble composition, has been long made familiar to the public through the medium of the concert room, but among the present generation there must exist a large proportion who have never had an opportunity of witnessing in its entirety this charming composition of one of the mightiest composers of any age.

BREMEN.—The Stadt theatre re-opened with Beethoven's Fidelio.

COBURG.—On the 1st October, Herr Hofmann's comic one-act opera, Cartouche, was to be produced at the Ducal Theatre.

DARMSTADT.—Die Vestalin, by Spontini, has been revived with considerable splendor and some success.

WORCESTER FESTIVAL.—A correspondent of the London Musical World, in summing up, describes some of the curious features of the "Festival of the Three Choirs," as follows:

Apart from Mr. Sullivan's oratorio little in the doings at Worcester called for criticism. The managers were satisfied with one novelty, and determined upon making the rest of their programme safe. With Elijah for Tuesday, a selection from Judas Maccabaeus (along with the Prodigal Son) for Wednesday, Rossini's Mass and the Lobgesang for Thursday, and the Messiah for Friday, they carried out their purpose well. At the evening concerts even greater precautions were taken. Mr. Barnett's Ancient Mariner, the Walpurgis Night, and the comprehensive assortment of odds and ends, ranging from Beethoven's eighth symphony to a song by Blumenthal (all more or less familiar), had exclusive possession of the programme. The result was crowded audiences, larger in the aggregate even, than those which, in 1866, protested against Earl Dudley's attempt to stop the Festival from being held. As the noble Lord is still in opposition, he may once more have helped towards success; but the chief influence, apart from the music, was that of the Cathedral. The fine old edifice, restored sufficiently to attract by its beauty, and not so much as to prevent choir and transepts from being available for the audience, as well as nave and aisles, had no mean share in drawing crowds to the Festival performances day after day. So much cannot be said for the College Hall, in which ancient but extremely inconvenient building the secular concerts were held. The audiences could have given no more convincing proof of a love for operatic airs, than their submission to the crowding and the heat entailed by hearing them. As for the artists, they were even in worse plight. If it was found impossible to remain in a small unventilated den set apart for their use, the Chapter House (which gem of Norman architecture has lately been restored) was available, but only after encountering the chill draughts of the cloisters. Worcester has the best Cathedral for Festival purposes of the three sister towns; and it ought to set about building a concert-room forthwith. We observe that suitable provision can be made for "the great MacLagan" and other music-hall luminaries; why not for high as well as low art?

There is reason to fear that the people of Worcester care very little about their Festival. At any rate, if they care much, their method of showing it is not demonstrative. Worcester in Festival time is not even Worcester en fête. One flag on the top of a steeple, and five or six from as many bedroom windows, represented last week the rejoicings of the citizens, who had seemingly directed all their energies to the exhibition of wares. We should like to know the proportion of townsfolk to strangers in the Festival audiences. Judging from the influx of the latter by rail and road, and the devotion to business of the former, it must have been small indeed. But let us not harshly judge the Worcesters. Their Mayor gave a breakfast on Tuesday morning in his official capacity, and that may have been the chosen outlet of the town's enthusiasm. The hospitality was certainly uncommon. Of eight hundred invited guests more than four hundred accepted, including county magnates, cathedral clergy, distinguished strangers, and famous artists. There was much speaking, and a little singing; "Mr. Arthur Sullivan," says a local paper, "led the National Anthem with a fine voice." (1) The Mayor of Worcester toasted the Mayor of Gloucester, the Dean of Worcester toasted his Worship in the chair, and a good deal of mutual laudation took place. Nobody, however, seems to have thought about the artists, whose healths were of by far the greatest consequence at the moment, especially as they had to proceed directly from feasting to singing. All else save this breakfast was tame and spiritless, including the procession from the Guildhall to the Cathedral, in which however, the splendor of the city officials had an imposing effect. A greater number of big men in robes carried mysterious symbols than we recollect ever seeing out of an Odd Fellows' show. But the spectators were not more puzzled at this than the big men seem to have been by the Cathedral proceedings. One of them, after taking his seat and looking at the orchestra with astonishment, buried his head in his hat as a preliminary of what he evidently thought a peculiar kind of service. The idea of service in some form or other pervaded the listeners at each concert, if we may judge by the little provocation on which they rose to their feet. In this respect the Messe Solennelle was a prolific source of confusion. All stood through the first movement of the "Credo," but half sat down while Mlle. Tietjens sang the touching "Crucifixus," and rising and falling went on till the last notes of the "et vitam" were heard. Such are the results of George III.'s half-involuntary homage to the "Hallelujah." Some arrangement is needed in the matter, for if worship must join itself to pleasure the union should be regulated by accepted forms.

There were two classes among the Festival audiences which, for different reasons, are worthy of special notice. Both were to be seen in a state of chronic restlessness, wandering hither and thither with the vaguest of purposes. They differed, however, by doing so, the one with supreme self-satisfaction, the other with unconcealed discontent. The former wore rosettes and were called stewards; badge and title together giving the prerogative of fussiness. Experience more and more confirms the idea that no sooner does a worthy gentleman adorn himself with the Festival ribbon than he sees something wrong at the opposite extremity of the Cathedral which requires his immediate attention, and which is never set right. As there are a great number of stewards the confusion they create may be imagined. It would, however, be hard to interfere with them, so much do they enjoy themselves; and this pleasure is all they get for the risk of undertaking to make good a possible deficiency. The other class of wanderers are the representatives of the press, who are turned loose into the Cathedral, with perfect liberty to stand wherever they can find room. That the managers wish to be courteous towards the gentlemen who report the proceedings of the Festival, we have not the smallest doubt; and it is very likely they consider a roving ticket the highest of privileges. The notion that liberty to walk everywhere (with a right to sit nowhere) is connected with the freedom of the press seems to have got into their heads, and they act upon it most carefully. A musical critic in motion or propping himself up in a corner is unsatisfactory. Seated, he is likely to have half a dozen stewards beat down and sweep him away.

When writing upon these Three-Choir Festivals it is hard to refrain from making a contrast between what they are now and what they were more than a century ago. Year by year the public is told of their founder, Dr. Bisse, and his humble beginning of that which is now a great musical institution. Without discussing either the Doctor or his work, we may point out the very few features of the past retained by the present. There is the special service which inaugurates the proceedings, and at which the "Three Choirs" are still presumed to assist. This was, in the beginning, all the Festival; it is now of lessening importance, chiefly because no pains are taken with the music. The "choirs" do their work, if possible, even in a more perfunctory manner than on common occasions, and it would be far better to have an ordinary service rather than one which makes disappointment inevitable. Another relic of past days is the organist-conductor, a curious hybrid to be seen nowhere else. When conductors sat at the organ, the predecessors of Messrs. Done, Smith and Wesley were in their right places; but now that the bâton, an instrument even more powerful for evil than for good, has come into fashion, and its wielder is expected to be the prompter and animating spirit of those under him, the gentlemen we have named occupy a position fairly entitling them to pity. They do their best, but their best is sometimes fruitful of harm. Happily the orchestra proves equal to most emergencies, and the spectacle of band and chorus running away with their chief is no uncommon episode at the Three Choir Festivals. We do not join in the cry for a London conductor, because it is sufficiently obvious that the change would be fatal. Remove the local organist from his post and local interest in the affair would want its chief stimulus.

BADEN.—A unique operatic performance was given, a short time since, at Madame Viardot's villa. The opera was Le dernier des Sorciers; the performers being Madame Viardot, who composed the music; M. Turgeneff, who wrote the book; Madame Viardot's fair pupils, and Madame Viardot's son, a young gentleman of fourteen. The only man's part, that of the old sorcerer, was sustained by M. Turgeneff. As, however, he cannot sing, the vocal music belonging to the part was sung behind the scenes by Herr von Milde, from Weimar, M. Turgeneff making the corresponding gestures upon the stage, nay, upon the execution of roulades, opening his mouth and fetching breath as though he were really singing.

MUNICH.—It appears that Herr von Perfall gave his Majesty of Bavaria to understand that he must make up his mind to see Herr R. Wagner's influence summarily terminated, or to accept his (Herr von Perfall's) resignation. His Bavarian Majesty chose the former alternative.

Concert Review.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB have gone! They set out on their western tour last Monday, only to return with Summer, for we have no Spring. They took their leave most gracefully and feelingly by giving us their only concert here this season, last Saturday evening, in the Chickering Hall, the wonted place, redolent with the aroma of their music for so many years. Of course the room was filled, and by those most in sympathy, and longest, with classical chamber music of the kind which these men have interpreted among us winter after winter now for twenty years. These! We mean the Club; of the original members only WULF FRIES, and THOMAS RYAN still have part in it. That concert brought out many old faces, pleasant indeed to see, who were among the faithful from the first; they came to renew their youth in the old and still live strains which lifted them out of the prosy commonplace of life so many years ago. Nor were they disappointed. The concert must have realized to all, the hope with which they went to it.

Was it only that the moral and subjective conditions were so favoring; that it happened just to meet our mood and take us just when we most needed it; that the occasion rendered the hearer more impressible and clairvoyant to the masterworks than usual? or did they really sound better than they ever did to us before? Did the Club really play better than their wont, feeling so sure of sympathy, and wishing to leave a very significant somewhat of themselves behind? At any rate it seemed so to us. The compositions hardly ever came to us so clearly, so full of nerve and delicacy; never have they seemed more fresh and new-created. The tones of FRIES's 'Cello were richer, sweeter, nobler than ever—so it seemed,—and it was hard to part with them. And SCHULTZE's leading violin lacked not a like tantalizing eloquence. The "middle parts" never sounded quite so warm and full of feeling.

The three works performed by the Club were of the noblest in themselves, and identified with the best moments in its history. For the opening, they gave the first of Beethoven's "Rasoumowsky" Quartets, (Op. 59, in F), with its noble Allegro led in by the cello melody, its most imaginative and frolic Allegretto Scherzando, its melancholy, deep Adagio, and the Finale with the pert little Russian theme which it plays with so capriciously and daintily. For the close, was chosen the B-flat Quintet of Mendelssohn (op. 87), a never failing old favorite, which may be called the corner stone on which the Club began to build itself up twenty years ago. In the middle of the programme was placed the great Schumann Quintet with piano (in E flat, with the solemn march movement in the middle). Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA played the piano part with brilliant mastery, and the whole work was intensely relished.

There were choice vocal selections also. Miss JENNY BUSK, of Baltimore, who had studied long in Leipzig, and has won distinction since, the lady engaged to accompany the Club on their tour, sang the second of the Queen of the Night's Arias in the "Magic Flute," showing a pure, sweet, firm soprano, of high range enough to execute its extra high bravura passages, and singing in an intelligent, good, honest, unaffected German manner. A further display of bright and birdlike execution she gave in "The Russian Nightingale" by Alienoff. Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, with his superb basso, sang Schumann's "Two Grenadiers" about as admirably as one could wish to hear; there was nothing for it but he must repeat it.

CARLOTTA PATTI.—The four concerts given during the past week by this renowned cantatrice made a marked impression. We heard but two of them, the first and the last, but these afforded, doubtless, all the data for a fair estimate of what the whole amounted to. For our part, we had never heard Carlotta before; while she was singing in Boston in 1861 we were listening to her sister Adeline in London. We were therefore, when she came upon the stage, surprised to see her physically so lame, and in the matter of toilet so elaborately and artificially made up; the charming naturalness and simplicity of the younger sister was wanting, yet she is handsome, and has a genial, bright, and amiable expression. Her singing is, as has been commonly reported, of the florid, birdlike character,—the very perfection, so far as our memory goes, of facile, brilliant, wonderfully varied bravura execution. It gave us a new sensation, not by any means of the noblest kind, but certainly delightful for the moment. It is a pleasure to hear anything done perfectly. Her voice is of the finest quality for its peculiar work; not large of course in volume, not with a "tear" in it, but sweet, pure, vibrating with a peculiar lifelikeness, not the velvety, tame sort of sweetness or smoothness, but with a certain wild flavor which stimulates instead of acting as a soporific on the nerves. Imagine such an organ cultivated to the highest degree, imagine it performing, with wondrous ease and certainty, with every grace of light and shade, whatever can be done by flute or clarinet ("Carnival of Venice" variations, for instance); imagine it also startling the ear at times with strange impromptu (calculated) escapades,—and what more need be said? Yes, something more; this is not singing in the highest and most soulful sense in which the art of song has ever been esteemed divine. Spirituality, pathos,—lofty, impersonal, religious sentiment,—intensely personal dramatic passion,—are not among its distinguishing characteristics. In the Oratorio one could hardly think of it. In Opera its sphere would be the playful, florid, comic style, and there no doubt plenty of grace, intelligence, apogee and liveliness of all sorts would go with the voice. Nor can we deny a fair degree of just, refined expression; this appeared clearly enough in the more serious passages of the air from Linda and the duet from L'Elisir d'amore, in the Andante part of the Mozart Aria of the Queen of Night (in the "Sacred" concert), as well as in Gounod's modern sentimental melody imposed upon Bach's simply complete little Prelude. That Mlle. Patti has arch humor was apparent in her delivery of "Comin' thro' the Rye," one of the selections of her "Sacred" concert.

As to the filling out of the programme, the average both of solo talent and selections was much above that of popular "star" concerts generally. There was comparatively little trash inflicted. Next to Mlle. Patti, the pianist, Mr. THEODORE RITTER, bore away the honors. He is young, and unaffected in manner. His touch, for clearness and vitality, his art of finely distributing the accent over all parts of a phrase or passage,—in a word his phrasing, light and shade, &c., are remarkable to a degree amounting almost to originality. Nothing could be finer than his rendering of the little Gavotte, by Bach, and a couple of dashing, graceful fancies of his own ("Le Courrier" and "Tourbillon," if we remember rightly the name of the "sacred" selection). The variations in the "Kreutzer" Sonata showed him at home, too, on classical ground; yet we were astonished that one so competent should reproduce so little of the essential character and charm of Mendelssohn's "Spring Song." Mr. PRUMK is a finished, sound, true violinist, as we have known here before, and gave a good rendering of the Andante and Rondo of Mendelssohn's Concerto, the "Kreutzer" variations, several fantasias, &c. The need of an orchestra for the best hearing of both these artists was much felt; owing to out-of-town engagements of so many of our musicians, we are told, it was not possible to procure one. For other singing, Sig. RONCONI, Herr HABELMANN and Herr HERMANN, each according to his kind, contributed acceptably.

NEXT IN ORDER. The first of Mr. ERNST PERABO's four matinees, at Chickering Hall, will be on Friday next, Oct. 29, at 4 P. M. His programme opens with Beethoven's Overture, op. 124, in C ("Dedication of the House"), of which he will play a piano arrangement by E. Pauer. Miss WHITTEN follows with one of Loewe's Ballads, works which have waited too long to be known here, at least in the concert room. Then Mr. P. will play two of the Studies by Moscheles, from his best creative period. After a Schubert Song from Miss Whitten ("Le Message d'Amour"), the most formidable of all Sonatas, Beethoven's op. 106, will conclude the concert.—At the second matinee (Nov. 12) Mr. LISTEMANN will join him in the "Kreutzer Sonata."

— On the same evening, a novelty to Boston ears in the way of Orchestral music. THEODORE THOMAS, of New York, with his "Grand Orchestra, of over Fifty Performers," and a number of eminent soloists, will give then the first of his three concerts. The programmes, as we understand, will be such as we have often had reported of his New York concerts, a mingling of classical and popular, embracing several Symphonies, Overtures, &c., by the most recent of the German composers.

— The LISTEMANN QUARTET MATINEES are arranged for Nov. 24th, Dec. 8th, 23d and 29th. The party consists, as before, of the brothers LISTEMANN (1st and 2d violin), Mr. HEINDL (viola), and Mr. A. SUCK (violinello). The Quartet was so good, in its first season's trial, that now, after a year more of practice and mutual assimilation, it must be excellent. The following string Quartets will be played during the short season: Haydn, in C, op. 76, No. 3; Mozart, in D; Beethoven, in F, op. 59, No. 1—the same that we heard at the farewell of the Quintette Club; Schubert, in D minor, (posthumous); Schumann, in F, op. 41, No. 2; Raff (new man), in D minor, op. 77; and Volkmann (ditto), in E flat, op. 43. Beethoven's great B flat Trio, op. 97—we suppose with PERABO at the piano—will also have a place in one of the programmes.

— The first SYMPHONY CONCERT of the Harvard Musical Association, we need hardly remind our readers, comes week after next, on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 4. The programme was given in our last. The orchestra is larger than before, and with Listemann's violin to trace the melodic outline, and a truly rich and noble ensemble of tone, cannot fail to make the revival of Spohr's descriptive Symphony, "The Consecration of Tones," effective. Miss WHITTEN's song selections, too, are very choice. Great will be the crowd, and the only regret is that there are not heat seats for all. There has been some complaint because a third part (not "two thirds") of the seats in the Music Hall had been subscribed for privately among the members of the Association before the public sale. But it is this method which has guaranteed these concerts now for five years; without it, the concerts originally could not have been risked at all. Moreover, it ensures to real music-lovers, to the constant patrons of the higher music, a greater certainty of hearing it under the pleasant conditions of comfortable seats, near society of friends, &c., than they could have in the rough and tumble system of "first come, first served" at the window of the ticket office. It has been the wish of the members to accommodate all, impartially, who desired to partake of these rare feasts; no one has refused an applicant, whether friend or stranger, a chance in the preliminary (or guaranty) subscription, provided he applied in season and before the list had grown so large that it was purposely closed in order to allow a better chance to the public. We have not room here to explain this fully enough, but we are confident that we could satisfy "An Old Concert-Goer," who complains in Wednesday's Transcript, could we talk with him.

— Miss AUGUSTA ENDRES, daughter of the well known violinist in our orchestra, who has been taught with great care since she was seven years old, will give her first Grand Concert at the Tremont Temple, Nov. 20. She will sing the celebrated "Letter Aim," from Don Giovanni, Mozart; Il Brindisi, from Verdi's Macbeth, and the "Carnival of Venice," with its most difficult variations (a la Patti?). She will be assisted by the following distinguished artists: Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA, pianist, Mr. BERNARD LISTEMANN, violinist, Mr. J. F. RUDOLPHSEN, baritone, Mr. TH. BRECHER, solo bassoonist (his first appearance in a solo in Boston), and the full Germania Orchestra, with CARL ZERRAHN as Conductor.

ELSEWHERE. The Worcester County Musical Convention has been holding its 12th annual Festival this week, at Mechanics' Hall. The Worcester Convention seems to take the lead among others in the aspiration towards higher and nobler tasks of musical performance. There was a time when Symphony Concerts and whole Handel Oratorios had not become Convention-al. The Palladium tells us:

The Convention opened on Monday morning, with most encouraging prospects of success. The chorus was larger than at any previous opening, and all entered into the work with eagerness. The hours during the day have thus far been devoted to the study of church music, under the direction of Mr. Geo. F. Root, and the evenings to "Samson" under Mr. Zerrahn's lead. The two matinees have proved very interesting, and one is announced for each afternoon, Friday excepted. The first concert will be given to-night under the direction of Mr. Root, with a miscellaneous programme. To-morrow morning, at nine o'clock, he will give his views relating to Church Music as a part of Worship, to which he invites all clergymen. In the evening Rossini's Stabat Mater will be given with accompaniment by a select orchestra of ten pieces; including sufficient wind instruments to make it brilliant and effective; and an instrumental selection will be given by this orchestra in the miscellaneous portion of the programme. Mrs. H. M. Smith, Mrs. A. C. Munroe, and Messrs. Simpson and Whitney will sustain the solos. Friday afternoon brings the gem of the week, the always delightful Symphony Concert by the Orchestral Union; the Symphony will be Haydn's in E flat, and other choice selections will make up the programme. Friday evening closes the week with Handel's oratorio of Samson, with large chorus, and full accompaniment; a work new to a Worcester audience.

In New York, a season of three concerts of sterling works of Ecclesiastical Music,—Masses, Motets, Anthems, &c., by Palestrina, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Cherubini, Beethoven, Spohr and Mendelssohn, performed as they are written, with full orchestra—has been organized by JAMES PECK, Mus. Doc. Oxon, which promises richly to the subscribers and their friends, for they are to be strictly private, and the reporter element kept out. Some fifty of the leading citizens of New York have subscribed $100 a-piece to enable Dr. Peck to make these concerts all they should be to satisfy his own high ideal.

In Philadelphia, Mr. CARL WOLFSOHN presents a plan for a "Beethoven Society," to bring out such choral works as Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," &c. Two concerts will be given each season; but the one particular task of this first season is the study of the choruses of the Ninth Symphony, "for a fit celebration of the Master's Centennial Birthday," Dec. 17, 1870. Mr. W. also suggests the creating, out of any surplus money, of a "Beethoven Stipendium" for the musical education of students of rare musical ability but poor in means.

We had something to say of the opening of the new German organ of the First Church, and of Mr. THAYER's Organ Recitals there, but no room remains at present. We copy a description of the Organ on another page.

NEW YORK, OCT. 18.—Max Maretzek is really going to try his hand at Italian Opera this winter, although he was supposed to have retired from active service last season. From his prospectus I learn that we are to be blessed with several vocalists of more or less note, among whom will be Miss Kellogg (who made such a fiasco here last year in Rossini's "Messae Solennelle"); Miss Jenny Landsmann (formerly a fearfully crude singer); Sig. Antonucci, Sig. Ronconi, and Sig. Massimiliani. We are also promised a hearing of Mlle. Carlotta Patti, who, it would seem, is hardly capable of much acting, owing to her physical misfortune. There are also some new voices to be heard, and time will of course develop their capabilities or incapacities. The season will commence about Nov. 1, and will continue for twenty nights, with Saturday matinees. The second season (for another is projected) will open on Feb. 1, 1870. Among the new works to be produced here for the first time will be Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, and a work by Petrella (author of Ione). It is also intended that Mozart's Magic Flute shall be revived; in the latter event it will be absolutely essential to give to Mlle. Patti the part of the "Queen of Night," for I know of no one else in this country who can sing the music as it should be sung.

During the present week Mlle. Patti will give three concerts in this city. She will be assisted by Ritter, Prume, Habelmann, Hermanns (Basso) and Max Maretzek's interesting orchestra. The first series (of nine or ten concerts) was very successful, pecuniarily, and there is no reason to doubt that the second series will be ditto, if not more so.

It would seem that Adelina Patti is really coming to the United States on a professional tour. According to newspaper reports, her engagement with Strakosch extends from Sept. 1, 1871, to Sept. 1, 1872. She will receive $2,000 per night for one hundred performances; at least, so Strakosch says, but he has been known to exaggerate. The speculation will be a very ruinous one for him, if he is really to pay her any such fabulous sum. Possibly, as Mlle. Patti is a Marquise—and we Americans "dearly love a lord" and worship a title—she may draw larger audiences and at greater prices than I can now imagine possible.

You will observe that no one—in the managerial line—even suggests or hints at the re-establishment of that musical monstrosity, "opera bouffe." It is deadlier than a door-nail, and for this and other mercies may we be duly thankful!

On Saturday, Oct. 23, our Liederkreis will open their hall, which has been undergoing extensive alterations during the summer, with a concert in which the full chorus of the Society, a grand orchestra, and Miss Alide Topp will assist. I will give you a report of the same in my next communication.

The Philharmonic Society will give its first concert of the present season on Saturday evening, Nov. 27, and the first rehearsal will occur on Friday afternoon, Nov. 12.

"Truth Sometimes Sneers."

"Ripieno," in your issue of Oct. 9, says that the statement made by me (for to me he refers) at the Musical Convention, held at the Music Hall in September last, demands explanation. I heartily thank him for calling my attention to the matter, and cheerfully give such "qualification" as appears to be needed.

I had stated, and truly, that I heard at an Episcopal church the old melody of "Drink to me only with thine eyes" (words by "rare old Ben Jonson"), sung by a full choir as an anthem (so called) at an evening service. In giving words to it, I happened, by a mere accident of memory, to recall the hymn, "While shepherds watch," as fitting the measure of the melody, not intending to be understood as quoting the words used to the mis-called anthem by the choir in question; for I was so fully offended by the extreme inappropriateness of the music, as wholly to lose the words themselves, though a clerical friend has since told me that the words were a part of the Psalms of the day, which makes it all the worse. On the occasion referred to, the officiating clergyman, seemingly not en rapport with the organist, first read the words of a hymn, and, on being corrected, simply said, "The choir will now sing an anthem," the words of which, of course, he did not read.

If the parties having charge of the music of the parish "did not know it in any other connection," it only proves that the care of the music was placed in incompetent hands, and specially that the organist is not a very well read musician. The very style of the melody indicates its non-sacred origin.

I spoke of "this having been done in an Episcopal church," because it was so done, and there I heard it; but with no more idea of reflecting upon that church, than I had of reflecting upon the church at Philippi. Your sensitive friend, "Ripieno," forgets the compliment I paid to the splendid productions of Croft, Kent, Attwood, Walmisley, and the many gifted and learned writers, who had, under the influence of the church, honored the church and themselves, and benefitted the cause of true church music by their noble Anthems and Services. The very abundance and richness of their works make the modern innovations less worthy of pardon, and show all such irreverent trifling to be but little less than wicked. There is enough of true music inside the sacred fields—true music in every sense of the words, inspirations almost divine—and he who garners from outside the light, the trifling, or even the more sober, if allied and associated with unholy things, is unfit for the work he attempts, whether as an adapter or as leader of a choir.

If I had attempted to inform the Convention of the denomination of the various churches in which I had heard "Batti, batti, bel Masetto" (called in the tune book "Smyma"), or "Che farò senza Eurydice," called "Zion," I should have been compelled to quote the whole catalogue of Christian denominations, Episcopal and dissenting, for all have sinned in this matter, and my allowance of time would have been too short. I condemn this sacrilege, everywhere and always. In a work prepared for my own denomination the same wrong thing has been done, and there I find "The Bonnie Boat" and the "Battle of Roncevalles," and this same "Batti, batti," and "Che farò," the latter called "Zion," though the vicinity where Orpheus is represented as singing this song was at a very great remove from anything like Zion. And, by the way, I am sorry to see that this same "Che farò" appears to have been converted into "Zion" by Dr. Southard himself, who spoke so justly and eloquently against the adoption of such music into the church.

One of the many excuses, though they are all inadequate, for this wrong doing, is that very few persons, if any, know the music in its real origin and first use, and therefore to them it brings no offence, or unhallowed association. St. Paul says, if meat cause a brother to offend, he will eat no meat. He desires not to offend even one brother. Now I commend St. Paul's tender forbearance to all adapters and users of such music, for in every congregation one would suppose there might be at least one brother whose feelings might be wounded thereat, and in many congregations there would be very many so wounded. Let there be, in the name of religious and sacred music, no more of this.

HENRY K. OLIVER.

Another Walcker Organ in Boston.

The Transcript contained the following description of the Organ shortly before its completion:

The new German Organ, which is now being placed in the First Church, in this city (Rev. Rufus Ellis's), is rapidly approaching completeness, and will probably be publicly exhibited next week. The following description of its mechanism and its strong points and features will be read with interest, as this is the first German church organ set up in this city, in the building of which reference has been made rather to sound church-like qualities, than to concert effects, as in the Music Hall organ. We believe that the builders, the Messrs. Walcker, have achieved for this new work of theirs as signal a reputation as for their famous Music Hall instrument.

The organ has three manuals, with a compass from CC, to twice-marked f, and the pedals from CC to tenor d, which is a proper standard for pedals in organs great or small. The usual manual compass is three notes more in the upper part, but for church organs this is neither useful nor desirable. The wind is supplied by two bellows and three feeders of unusual capacity, the paramount fault of organs—want of lungs—being avoided. From these are two different pressures, for the loud and soft registers of the organ, regulated by two other very large compensation bellows—placed upon the wind canals, which are of double the usual size.

The wind chests are seven in number, and it is safe to say that no organ in this country except it be the Music Hall organ by the same builders—has wind chests that can compare—so strong and so finely finished are they in every respect. It is the action, however, which claims chief attention, for in this respect the organ is a marvel of strength and finish, and planned with geometrical regularity.

Another important and even absolutely necessary feature of this work is, that, although it is three stories in height, there are alley-ways on each story wide enough for one to walk with perfect ease to every part and pipe in the whole organ, a feature which cannot be too strongly recommended. The pipes, of which about two-thirds are metal and the other third wood, show the same artistic finish and care as the other parts of the organ; the wooden pipes being of Tannenholz, a wood resembling the finest of our hard pine or spruce. Nearly all the metal pipes are of proof tin; those in the front being of pure Cornwall tin, giving the purest tone imaginable.

The Clavaturen, or key boards, are like those of the Music Hall organ, of ivory and rosewood; and the draw stops of the same artistic grouping of colors, with the further improvement that the stops do not have to be pushed in by the player, but only touched, the response to which is instant—a desideratum in making rapid combinations. The organ has seven combination pedals, all of which are double, and some of which are sextuple in their action; only obtained in organs with the valves of Walcker's manufacture, which, with his method, can be multiplied to any extent at trifling cost, a modern improvement which all organists greatly value.

We give below the specification, not of course having room for more than an enumeration of the registers, although a more minute description would be sure to interest our musical readers, and also, we believe, prove valuable as furnishing a standard for organ purchasers, who too often are deceived by a mere list of registers, without knowing how they are, or should be made.

MANUAL I.—HAUPTWERK.

1. Principal, 16 feet; pure tin.
2. Principal, 8 feet; pure tin.
3. Hohlflöte, 8 feet; wood.
4. Gamba, 8 feet; proof tin.
5. Gedekt, 8 feet; wood.
6. Rohrflöte, 4 feet; proof tin.
7. Octave, 4 feet; proof tin.
8. Nasard, 2 2/3 feet; metal.
9. Octave, 2 feet; proof tin.
10. Mixture, 5 ranks; proof tin.
11. Trompet, 8 feet; reeds and proof tin.

MANUAL II.—SOLO ORGAN.

1. Bordun, 16 feet; wood.
2. Principal, 8 feet; proof tin.
3. Spitzflöte, 8 feet; proof tin.
4. Bordun, 8 feet; wood.
5. Salicional, 8 feet; proof tin.
6. Flute d'Amour, 4 feet; pure tin.
7. Octave, 4 feet; proof tin.
8. Flautino, 2 feet; pure tin.
9. Cornet, 4 ranks; proof tin.
10. Fagott and Clarinet, 8 feet; reeds and wood.

MANUAL III.—SWELL ORGAN.

1. Principal, 8 feet; proof tin.
2. Flöte, 8 feet; wood.
3. Lieblich Gedekt, 8 feet; wood.
4. Aeoline, 8 feet; proof tin.
5. Dolce, 8 feet; proof tin.
6. Fugara, 4 feet; proof tin.
7. Traverso Flöte, 4 feet; wood.
8. Picolo, 2 feet; proof tin.
9. Cimbel, 4 ranks; proof tin.
10. Physharmonica, 8 feet; free reeds.

PEDALS.

1. Principal, 16 feet; wood.
2. Violone, 16 feet; wood.
3. Subbass, 16 feet; wood.
4. Bombardon, 16 feet; reeds.
5. Groese Quinte, 10 2/3 feet; wood.
6. Violoncello, 8 feet; wood.
7. Octave, 8 feet; proof tin.
8. Trompet, 8 feet; reeds and proof tin.

COLLECTIV PEDALS, ETC.

1. Pedal sum Hauptwerk.
2. Pedal sum Solo Manual.
3. Meno Forte.
4. Vollen Werk.
5. Coppel sur Physharmonica.
6. Tremolo sur Physharmonica.
7. Velle Schwellung.
8. Man. 2 piano.
9. Man. 2 forte.
10. Man. 1-Rohrwerk.
11. Coppel Man. 1 and 2.
12. Coppel Man. 2 and 3.
13. Calcant.

The wind is to be furnished by a hydraulic engine of sufficient power. Already the organ has been visited by many of the leading builders, organists and musicians, and pronounced by them to be a finished masterpiece. Its mechanical perfection, and tone-promise have stimulated other churches to negotiate with the Messrs. Walckers for the construction of similar instruments, and we cannot doubt that this foreign rivalry will serve a good purpose in advancing the standard of American organ manufacture, already so well established and esteemed.

Books.

- THE PICNIC. A Cantata. By J. R. Thomas. 1.00
A pretty affair with an unpretending title, which is hardly good enough for the music, that being very pleasing. Arranged for mixed voices, but an added staff renders it equally available for three female voices. So it is just the thing for Seminars, as well as for the outside world. Incidents and Pieces are The Gathering, The Departure (Boat song), The Arrival, Swinging Song, Flower Song, Waltz Song, Laughing Glee, Shipping Song, The Storm, The Sunshine after Rain, Farewell, and Homeward Bound.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c., A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the convenience a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Praxiteles and Phryne.

A thousand silent years ago,
The starlight faint and pale
Was drawing on the sunset glow
Its soft and shadowy veil ;

When from his work the Sculptor stayed
His hand, and turned to one
Who stood beside him, half in shade,
Said, with a sigh, "'Tis done."

"Phryne, thy human lips shall pale,
The rounded limbs decay,
Nor love nor prayers can aught avail
To bid thy beauty stay ;

"But there thy smile for centuries
On marble lips shall live,—
For art can grant what love denies,
And fix the fugitive.

"Sad thought ! nor age nor death shall fade
The youth of this cold bust ;
When the quick brain and hand that made,
And thou and I, are dust !

"When all our hopes and fears are dead,
And both our hearts are cold,
And love is like a tune that's played,
And life a tale that's told ;

"This counterfeit of senseless stone,
That no sweet blush can warm,
The same enchanting look shall own,
The same enchanting form.

"And there upon that silent face
Shall unborn ages see
Perennial youth, perennial grace,
And sealed serenity.

"And strangers, when we sleep in peace,
Shall say, not quite unmoved :
So smiled upon Praxiteles
The Phryne whom he loved."

The Singing Lesson.

BY JEAN INGELow.

A nightingale made a mistake ;
She sang a few notes out of tune ;
Her heart was ready to break,
And she hid from the moon,
And wrung her claws, poor thing,
But was far too proud to speak ;
She tucked her head under her wing,
And pretended to be asleep.

A lark, arm-in-arm with a thrush,
Came sauntering up to the place :
The nightingale felt herself blush,
Though feathers hid her face ;
She knew they had heard her song,
She felt them snicker and sneer ;
She thought this life was too long,
And wished she could skip a year.

"O nightingale !" cooed a dove :
"O nightingale ! what's the use ?
You bird of beauty and love,
Why behave like a goose ?
Don't sulk away from our sight,
Like a common, contemptible fowl ;

You bird of joy and delight,
Why behave like an owl ?

"Only think of all you have done ;
Only think of all you can do ;
A false note is really fun
From such a bird as you !
Lift up your proud little crest ;
Open your musical beak ;
Other birds have to do their best,
You need only to speak."

The nightingale shyly took
Her head from under her wing,
And, giving the dove a look,
Straightway began to sing.
There was never a bird could pass ;
The night was divinely calm ;
And the people stood on the grass
To hear that wonderful psalm !

The nightingale did not care,
She only sang to the skies ;
Her song ascended there,
And there she fixed her eyes.
The people that stood below
She knew but little about ;
And this story's a moral I know,
If you'll try to find it out !

Handel's Messianic Tradition.

It is singular that the great dramatic scenes of Handel, sung by the greatest singers the world ever knew, should have passed away without tradition. History records the extraordinary impression produced night after night upon crowded audiences by the delivery of these masterpieces, and we learn that the reputation of such incomparable artists as Senesino and Farinelli, Faustina and Cuzzoni, were much enhanced by these opportunities for varied and passionate vocalization. Nothing, however, remains but the music, which, although it speaks the feelings of the human heart, and is of such vivid and marked conception as to be translatable into the language of all civilized nations, is now wanting in all record, save the paper and print that has preserved it. It is not so with Handel's Oratorio of the "Messiah." Charity has effected that which neither fashion nor art could do for his operatic compositions ; and yet Handel never experienced the gratification of hearing his Messianic songs sung by the foremost vocalists of his day. And if we are to believe Horace Walpole, he made his great religious Oratorio popular by one singer, "who had only one note in her voice," and by another who "had ne'er a one." We know he felt strongly when he wrote down his strong thoughts, and we may rest assured that it was one great labor of his life to get out all his fire and dignity, his majesty and tenderness, from the mouths and hearts of his singers. For when Carestini refused to sing his short but wonderful legato song in the opera of "Alcina," conceiving it to be totally ineffective, and ridiculously simple for so consummate an artist, Handel at once settled his objections by saying "You dog, don't I know better than you what is best for you to sing ; if you do not sing this song I will not pay you one stiver." When Mme. Cuzzoni declined to sing his great Adagio in the opera of "Otto," he seized her by the waist and swore he would throw her out of the window if she did not instantly begin. All that practice and ability, taste and refinement, could do for the expression of his music, he extracted from his executants, and the annual performance of the Oratorio for the benefit of the Brompton Hospital, and the Society of Decayed Musicians, kept up his teaching, and rendered it a memorable and unalterable tradition. But Art is not stationary, nor is it possible for two great singers to think alike or work in the same groove. The celebrated Ancient Concerts were established purposely to disseminate and preserve these special readings of the Great Master, and there was no marked innovation until the advent of Mme. Mara. The famous singer in plain chant and who would not allow anyone to be called a singer who could not properly intone a phrase of the old chant, when told of a forthcoming rival, was accustomed to say, "Oh we shall see. Can she sing six notes of the plain chant ?" Mme. Mara made the song "I know that my Redeemer liveth" a new conception to the English mind. She is said to have immortalized her own name in association with this song. Like Mrs. Siddons, she was not remarkable for tenderness, but she held a mastery over her audience by the strength and intensity of her reading. She sang of death, resurrection, judgment, perfect peace, and future felicity, in tones so rich and powerful, and with a portraiture so unaffected and yet so pre-eminent, that the new rendering was at once received as the truest expression of the words of the Arabian Patriarch, and the right interpretation of this almost inspired music.

Mme. Mara, by splendid natural faculties and immense artistic requirements, stamped a greater style upon the songs of the "Messiah" than any English singer preceding her day had been able to accomplish. The Mara interpretation continued until the appearance of Mme. Catalani, who, in giving the Christmas recitatives, overwhelmed and astonished the minds of her audience as by one tremendous blow. She gave the words, "The glory of the Lord shone round them" with the full magnificence of her wonderful delivery and prodigious quantity of tone, and then enunciated the words "And they were sore afraid," slowly, separately, and distinctly, but in a whisper so low and solemn, that the awe-stricken audience seemed at once to realize the very scene.

This remarkable vocalist carried by storm the well settled traditions of the Messianic songs, and so long as she retained her overwhelming torrent of tone, and her wondrous energy and force, the audience could not resist these influences and fully sympathized with her impulsive and impassioned interpretations. Her reading of the Christmas recitatives became a tradition, but her contemporaries, Miss Stephens, Miss M. Tree, and those who followed, such as Miss Paton, and Mme. Caradori-Allan, declined to adopt more of the Catalani readings, and one and all held to the subtle and refined school of Mme. Mara.

Miss Stephens certainly did no more, possibly less, with the songs of the "Messiah" than did Mrs. Billington, Mrs. Salmon, and Miss Corri, who each had their characteristics, but not sufficiently distinctive to constitute a speciality. Miss Stephens was for many years queen of the Oratorio and maintained her sway, not by high attributes of art, but by a purely sympathetic tone. She had no great fire, no great feeling, commendable elocution, not always correct in intonation ; but what she did was done in an elegant, appreciative, and well-bred manner. There was far more force and brilliancy, pathos and passion in the reading of Miss Paton, a singer who never failed to make her audience overlook an imperfect method, by the noble spirit and just expression she gave to all she attempted. Mme. Caradori-Allan is to be remembered for a particular neatness and an extreme finish, but she was not one to melt the heart or draw the tear. Who can forget the exquisite purity of tone, the unvarying brilliancy, and unbroken stream of Clara Novello? Unrivalled in vocal mechanism, but wanting in all the other attributes of the great artist, the liquid sweetness of her tone seemed in her to have absorbed all other feeling; and as she gave no evidence of sensibility or suffering on her own part, she excited no such emotions on the part of her auditory.

For some time past the soprano songs in the "Messiah" have been in abeyance. No new power has been brought upon them, no fresh conception, and they have been subdued somewhat below the old traditions. For the moment a bright luminary flashed over us, and in Jenny Lind was heard a significance and potency of conception and mastery which promised an eclipse of all that either Mara or Catalani had created. Jenny Lind sang the Messianic songs with surpassing power and effect, bearing witness to the truth of the principles upon which she had been taught. This lady possessed great school and great genius, and what she did was beyond imitation. The field has been long open for vocalists educated in the great school; and the difficulty has been to induce the foreign artist to study the English language sufficiently, so as to bring great artistic requirement before the English public, without being marred by improper accents and misrepresentations of words, so ordinarily heard in the Handelian singings by French and Italian artists. The great vocalist was to be heard in Covent Garden but not in Exeter Hall. The cloud has passed away, and two new stars have shed resplendent light upon the recent performance of the "Messiah" in Exeter Hall. The singing of Mme. Trebelli-Bettini in Handel's "Messiah" is of such high and substantial character as to recall the traditions of Mrs. Cibber on the performance of the oratorio in Dublin. It is recorded that so impressively did Mrs. Cibber render the aria, "He was despised," that a naughty Irish dean rose up and said, "Woman, for this be all thy sins forgiven." As there was no naughty Mrs. Cibber at Exeter Hall the other evening, so there was no naughty dean to make such a naughty speech, although there were very many present equally carried away by their feelings as was the Irish dignitary.

Mlle. Nilsson has studied her share of the Messianic songs somewhat in the same spirit as did Mme. Catalani; she possessed her own coruscations of brilliant fancy, and a decided and fully defined characteristic expression. Certain in intonation, of extraordinary felicity, her taste and judgment have full play and her impulses are so sympathetic that she overwhelms the audience and raises it to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. Her declamation of the Shepherd Recitatives revealed a determination to think for herself and to decline the hypocritical rôle of an imitator. The reading was large, and massed with a light and shade that commanded instant attention, which culminated into the most demonstrative marks of approval and delight. The audience were evidently unprepared for the rushing force with which she gave that trying and teasing aria, "Rejoice greatly;" and it is only the artist that can fully comprehend the difficulty of continuing volume of tone throughout the extended space of divisions which forms the subject-matter of this venerable bravura. The Cavatinas "Come unto Him" and "How beautiful are the feet" found a deep repose, and opened full opportunities for the sweet and delicious tones of Mlle. Nilsson's magnificent organ. The singing of the great aria "I know that my Redeemer liveth" was received with one long continued roll of acclamation, and the utmost endeavors were made to gain the encore. So great is the reverential and holy spirit of this aria it will well bear the large Andante its composer intended, and its rendering in all its full feeling, and intense faith ought to satisfy the hearer and subdue the impulse for a repetition. To give it twice is too great a strain on the powers of the vocalists, and must weaken the heightened imagination of the audience. We may hereafter touch upon the traditions of the tenor and bass songs in the "Messiah," but for the present we must forbear.—Orchestra.

Critics and the Criticized.

The following remarks, from the London Orchestra, are quite as applicable to musical as to theatrical artists and managers.

We would like, for mere curiosity's sake, to be able to determine the amount of critical laudation which should cease to have a value in the actor's or the manager's eye, by reason of excess. Would it be possible to lay the praise on too thick? Could the force of the dictionary, with all its sesquipedalian adjectives of ecstasy, be brought to bear so that the actor should say, "No, come, I don't deserve all this?" We very much doubt it. We believe that under the most fulsome flattery the mind of man could produce, an ordinary actor or actress would sit down with complacency and observe, "Really a very judicious writer, that; quite a superior sort of penetration altogether." Certainly the histrionic humor never sickens with excess of praise. We do not believe there is a player living who ever in his heart of hearts confessed that So-and-so, critic of plays, overrated his abilities in print. If such nausea were possible in the dramatic breast, the behavior from time to time of a band of ecstatic writers towards a certain young lady on the boards would provoke some mild depreciation. But it never does. Though she be invested with Helen's beauty, and Hebe's freshness, and Medea's intensity, though she be made the incarnation of the three Graces, and nine Muses, and for dramatic intellect be a Jordan, Bracegirdle, Siddons, Rachel, Ristori, all at once, it is quite right—no more than her due. We have seen such redundancy of effusive epithets lavished upon this young lady—who would do well if she were less greedy of praise and less indulged with it—that one would say she must inevitably revolt at the heaping of the adjectives. We never heard that she did revolt—except when anybody hinted that she had yet much to learn.

In contradiction to this omnivorous capacity for eulogy—the actor's as to his art, the manager's as to his enterprise—it is curious to note the excessive sensitiveness of both to the slightest form of dispraise. The sickliest encomium is not too much for their appetite: the tiniest discouragement is too huge a pill. It is as though an ostrich should choke with a peppercorn. Dispraise they consider such a very extraordinary and altogether abnormal thing, that it cannot exist consistently with truth. If you disapprove of the actor's art or the manager's policy, it follows that you must have a bad motive somewhere. You cannot possibly do so on honest grounds; you must have a prejudice, or a spite, or at all events a moral warp in some shape or other. And so self-evident is this warp to the eye of the criticized, that he thinks he has but to reproduce it in public to make everybody else see it also. Thus the manager of the Globe Theatre prefixes the announcement of the night's entertainment upon his playbill with an extract from a damaging notice which appeared in the Pull Mall Gazette named "Progress." He does so without comment, further than remarking that the public may read and judge for themselves, or words to that effect. Of course he holds that the unfairness of disapproval speaks for itself, and needs no interpretation. He never attempts to argue the matter: why should he? His position is simply this: "You say that my play is badly written and badly acted: de facto you must be an utterly unfair, prejudiced, ill-judging fellow altogether, and I have only to circulate your words to let everybody see how ill-conditioned you are." Now this unrêlé on the manager's part would be amusing if it were singular. But it is exceedingly common, and is exemplified over and over again. Indeed it may be said to form the normal attitude of any manager and any actor who receives a dressing of unusual sharpness. He never asks himself whether he possibly deserves it. That hypothesis is utterly out of the question. No; it proceeds from that bad motive on the critic's part, which is so hard to discover, but which nevertheless must exist, or disapproval could not be.

We need not advert upon the precise criticism which Mr. Sifton Parry exposes by republishing it in his playbills. Nor need we comment upon the general truthfulness, excellence, and thorough independence of the Pull Mall Gazette, which render its dramatic critiques so trenchant and sincere. We merely instance the action of the Globe manager as illustrative of the condition of mind which obtains throughout the whole dramatic profession directly a word of disapproval is recorded in print.

A Word for Wagner.

(To the Editor of the "Athenæum.")

Sir,—As one of the few London musicians who have earnestly desired to become acquainted with the operas of Richard Wagner, I ask permission, at a time when his enemies are more than usually abusive, to say a few words on the subject. A Wagner opera must be considered as a drama with musical declamation—a work consisting of music, poetry, scenery, and action. Consequently, any attempt to measure it by the same standard of criticism as is applied to purely musical works must fail. The analysis of any detached musical phrase, of any single line of poetry, as a thing for itself, is as much out of place as was the notion of the clergyman who talked of the beauty of "a bar of Beethoven." Thus the usual channels by which an operatic composer becomes known are nearly closed for Wagner. Imagine a Tuinhäuser "selection" at a promenade concert (alas! no mere supposition), a morceau de salon upon Lohengrin, the Rheingold quadrilles or the Fliegender Holländer, ground on the street-corners!

My present object is to point out that a clear understanding of a Wagner opera must be obtained from an efficient performance of the same: in default of this, the only possible alternative consists in the intelligent rendering of some entire scene at the pianoforte, the words, of course, being sung. The admission of these two points appears to me most important. Any one thoroughly conversant with musical forms up to the latest Beethoven period, and aided by some experience, may certainly comprehend a difficult score by Brahms, or Heller, without an actual performance, or the assistance of a pianoforte; but in the case of Wagner, the mind must distinctly realize and retain a train of musical and poetical thought which has never before been expressed, which may occupy half an hour in its delivery, and which becomes more clear and definite after being actually heard than can possibly be the case after being merely imagined. Those who remember the first introduction of Beethoven's works will probably admit the truth of this. Imagine an accomplished musician of those days who could read a score of Haydn or Mozart with equal ease at the writing-table or at the piano, but who had as yet no knowledge of Beethoven. Would he be competent to picture to himself that master's Missa Solemnis by merely reading it? Any work not exceeding the already-known artistic boundaries would present no difficulties to him. But the creator of what is absolutely new, must be heard in order to be distinctly realized, I repeat, therefore, that for those who have no opportunity of hearing an efficient performance, and who wish to arrive at a clear understanding of a Wagner opera, it is necessary to hear some entire scene played and sung at the pianoforte. Let pianists not possessed of the requisite brain and finger qualifications beware! The almost invariable answer of a musical critic when questioned as to his knowledge of the much dreaded music is, "Oh! I have read it." Let those who have not only read, but played, judge of the value of such "reading," and of the published criticisms which too often result from it.

I must exclude all reference to the earlier opera, Rienzi, from these remarks. I have also assumed that no one will undertake the study of Wagner's works without a thorough comprehension of the poems on which his music is founded. I have addressed myself solely to those who, having no preconceived prejudice, are really desirous of becoming acquainted with a subject which now attracts universal attention: any attempt to change the opinion of professional critics once pledged to uphold certain views, or of those (and their name is legion) who have been embittered by a recent brochure to which it would be too wide a digression here to allude, would assuredly be useless. Most warmly do I re-echo the sentiment of Mr. Chorley as expressed in last week's Athenæum—indeed, what he applies to the rehearsal of the Rheingold I would even extend to the whole Wagner question:—"never has partisanship been so unblushing and unscrupulous as on this occasion." Amen! Amen! with all my heart.

WALTER BACHE.

58, Great Russell Street, Sept. 15, 1869.

Last Words About "Das Rheingold."

Sept. 23, 1869.

Last week's Athenæum gave a new and amusing proof of the nature of the grounds on which such honest persons as how the knee to Herr Wagner claim homage for their uncouth and shapeless musical idol. The concocter of "Das Rheingold" has, in Mr. Walter Bache, found a champion more earnest than original, more peremptory than powerful or prudent. Let us look into the reason of such championship. First, Mr. Bache tells us, we "must consider a Wagner opera" as "a drama with musical declamation,—a work consisting of music, poetry, scenery and action." Ere thus bidden "to eat the look," old fashioned students like myself, I submit, had already been instructed to consider that the above-cited four elements were indispensable to every opera, whether the same was classical in the observance of unities, or romantic in its appeals to the fancy. Possibly Mr. Bache intended to say that no single element should predominate; that the scene-painter and the machinist should hold an equal place with that of the dramatist who devises the tale in poetry, of the musician who clothes it with all the garnitures of a beautiful art, subject to certain and definite laws, and that of the actors who exhibit the thoughts completed rather than nakedly expressed by the skill and science of the musician. All separation for the purpose of analysis of any of the elements aforesaid is thereby protested against by Mr. Bache. A green canvass tree is thereby asserted to be as "worthy" (to quote old grammar) as a musical phrase,—a thump on the drum as superb as any flash of genius on the part of a Pasta, a Lablache, a Malibran. Let such a fallacy pass, that we may come to a truism of its kind equally astounding. Mr. W. Bache insists that no clear understanding of the Wagnerian shows can be arrived at without the admirer, or recusant, as may be, having been present at an efficient performance of them, or the study of some entire scene at a pianoforte recital, accompanied by the voice. "By this means," continues our enthusiast, "in the case of Wagner, the mind must distinctly realize and retain a train of musical and poetical thought which has never before been expressed, which may occupy half-an-hour in its delivery, and which becomes more clear and definite after being actually heard than can possibly be the case after being merely imagined." It is certainly as well to know something about that which the hearer pretends to judge; but such an amazing concession does not help us to the solution of Mr. Bache's difficulty. Audrey's question, "Is it a true thing?" remains unanswered. Are we considering a stately edifice, —a pleasure dome of rare device, and composed of precious material, pointing upwards to the skies? or some chaotic monster not meriting the name of a building, in which every accepted law and proportion are reversed or set aside, and in which, failing gold and marble and precious stones, we are bidden to accept, by way of novelty, such rubbish as great artificers of genius have cast aside by reason of its meanness and want of worth? No reiteration of flat and pompous truisms, I am convinced, will give grace, variety, or originality to the inane and unmeaning phrases allotted to the singers in 'Das Rheingold,'—dramatic interest or poetry to its awkward and scarcely intelligible legend, told in flat or outrageous language,—nor practicability to scenic combinations ridiculous because impossible. Every condition that Mr. Walter Bache demands (including that of preliminary study of the pianoforte score) was complied with by many who attended the careful and excellent, and all but complete, presentations of 'Das Rheingold' at its rehearsal. Of course, the impression of miserable weariness made on these by bad choice of the drama, by monotony and want of significance in ideas, worse arrangement of it for music, and an absurdity of scenery, is ascribed by Mr. Bache to "preconceived prejudice," to "critical obstinacy and incompetence," and to a feeling embittered by Herr Wagner's polemical habit of exalting himself by abusing his betters (not forgetting his cant about Judaism). But Mr. Bache's assertions, unsupported by proof, will no more attract a public to the booth of a transcendental charlatan, than my impressions will destroy that which deserves to thrive and live, even as the music of the great masters has thriven and still lives on the opera stages of Germany, Italy, France, and England. There may be fits of disease and bad taste; but that which is true and real is great, and, as the adage says, "will prevail."

HENRY F. CHORLEY.

The "Concerts Ancient and Modern." (N. Y.)

MR. EDITOR:—In your short notice of a Prospectus referring to a season of Three Concerts of Ancient and Modern music, to be given by subscription in New York, during the coming winter, occurs the following remark:—"from which the reporter element is to be excluded."

As this is likely to create some misconception of the meaning of the word "reporter," it will, perhaps, not be out of place to explain, that the promoters of these Concerts are ladies and gentlemen of leisure, who desire to create, in a private way, an Art atmosphere, in which they can become acquainted with a class of compositions—sacred and secular—at present neglected by a general public, to place which before whom, dependent on the whim and caprice of that myriad headed body, would be, as it has been again and again, attended by a pecuniary failure.

I had nothing whatever to do with drawing up the Prospectus, nor am I in any way responsible for the organization or business arrangements of those Concerts. This department is, very properly, out of my hands. The Church Music Association has simply done me the honor of making me the Musical Director and Conductor of the Concerts. That important element of success or non success, as the case may be, the Committee of Management, is composed of gentlemen of wealth and influence, whose social life has been tempered and refined by education and culture, and whose action in the affair will, to a large extent, be governed by the sense of the great body of subscribers. These subscribers desire that the undertaking should be private. Ordinary newspaper criticism, then, it is obvious, would be entirely out of place.

But, as the word "reporter," as it appears in the prospectus, may be misunderstood, I would beg to state, that I understand it to mean, one employed in the simple routine of transcribing words and actions, impression and feeling, as they arise, without any attempt at the expression of an opinion, or an analysis of the subject under consideration. Ordinary news, police reports, speeches and transactions of religious and political meetings, etc., are the proper arena of reporters. With the highest respect, then, for this class of very useful gentlemen, I may be permitted to state, that it would be utterly out of place, in an association of this kind, to invite the attendance of any such person in a critical capacity. They are, therefore, I think, very properly omitted.

There is, however, another person, of a higher type,—the "writer." Him the Church Music Association will always welcome, and for him, amongst others of the Literati, I am informed, will be assigned tickets of admission. He is invariably one who has been thoroughly grounded in the elements and first principles of the art and science he professes and has been engaged to discuss; and whose judgment, nurtured by a long series of years of experience, carries with it the right of authority. Should any gentleman of this class, member of the press, honor the performance with a review of the compositions and their interpretation, it might be of the utmost service in promoting a larger comprehension of the works under study.

It is hoped, however, that all reviews would be entirely free of personal allusions to the physical beauty of any particular voice, or to the especial talent of any individual performer forming a component part of the whole organization. That the analysis may be directed rather to the construction of the composition and the ensemble produced by the combined efforts of the orchestra, soli, and chorus, all of which in concerts of this description are equally important, than addressed to individual vanity, which, as a rule, is of no advantage to art or the public. Diversity of opinion, of course, is a spur to reflection; variety of sentiment, the source of excellence; while each slight hint and kind communication will assist in accomplishing a good work. It will excite the emulation of the performers and the approbation of all.

With this explanation I take my leave, trusting that these concerts will present to the Subscribers, the Literati and the Art World of New York, not only a good general face of Musical Art, but also some of its deeper recesses. In the conscientious pursuit of this it is further hoped that the performances may win the approval of those who have initiated them, as well as the appreciation of that highly cultured audience which is to attend them.

I am Sir,

Your obedient servant,

JAMES PUGH.

MUSIC-TEACHING, ITS USES AND ABUSES. By Marie A. Brown. Music is an inspiration and an art. The inspiration thrills the soul with its swift and penetrating presence,—the art through whose perfected skill it is transmitted is only reduced by a long and careful process. This process or method is the subject of much theory and experiment, to say nothing of the empiricism which claims to have found the secret of easy and rapid acquisition through a series of leaps, instead of the slow and sure steps of a true growth in knowledge and perception. To learn is to open gradually, naturally and healthfully, to the newer and deeper understanding. To teach is to lend the helping hand, to brace the feeble steps, to stimulate the timid efforts. It is not to force, not to compel, not to urge to premature and sickly effects, but to aid the natural faculties to their natural manifestation. The true teacher takes his pupil as he finds him—taking into consideration his organization, temperament, disposition, and the capabilities which these include; finding the original bent, he does not attempt to change it; perceiving the tendency, he does not strive to counteract it, but to assist it to its characteristic expression. Thus the method is determined by the pupil, the course by the character, the expedients by the need of the case.

A good teacher has just as many methods as he has pupils—no more, no less. The groundwork of his influence lies in the sympathy which he is able to establish—the communion between himself and pupil; for without communion there is no interchange and without interchange there can be no teaching; the master's knowledge remains his own, and the pupil is none the wiser. This communion depends upon several indispensable conditions; a thoroughly good understanding and good will on the part of the pupil, and the absence of interruption. The presence of any third person during the lesson is an interruption; it breaks the accord and introduces a variety of strange and conflicting influences, besides overwhelming the pupil in that fatal self-consciousness which it is the teacher's object to put to rest. Vanity gives rise to many silly and distressing emotions; the presence of a third person always excites the vain wish to excel, or the reverse side of vanity, despair of ever doing anything well, and timidity, hesitation, and nervous excitement are the inevitable results. Competition is an unworthy motive, that should never enter the domain of art; it may do for traffic and money-making, although its results are doubtful even there; but one who aspires to be an artist should not strive to emulate any other, for his work is individual, the aspiration of his own soul and its efforts to express in original and pure utterances the wondrous consciousness that pervades its being. It bears no reference to any other, measures itself by no other standard, conforms itself to no other decree.

Music as a study requires from the pupil devotion, from the teacher earnest care. Music is harmony; we approach it through love, attraction leads us within its charmed precincts. The pupil must love music, love his work, love the composition he is studying, love his scales and studies; for if he hates them in the slightest degree, that repulsion will drive them away from his grasp, and make attainment impossible. The teacher must not allow dislike in any form to invade the pupil's mind; he must kindle interest and keep it alive by every device in his power. The teacher must not stand in the way of the pupil; he must be attentive, but never obtrusive; fully adequate to the pupil's demand, yet never arbitrary. The music given to a pupil should be very nicely adapted to his degree of advancement; if too easy, it is insipid, and excites contempt; if too difficult, it is discouraging, and if too subtle and intricate, it simply bewilders and depresses the immature mind.

Mechanical skill should be kept strictly subservient; the spirit of a composition should be its own interpreter—disclosing its own meaning, guiding to its own performance, governing alike the fingers and the instrument. Hopeless the attempt to galvanize a mechanical performance into the show of life; it is mere structure, but the life, the heart, the throbbing of emotion are not there. The teacher must ever call forth all that is noblest in the pupil, for the beautiful life is the only passport to the ideal regions of art; the talent can only become shining when illumined by the interior glory!

German Songs.

[From the "Atlantic Monthly."]

... My little book opens of itself to one song my friend sang,—that charming one of Uhland's, "The Landlady's Little Daughter." Translate it for you? No, it has been better done than I can do it, and you shall hear our friend Max Hülkenstein sing it some day. But I will tell you its story. "Three students were travelling over the Rhine." Handsome young fellows, I know they were, with little caps of three colors set on their long curls, with amber moustaches soft as the silk of Indian corn, and with great blue Teutonic eyes, and fresh, fair cheeks, with a bit of a scar, perhaps, on one. "They stopped," it says, "when they came to the landlady's sign." Of course their first question—for Rhineland roads are dusty—was for beer and wine, and next for the landlady's little daughter. And Frau Wirthin answers that her beer and wine are as good as ever, but her little daughter lies ready for the grave. And they come quietly and sadly enough into the death-chamber, where she lies in the black coffin; and the first student, who has never seen her, turns back the shroud and looks long and earnestly upon the sweet, pale face, and says: "Wert thou but living now, I would love thee from this time henceforth." And the second covers again the well-remembered features, and turns weeping away, saying: "I have loved thee long." But the third once more lifts up the veil, and kisses brow and mouth, and, with a sorrow passing tears, says:

"I have loved thee ever, I love but thee,
And thee will I love through eternity."

There was another pretty song in the dialect spoken in the Bavarian Highlands, of which the refrain ran:—

"When I come, when I come, when I once more come,
I return, my love, to thee."

It is a little Volklied, but full of the simple, direct affection of humble life, which does not trouble itself about fine phrases any more than he who sings it about fine clothes. It is true to the sentiment of the wandering trade's apprentice and the faithful plain-faced maiden who waits for him at home. But it is a capital marching-song, such a one as you can step out to with a jolly, swinging stride.

It is a strange but profitable life, that roving one of the Handwerksknecht, for he sees all that Ulysses saw, "men and cities," and he learns the best ways of doing his appointed work which anywhere are practiced. Even the German waiters travel, to study the hotel-keeping fashions of all Europe. I have met them in London coffee houses painfully acquiring the "yes sir," "arf an' arf sir," "rose-mutton 'nd 'tatoes, sir," of the London Ganymedes and exchanging their "gleich! gleich!" for the "d'reckly, sir," with which the modern Francis of Eastcheap has replaced the "anon, anon," of Falstaff's and Bardolph's time. For, my dear in the season all nations meet at the German table d'hôte, and every civilized people has its little peculiarities. And, therefore, as home-keeping waiters, like other youth, will have but homely wits, the German Kellner is found far and wide learning English in the intervals of duty out of a greasy copy of the Vicar of Wakefield.—I suppose because the good Dr. Goldsmith was also a freeman of the guild of foot-travellers; and Italian out of "I Promessi Sposi"; and French—no, my dear, though you often remind me that "Calypso, not being able to console herself after the departure of," etc., the German does not need to drink at that fountain in his maturer years; he knew all about French, except its accent, before he got out of his school boy jacket.

But you have led me into a digression, and so lost all that I had to tell you about the great tree-trunk in the heart of Vienna, which is set with nails until it is mail-clad, and into which every blacksmith's apprentice coming to Vienna must hammer a new one; and you have also lost the story one of the craft told me as we walked from Neckar-Steinach to Heidelberg. I must get back to my song-birds again. This little book, Bertha, is a collection of German songs. You see, to save room, they are printed like prose; whereas our bards always make obvisions to the eye that metrical quality which the ear might perhaps fail to find out. Economy of space versus economy of time. I have my finger on one of them, and if you will take it in a rough version. I will read it to you, it is so full of the spirit of vagabond life in the German summer time:

"A farthing and a penny
Were in this purse of mine;
The farthing went for brown-bread,
The penny went for wine."

"The maidens and the landlords
They cry, 'Alack and wee,'
The landlords when I linger,
The maidens when I go."

"My boots they hang in tatters,
My stockings they are strings,
Yet out upon the meadows
The small bird blithely sings."

"O, were there ne'er a tavern,"

("Morial," as the minstrel of Vilikins and his Dinah says.)

"I'd hide in peace at home,
And hand the rask ne' spik;
I could not drink therefrom."

This same gentleman, one would think, must have been the hero of Von Müller's capital song, of which the waivete is hardly transferable into English. (I observe all great poets say this when they have fears that their translations will not produce the required sensation.) But such as I can do you shall receive:

"Here I come out of the tavern 'all right,'
Street, thou presentest a wonderful sight;
Right hand and left hand, now this side, now that,
Street, thou'rt in liquor,—I see it, that's flat!"

"What a squint countenance, moon, hast thou got!
One eye he opens and one keeps he shut;
Clearly I see it, moon, thou must be mellow:
Shame on thee, shame on thee, jolly old fellow."

"There go the lamp-poets, which used to stand still,
Spinning around like the wheel of a mill,
Dancing and prancing to left and to right;
Seems to me everything's tipsy to-night."

"All topsy-turvy, both little and great;
Shall I go on and endanger my pate?
That were presuming. No, no, it is plain,
Better go back in the tavern again."

There are plenty more convivial songs, of all degrees of merit, from Schiller's transcendental "Punschlied" to one which I heard roared out in a Tyrolese Wirthshaus to a tune very like the infant-school song of "Children go, to and fro,

In a merry, pretty row";

of which chorus and song were principally repetitions of the words "Bairisch Bier." But there are other things to sing of besides drink. I wish somebody would take up Uhland, and, picking out a half dozen poems I could select, give them in first rate versions. I cannot do it, my love; I can sit down with my dictionary and render word for word into passable doggerel imitations; but to get the soul, "to catch the aroma of a pound of tea," so to speak, as Vivian Grey proposed to the Marquis of Carabas in making punch, is another matter. They say Capri wine loses its flavor if you take it even to Rome, and that the fragrant Steinberger should never be uncorked save upon the banks of the Rhine. So it is with these delicious little German songs; they cannot stand a sea-voyage.

There is a river-song of Uhland's. A boat gliding down a river, its passengers all strangers, and sitting silent. By and by the old forester draws from under his blouse his hunting-horn, and tries a familiar air; the wandering apprentice is moved to unscrew the head and ferrule of his staff, and takes out of that his flute; and the pretty girl, with her brown hair neatly braided,—and no ugly bonnet, we may be sure,—finds courage, after a glance or two at her blushing face in the water, to add her voice. The oarsmen catch up the choros, and the echoes join and repeat, and we may be sure the sun seems to shine out more brightly and the smooth water to break into more sparkling ripples—though the song does not say so,—and that every one is kind and friendly. Then the keel slips gently on to the smooth sandy shore, and the little company breaks up quite saddened at parting.

"Farewell, brethren, e'er shall we
In one bark together be?"

There is a rippling motion of the lines, which is very suggestive, and which the double rhymes, so abundant in German, help to cause.

There is a very wild gypsy song of Goethe's, which I often croon over, because of its chorus. I will try to remember it for you:

"In the whirl of the mist, in the deep snow,
In the wild wood, in the winter night,
I heard the wolves' long hunger-howl,
I heard the boding cry of the owl,
Wille, wau, wau, wau,
Wille, wo, wo, wo,
Wito, hu!"

"I shot one day a cat by the hedge,
Anne, the witch's old black cat
Seven wehr-wolves came in the night to me,
Each an old wife of the village was she.
Wille, wau, wau, wau, etc."

"I knew them all and I knew them well;
The Annie, the Urmel, the Bess,
The Lisa, the Barb'ra, the Eva, the Kate;
They howled in a ring around my gate
Wille, wau, wau, wau, etc."

"I named them all by their names aloud,
What wilt thou, Anne, what wilt thou, Bess?
Themselves they wriggled, themselves they shook,
And howling homeward their way they took.
Wille, wau, wau, wau,
Wille, wo, wo, wo,
Wito, hu!"

I wish I could hit as literally Goethe's sirenade. But there is an untranslatable felicity which some German poems have, of repeating, as in this one, the third line of the preceding stanza as the first of the next, and keeping the same ending for each stanza. It is like a braid of gold and silver cord, where the same thread appears again under each entwining. Rückert and Heine both do the same. And, as I mention Heine, what a vision of Germany comes to me! His two volumes which I have here on my table are a series of pictures. He seems to have set life to music; and his life opera begins with a dark tragic overture, to end in the most comic and yet the saddest of finales. Love and despair, or love and satiety; and then the mocking chorus of the "Germania" at the close. His songs are little sketches,—a lonely street, and a figure pacing before an empty house; a watcher at the street-corner looking up at lighted windows; a voyager gazing at the stormy North Sea waves; the sea beach with the mists rolling in from beyond the light-house;—a passionate investiture of all natural objects with the burning Nessus shirt of the wearer. The water-lily pining for the moon (who is masculine in German, as the sun is the triumphant representative of the woman's rights question), the moon looking up from the lake to meet the water-lily's gaze;—all nature is the victim, according to Heine, of an "unrequited," or "prior attachment." Then comes the time when nothing is too sacred for the daring muse, and then there are poems which no one of English blood ever would or could translate, being worse than atheistic.

But intermingled with these are the tenderest and loveliest of little poems, and, as I said, the most comic. When I first read his "Deutschland," I laughed till I cried over his description of his breaking down in his post-chaise in the forest, and the wolves assembling around, and the speech he makes to persuade them that he was a fellow-sympathizer with them, and had advocated the cause of the sheep only to save appearances.

I can turn, I find, to a little poem of his,—to one of his many lady-loves,—which I like very much for its simplicity, and which blends his two moods very prettily:

"My child, we both were children,
Two children blithe and gay,
When we used to creep in the hen-house
And hide ourselves in the hay."

"We cowered just as the crows caw,
To puzzle the passer-by;
Kickerkoo! they thought it
The genuine cockerel cry."

"On the big chests in our garret
Old shawls and carpets were laid;
We lived in them together,
And a famous house we made."

"The old cat of our neighbor
Came often on us to call;
We met her bows and courtesies
With complimentings and all."

"We asked after all her kindred,
Carefully naming each one,
As with many an ancient tabby
We have often since then done."

"We sat and we talked like the old folks
In a solemn head-shaking way;
Complaining that all things were better,
Far better, than now, in our day."

"That Love and Truth and Relieving
Out of the world were fled;
And coffee was so much desired,
And money so scarce, we said."

"Gone are the childish fancies;
And flying like dreams of youth
Are the World and the Times and the Money, Believing, and Love, and Truth."

If you like that,—and having been a child I think you must,—here is one more of Heine's upon a different key,—one of his melancholy love-songs, which young gentlemen, between the ages of nineteen and twenty-two, should such read the Atlantic, are requested not to omit:

"I love a flower, yet which it is I know not,
And thence there comes my pain;
And one by one each blossom eap I gaze in,
And seek a heart again."

"The flowers are fragrant to the day's declining,
The nightingale is heard;
I seek a heart as fair and fond as mine is,
A heart as deeply stirred."

"The nightingale is singing, and I listen
The mystery of her moan;
To both of us it is as lone and dreary
So dream and lone."

Sentimental enough, I dare say; but as we grow older, my dear wife, we love sentiment. It is a harmless beverage,—the eau sucrée which, when one is hot and dusty with the hard work of life, is very cooling and refreshing. Do you say I am getting prosy? For that I shall inflict another stanza on you, "The Origin of the Watch." Says Heine:

"Tell me who first the clock found out,
Parrelling hours and minutes out?
It was a shivering, sorrowful one,
Who sat and thought in the midnight lone,
And counted the steps of the knowing mouse,
And the death-watch's click in the weary house."

The antithesis to this—he who invented kisses—is not so good, so I will not translate it; but instead the little song which Heine calls "Doctrin," merely premising, my child, that the principle of Hegel's philosophy has been thus summed up: "Nothing is, but everything is going to be."

"Battle the drumsticks and never fear,
And merrily kiss the vivandière;
That is the whole of learning's sphere,
That is the big book's chiefest care."

"Drum up the people out of their sleep;
Beat the reveille with youthful arm,
Drumming and marching ever ahead;
That is the sum of learning's charm."

"That's the Hegelian philosophy,
The pith of the books both great and small;
I found it out because I am wise,
And because I'm a skilful drummer withal."

The charm of most of his little poems, however, lies partly in the deep passion poured out in them, and their exquisite little pictures of out-door life. They are like vignettes or marginal etchings, such as, if I were rich enough, I would have to a unique copy of "Hyperion" that I have devised. I don't know of anybody save Tennyson who has written such in English. For a true song is just a single thought in a rich setting. There are love-poems which may be sung, and also many other poems which suffer the same change in the sea of music; but songs they can hardly be called. Men sometimes, not often, express themselves, in moments of great feeling, lyrically; but when they simply sing, it is not because they are thinking much, but just want to let out a pleasant or tender emotion in a simple way through music. Negro melodies, real ones, are a fair example of the singing impulse. The idea is subordinated to the air. Negro melodies manufactured are utterly opposed to every true principle of song-making; are such as, except for sale, no mortal ever would dream of making. So are all Scotch songs not written by Scotchmen, and sea songs not written by sailors, convivial ditties written by young gentlemen in the Sophomore year of college, and the miscellaneous "poems" so entitled in most volumes of verse. A true song is one that will come into one's head as he walks in the woods of a pleasant day, and that runs over the lips unconsciously. He who writes one good song in his life may rest, like single-speech Hamilton, on his laurels.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, OCT. 25.—In my last letter I mentioned the coming opening of the new "Liederkrantz" Hall. On Saturday evening it took place, and a very enjoyable entertainment it proved to be. I append a programme of the concert:

- 1 Overture, Magic Flute.....Mozart.
- 2 Hymn, "To Music." [Male chorus].....Lachner.
- 3 Scherzo, B. moll. op. 81. [Miss Alide Topp].....Chopin.
- 4 Chorus from the "Creation." [Mixed Chorus and Orchestra].....Haydn.
- 5 Coronation March.....Meyerbeer.

The orchestral and vocal portions of the programme were extremely well done and reflected great credit upon the energy and care of the musical director, Herr Paur. The male chorus was emphatically the gem of the evening, and was sung in an almost faultless manner by the well-drilled voices. The shading was very fine, while the crescendos and diminuendos, accurate and even, were superb. One could easily understand why this Society took the prize at the "Saengerfest," at Baltimore, during the past summer.

After the singing of the "Hymn," Mr. William Steinway, President of the Society, delivered a short and able address, in which he alluded to the past, present and future of the Society, thanked its members for their liberal contributions, made mention of their past artistic triumphs, and then, in a few well-chosen and appropriate sentences, concluded amid warm and hearty applause.

I regret to say that Miss Topp did justice neither to herself nor to the magnificent Scherzo; she missed notes quite frequently, and altogether failed to achieve an artistic success. She was recalled, however, and then played, in rather better style. Heller's exquisite transcription of Schubert's "Die Forelle." Much allowance must be made for her, inasmuch as she played upon a Knabe piano (which was the prize won by the Society at the Baltimore "Saengerfest"), and it was unquestionably the poorest instrument I have ever heard in a respectable concert-room. It had a hard, wiry tone, and, besides, was not in tune.

At the conclusion of the concert (at about half past ten) the supper, which was sumptuous, took place; and at midnight commenced the ball which terminated somewhere among the small hours.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, which lay dormant for a time, has suddenly started up into active life, and is before the public this winter with a prospectus for the present season. The first concert will occur on Saturday evening, Nov. 13, and the musical affairs of the Society, including rehearsals, concerts, &c., will be under the direction of Carl Bergmann. I am very glad to know that our sister Society is once more upon its feet, and I most heartily wish for it a career of uninterrupted prosperity. Perhaps the experience of being without the concerts for a season may prove to be a salutary lesson to the Brooklyn people.

There have been three Patti concerts during the past week, which seem to have been quite as successful musically and peculiarly as were the initial ones. Mlle. Patti executes her wonderful roudées and cadenzas with the same ease and grace. Habelmann has not improved; Prume plays decidedly better than he did at the opening concert, and the orchestra unmistakably bad. (It has also been reduced in size). M. Ritter is an admirable artist, and his quiet, gentlemanly manner of playing is something quite stupefying to audiences hitherto accustomed to clap-trap displays and monkey tricks with the keys. The Patti troupe starts for a very extended Western tour about Nov. 1st, and will probably visit Utah and California before returning to this city.

On Thursday evening of last week Mr. John N. Pattison—described by the Sun as one of our "most brilliant amateur pianists"—was married to Miss Adelaide Morgan, daughter of D. R. Morgan, Esq., a wealthy gentleman residing on 5th Avenue. It is understood that Mr. Pattison retires from the profession.

One of our pianists (whose name I shall not mention) recently received a letter of half a dozen lines from Liszt. This letter, together with its envelope, and a photograph of the great pianist, have been framed and placed in the window of one of the most flourishing and successful music stores on Broadway. All of which pleasingly illustrates the modesty of mankind.

NEW YORK, NOV. 1.—Our Philharmonic Society has issued its prospectus, and I shall endeavor to give a synopsis of it in as little space as possible. There will be seven Symphonies: Beethoven, No. 5, C minor; Schumann, No. 2, C major; Haydn, No. — D; Spohr, F, "Weihe der Töne;" Raff, No. 2, C; Mozart, E♭; Liszt, Dante Symphony. The Overtures to be played are mostly old favorites; the only new ones will be one by Jadassohn, and another by Goldmark. Choruses will be given from Wagner's "Meister-sänger," and Liszt's "Elizabeth." In addition to these attractions, the entire "Midsummer Night's Dream" music will be performed (at the first concert), the poem being read by Mrs. Scott Siddons, while the choral accompaniment will be entrusted to the Arion Society. The solo artists already announced are S. B. Mille, Mme. Parepa-Rosa, F. Bergner, Mlle. Alide Topp, Carl Rosa, and Ole Bull. It will be remembered that Mme. Rosa was to have appeared at one of last season's concerts, but was prevented from so doing by serious illness, which detained her for many weeks in Baltimore.

The concerts will be six in number (with the usual eighteen public rehearsals) and will occur on the evenings of Nov. 27, Jan. 8, Feb. 5, March 5, April 2, May 7.

And now for the Brooklyn Society, which is now once more on its feet, with 1,000 subscribers already, and prospects of more. There will be 5 concerts (and 15 public rehearsals) on the evenings of Nov. 13, Dec. 18, Jan. 22, Feb. 26, April 9. No comprehensive prospectus has yet appeared, but I am in possession—through the courtesy of G. W. Warren, Esq., one of the most active and energetic directors—of the programme for the first concert, which is certainly a good and attractive one:

- Symphony, Eroica, No. 3.....Beethoven.
"Complainte de la Mendicante".....Meyerbeer.
Overture, "Wood Nymph".....Sterndale Bennett.
P. F. Concerto, E flat major.....Liszt.
Rondo, "Non più mesta".....Rossini.
Jubel, Overture.....Von Weber.

Maretzek's opera season will commence on Wednesday evening with "Il Trovatore." The leading roles will be taken by Mme. Briol and Sig. Lefranc, both new to us.

CHICAGO, OCT. 29. The unusual interest that attaches to the Parepa-Rosa English Opera season here makes it incumbent on me to give you some idea of what you may presently expect in Boston when the troupe shall have completed their preliminary rehearsals in New York, Chicago, Cincinnati, St. Louis, etc.

This troupe comprises, as you already know, Mme. Parepa-Rosa and Miss Hersee, chief prime donne; Mrs. Edward Seguin and Miss Fannie Stockton, contraltis; Mr. William Castle and Mr. Henry Nordbloom, tenors; Mr. Maurice de Solla, 2nd tenor, Mr. Albert Lawrence, baritone; Messrs. S. C. Campbell and Gustavus Hall, bass cantanti; Edward Seguin, buffo; and Mr. Frank Howard, basso. It will be seen that this combination is sufficiently strong to admit of effective performances in the concerted pieces, and numerous enough to allow of daily performances.

The chorus is not large (thirty or forty), but it is very spirited, accurate, not offensively bad-looking, and the parts are well balanced. The dresses are new. The orchestra comprises about thirty, and of its make-up the Tribune says:

"Rehbelin, of the New York Philharmonic, has one of the first violins. Howard Glover, who has made himself a name in song, has a second violin. Howell, of London, the successor of the great Dragonetti, is in the orchestra, playing one of the old-fashioned three-stringed instruments. Alard, the solo 'cellist, whom every one knows, is also there, and Rocco, the superb harpist, a new feature of the opera orchestras in this country, etc."

The opening was Monday night, Oct. 25th, with Wallace's Maritana, Parepa-Rosa in the title role, Castle as Don Cesar, Campbell as Don Jose, and Mrs. Seguin as Lazarillo. Parepa's singing of "The Harp in the air" was as perfect as possible, as also "Scenes that are brightest," and elicited hearty encores. The whole opera went well. The orchestra played with great reference to the proper accompaniment of the voices singing, and with a light and shade altogether new in operatic orchestras here since Anschütz was here with Grau's troupe four years ago, and this excellence is undoubtedly due to Carl Rosa's competent direction. Castle is said by all to sing far better than ever here before; his appearance on the stage is an unfailing signal for applause.

On Tuesday night Miss Rose Hersee made her debut here in the Sonnambula. This young lady is small in figure, a blonde, with a profusion of golden hair, a pleasant, sparkling manner, a clear, pure voice, mezzo-soprano, and very bird-like execution. She is young, and pretty, and apparently unaffected. I regard it as a great hit to have engaged her in this troupe; as she is so complete a contrast to Mme. Parepa in point of personal appearance as to interest an audience, however she may fall short of filling the place of the great cantratics. Her Amina was a lovely personation, not, indeed, betraying a lifelong study of stage business, but indicative of dramatic talent, and by its freshness absolutely more delightful to the audience than a performance would have been that manifested a more prolonged acquaintance with the stage. In voice she was entirely equal to the demands of the music, leaving nothing to be desired, unless one compares her to Mme. Parepa-Rosa, when one would desire for Miss Hersee a little more volume of tone in the concerted pieces. Mr. Castle gave us Elvino better than we have had it here before. Campbell was fearfully hoarse.

On Wednesday night Balfe's opera "The Puritan's Daughter" was given for the first time here, and Parepa-Rosa in the title role. Of this music space forbids to speak so fully as I could desire. It is evident, in short, that Balfe (as a rural friend remarked) "took in more ground than he could tend." The general design of the work is on the dimensions of an Italian grand opera, while Balfe's musical resources were inadequate to properly carry out his intention. Nevertheless the opening chorus is a fine one, and would be very effective for musical conventions and the like, and there are two or three male choruses that are very fine. The work abounds in recitative, and was regarded as a little tedious. I was superbly done. Castle sang a drinking song in the second act that was highly absurd, being drunk all the way through. In this, also, Mr. Gustavus Hall made his first appearance in opera here, as Charles II. He looked and sang the part well.

Thursday night "The Bohemian Girl" was given, with Miss Hersee as Arlene, and Mr. Nordblom made his debut in opera as Thaddeus. Miss Hersee made, if possible, a more favorable impression than on Tuesday night. Mr. Nordblom was, of course, green on the stage, but his voice is excellent, and he promises to become a valuable acquisition to the operatic theatre. He was deservedly encoined in "Then you'll remember me," which was sung in a manner to satisfy a critic. Mr. Hall had to undertake the Count, in place of Campbell, at short notice, and being unfamiliar with the business, was not expected to meet with great success. However, he disappointed all his friends by doing better than they had thought he could under the circumstances. If Mr. Hall would learn to enunciate words with that delicate and finished propriety that characterizes the singing of Mme. Parepa-Rosa and Miss Hersee, he would make a great advance toward artistic perfection. Campbell, also, has now and then an indistinct utterance, and a nasal tone that he would do well to mend in time. Some of the subordinate members of the troupe might also learn that twisting the body at the waist in singing, moving it at say M. M. 120, is no real assistance to expressive utterance, and simply looks ridiculous to the audience.

The audiences have been immense. The opera house is crowded every night. I have never seen the like here.

Theodore Thomas and his Orchestra.

The visit of this famous New York Orchestra has given our music lovers quite a new and quick sensation. Boston had not heard such orchestral performances before; and Boston, in the frankest humor, gave itself up to the complete enjoyment and unstinted praise of what it heard. The promise of the three concerts of last Friday, Saturday and Sunday evenings was kept to the letter. It was truly and exclusively THOMAS'S New York Orchestra,—fifty-four instruments, picked men, most of them young, all of them artists, all looking as if thoroughly engaged in their work, eager above all things to make the music altogether sound as well as possible. And it was evident, from first to last, that they had perfect understanding with their leader and each other; that they were in admirable discipline, had played together very often and for years; and that they had been selected, with a determined eye to superiority in every part, in a community where good musicians are so numerous that a crude or lifeless member can always be easily replaced by a better; no holding on to places after faculty is gone, no dead wood in the tree. There was nothing which our people, our musicians needed so much as to hear just such an orchestra. They came most opportunely: for our musicians, teaching by example; for our public (and there is no better public in the world for music of the highest character than that which fills the Music Hall at all good Symphony Concerts), to show us that, with all our pride in our own orchestra, we are yet very far this side of perfection, and must take a lesson from what is better done elsewhere. Well informed musical persons here have always known of the superiority of the New York orchestras (the Philharmonic and that of Mr. Thomas) to our own; but such has not been the imagination of the public; their own glowing sympathy and aspiration, meeting the intentions of the noble music half way, have always fondly found the execution better than it was; nay more, the reluctantly confessed sense of weariness and ennui after many a noble composition has been too willing to accuse itself, if modest, or if not, that venerable "old fogey," the composer, never suspecting that the coarse, blurred, lifeless execution may have been at fault. We have an audience that deserves the best; we have at last a quickening example of what, in point of execution at least, comes very near the best thus far; it will be our own fault if we do not improve the lesson, and take a new start in orchestral music, finding it impossible now to shut out of sight the new and higher standard which has so vividly impressed itself on every mind.

But we are anticipating; we must report, and briefly try to weigh and estimate. In candor, what we have to set down as the "net result" artistically of the Thomas concerts, is not all in praise; and we anticipate a little further, just enough to give it as our calm and clear conviction, that, while his Orchestra play vastly better than our own, still ours remain the better Concerts. Does this seem paradoxical? Let us see. Here are the three programmes, which we quote together, that we may discuss the several elements in groups of like with like:

(Friday Evening, Oct. 29.)

Overture. "Tannhäuser".....Wagner.
Adagio. "Prometheus".....Beethoven.
L'Invitation à la Danse.....Weber.
(Instrumentation by Hector Berlioz).
Symphonic Poem. Preludes.....Liszt.

Overture. "William Tell".....Rossini.
Träumerei.....Schumann.
Waltz. "On the beautiful blue Danube".....Strauss.
Solo for Trombone. "The Tear".....Stigelli.
Mr. F. Loetsch.
Polka Mazurka. "Lob der Frauen".....Strauss.
Polka Schnell. "Jocus".....Strauss.
Fackeltanz, in B, No. 1.....Meyerbeer.

(Saturday Evening.)

Suite No. 8, in D.....Bach.
Introduction to Act III of Medea.....Cherubini.
Concerto for Piano, G minor.....Mendelssohn.
Mr. C. Petersilea.
Overture. "Leonora" No. 8.....Beethoven.
Fackeltanz, No. 8, C minor.....Meyerbeer.
Nachtgesang.....Vogt.
Waltz. "Wiener Bonbons".....Strauss.
Grand March for Piano. "Puritani".....Liszt.
Mr. C. Petersilea.
Reverie.....Vieuxtemps.
Polka Mazurka. "Libelle".....Strauss.
Polka Française. "Kreuzdödel".....Strauss.

(Sunday Evening.)

Symphony, No. 7, A.....Beethoven.
Trio for Two Horns and Trombone.....Bergmann.
Messrs. Schultz, Lotze and Loetsch.
Cossachogue. Fantasia sur une danse Cossaque.
Dargomyjsky.
Overture. "Rienzi".....Wagner.
Träumerei.....Schumann.
Ballet. "Faust." (New).....Gounod.
Composed expressly for the performances at the Imperial Grand Opera, Paris.
Fantasia. "Ave Maria".....Schubert.
March. "Maseppa".....Liszt.

Plainly, in all this, the object was to show what a modern orchestra can do, and how well this particular orchestra can do it, rather than to convey any poetic unity of impression; to startle and delight for the moment, rather than to lift into a pure, ideal atmosphere. Artistic unity, and the well-motivated contrasts which that implies, are out of the question in such programmes; instead of that we have the contrast of extremes, exciting wonder until wonder wears of itself. First, we note, as the most prominent ingredient, those loud and ponderous effect pieces of the Liszt, Wagner, Meyerbeer school. Think of the Tannhäuser Overture, the Lisztian "Preludes," the "Tell" Overture (which, by itself considered, of course, is good), and a flaring, blazing, crashing Fackeltanz (midnight orgies by torchlight) of Meyerbeer, all in one concert! The Tannhäuser led off, as if to smite with the first blow, that easy victory might follow. Never did we hear it so well played (unless at the Opera in Vienna); never did we enjoy the work so little. It was Wagner exposed; robbed of his glamour, if he ever had any, by setting him in so strong a light, so mercilessly truthful. But whatever it did for Wagner, the orchestra itself showed, in its own strong light, to excellent advantage. The band was all alive in the first place, vital at every point; every instrument told; every part in the Quartet was substantial, unmistakable (nowhere did the superiority of this orchestra to our own assert itself so clearly as in the middle strings, where Boston has been always weak). The fine precision and pungent quality of the violins; the warmth and richness of those five cellos, massed in the front, and moving with one soul; the five double basses too; the excellence of all the brass; Ella's delicious oboe; indeed everything, to tympani and tamhourine, won in turn its special share of admiration. Only in bassoons and clarinet have we as good to show. Choice materials admirably blended! In the matter of tempo, however, there was some room for criticism; the solemn, slow part of the overture was uncomfortably slow. There was some dragging also in Les Preludes, which, finely executed as it was, so beautifully on the part of the strings, and with all the coloring of which Liszt is a master made so palpable, still failed to give us the impression of great music.

The "Tell" overture was played superbly; we will only specify the rare perfection of the opening passage by the cellos, the singularly rich tone, and searching, true expression of the leading one (Bergner) particularly; and the fine oboe again, so rich in the lower tones here commonly given by the English Horn. The trumpets, first and second, told triumphantly in this; but more so in the two Fackeltanze, where they have such florid obligato passages. These were interesting novelties to hear, full of ingenious effects and startling or pleasing fancies, yet properly belonging to the category of musical extravaganzas. Most extravagant, fantastical, grotesque of all was the Cossack dance on Sunday evening; a herd of buffaloes could not have burst in more tumultuously than it did; no doubt there is plenty of the Cossack character in it. Wagner's Rienzi is unmitigated noise; riot set to music, one would think, and in strains coarse and commonplace.

But this served the purpose (as did one of the fortissimo pieces each time) of exhibiting by extreme contrast the opposite element which figured in these programmes. We mean the delicate transcription for all the strings of little piano-forte pieces like Schumann's "Träumerei" (Reverie) and the "Nachtgesang" by Vogt, which were of course so popular, that no programme could be accepted as complete without them both. The effect of such Quartet rendering (they do whole Quartets so in Paris) was indeed most beautiful; the rich full tone and perfect harmony of so many strings, the light and shade, the refining of expression and of pianissimo to a point where it seemed more dream than reality,—all this caused a new and exquisite sensation, which everybody wished to have repeated and prolonged. But after all, this is effect music, and lacks artistic justification, does not properly belong in an artistic programme. For this is not interpretation; it is simply a Study of Pianissimo, using for a text a simple little piano-forte piece from Schuman's "Kinderszenen" (Scenes from Childhood), a piece never intended to be played with such exaggeration of expression. Admirable studies these for any orchestra; but we would no more put them into a Symphony or Philharmonic programme than we would the Etudes de Velocité, in a young lady's lesson book.

The refining influence of such practice, however, appeared in all the classical interpretations of this admirable orchestra. As such we recall the beautiful Adagio, with harp, from Beethoven's "Prometheus" ballet; the Suite by Bach (which is down for one of our own Symphony Concerts), and the very grand and tragical introduction from Medea, really great music, which, much simpler as it is, affects the imagination almost as powerfully as the introduction to the prison scene in Fidelio. These were wonderfully well done, especially the Suite, which was applauded with a heartiness that proved there is something in Bach that appeals to general sympathy, let him once be properly presented. We thank Mr. Thomas for these choice additions to our stock of high orchestral music.

In the familiar classical selections—Seventh Symphony, Leonora and Fryschütz Overtures, Mendelssohn Concerto,—and we may add the Berlioz arrangement of Weber's "Invitation"—there was the same masterly precision in the strings, the same certainty, truth of intonation, well blended coloring, on the part of the wind band also. The rendering of the Symphony, however, was not on the whole so much superior to some of the best by our own orchestra; indeed the difference between the two was less apparent here than in most of the pieces. Yet the temper and true habit of these men tell of course in everything they do; and we must bear witness to the wonderful staccato of the violins in the mysterious whispered passage near the end of the slow movement; to the perfect precision of all the instruments in the Scherzo (in spite of its being taken too fast), and the superb brio of the finale.

Mr. PETERSBLEA played the Concerto with his usual ease and brilliancy of technique on a very dry and dull piano, one of the Weber Grands. The Liszt Puritani March did not place him in a very flattering light. The only other solos were the one on the trombone, by Mr. LERTSON, who makes its brazen throat ring with the warmth and smoothness of the middle tones of a horn; and the Trio for two horns and trombone, which, considering the many chromatic intervals and modulations, showed the rarest skill and taste on the part of all three artists.

In a word, then, we rejoice in the coming of this orchestra. It is just the kind of thing that we for years have longed for in view of our own progress here. We sincerely thank Mr. Thomas, first, for giving us a hearing, under the best advantages, of a number of works which were new to us; some of which can hardly claim a place in a classical programme, and therefore we are the more obliged to one who gratifies our curiosity about them in another way. But more we thank him for setting palpably before us a higher ideal of orchestral execution. We shall demand better of our own in future; they will demand it of themselves; they cannot witness this example without a newly kindled desire, followed by an effort to do likewise. With the impression fresh in every mind of performances which, it is not rash to say, may (for the number of instruments) compare with those of the best orchestras in Europe, improvement is necessary.

ERNST PERABO'S first Matinée drew the best sort of audience, in full force, to Chickering Hall, on Friday afternoon, Oct. 29. This was the programme:

Overture, "Zur Weihe des Hauses," op. 124, C major.
Arranged by E. Paner. . . . . Beethoven.
Ballade, "In die Ferne." First time in Boston. . . . . Carl Loewe.
Two Studies, Op. 70, Book I, Nos. 8 and 12. . . . . Moscheles.
Le Message d'Amour, from "Chant du Cygne." Vol. 1. . . . . Schubert.
Sonata, op. 100, B flat major. . . . . Beethoven.

We had not supposed it possible to convey so much of the grandeur and beauty of that Beethoven Overture (called in our Symphony Concerts the "Dedication" Overture), on the piano, as Mr. Perabo, with his firm, strong mastery, succeeded in doing; you could almost hear the several instruments, and the intricate fugued movement was singularly clear. He played it from memory, as he did also (the greatest problem in that kind we can imagine) that longest, strangest and most difficult of Beethoven's Sonatas, the op. 106. No one but Perabo has played it publicly in Boston; and it was indeed a triumph that he made it all enjoyable to the great mass of his audience, though we have yet to see the person who does not own himself puzzled by the last movement, with its intricacies and caprices. The two Studies by Moscheles date from that master's best and most genial period; they are full of airy grace and fancy, and were beautifully rendered.

Miss WHITTEN's selections were choice and new, and she sang them with the best expression; the sweetness of her voice, and her artistic use of it, improve upon acquaintance. The specimen of Lûwe's Ballade, though very beautiful and full of feeling, was hardly one of his most characteristic; his peculiar vein, we should say, lies more in the romantic and mysterious.

Next Friday Mr. Perabo will play the "Kreutzer Sonata" with Mr. Listemann.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. We go to press on the day of the first Concert (Thursday) and therefore cannot speak of it at present. The second concert, since Thanksgiving has been appointed for the 18th, has to be given a day earlier, namely, on Wednesday, Nov. 17th. It will also begin half an hour earlier than usual, to accommodate musicians going out of town. The programme is: Part I. "Ossian" Overture, Gade; Violin Concerto, Beethoven, played by B. LISTEMANN.—Part II. Overture to "Manfred," Schumann; Violin Sonata: "La Trille du Diable," Tartini; Italian Symphony, Mendelssohn.

The complaints about the sale of tickets to these concerts are fairly answered by an unknown friend in the Daily Advertiser, as follows:

The difficulty of pleasing the public did not end with the catastrophe narrated by Æsop. People still demand that the miller should walk, or make his son walk, or that father and son should carry the ass between them; and they will always do so.

The Harvard Musical Association, numbering a little over a hundred members, having seen that all former attempts to give symphony concerts have either resulted in pecuniary loss, or in lowering the character of the music to meet the demands of an uncultivated public, undertook, a few years ago, what was considered a doubtful experiment, trusting that a combined effort in private circles might be more successful than appeals to the general public had been.

A committee of the association hired a large orchestra, becoming personally responsible for salaries, rent of hall and advertising bills, to the amount of nearly $10,000. With such a responsibility and warned by previous experience, they did not feel at liberty to trust wholly to the public; but through their members solicited subscriptions to a series of concerts, in order to have a material guaranty for inevitably large expenses. These concerts have cost the association much labor,—unpaid, but cheerfully given. The subscription lists have been made up by no small effort; and the selection of programmes and attending to the necessary rehearsals and other business matters is not a trivial matter.

The public, i. e. those who would like to patronize music now that it has become fashionable, cannot get all the best seats in the hall and are wroth. What is to be done? Shall the association give up its efficient management and leave the cause of music in the hands of speculators? For if the members cannot be assured by subscriptions, they will not incur the necessary liabilities. And the association will not give its sanction to any musical enterprise without a controlling voice in selecting programmes.

The Harvard Association was not established for the purpose of giving concerts, and its officers would not be allowed to enter into any engagements of this kind in its name, unless there was a certainty that its treasury was secured against loss.

The total number of subscriptions for this season was less than 1000. Seats for these were located by the members or their friends before opening the lists to the public, as was natural and proper. If any one has any reasonable suggestions to make, and can tell us how a series of classical concerts can be maintained, free from the control of those who would make art serve mammon, and how a guaranty of $10,000 can be obtained from private persons without the basis of a subscription list, it will be far better to do so than to keep up an aimless growing in the newspapers.

The Harvard Musical Association, for this series of concerts and for many other public-spirited movements, deserves a kindlier recognition than it has received. URSILON.

Music Abroad.

KREUZNACH.—In a celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Royal Gymnasium, a performance of Sophocles's Antigone, in the original Greek, with Mendelssohn's music, was given by the pupils of the institution.

BOLOGNA.—According to the Italian paper, La Fama, Signor Scalaberni, the manager of the theatre here, will produce next winter an unknown opera, Giovanna d'Arco, by no less a composer than Rossini himself, who is said to have written it more than thirty years ago, to a libretto by M. Léon Pillet, formerly manager of the Grand Opéra, Paris. Chi vieta verità—Preparations are being made to produce Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin. If the experiment prove successful, the Scala, Milan, will follow suit, either with the same opera, or with Die Meistersinger.

SALZBURG.—The programme of the last concert given by the Mozarteum comprised: Prelude to Die Meistersinger, R. Wagner; Ritual, from Rosamunde, Schubert; Pianoforte Concerto (E minor), Chopin; and Die Walpurgisnacht, Mendelssohn.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The Russian operatic season commenced with Glinka's Life for the Czar. M. Gounod's Faust will shortly be produced in Russian.—The Italian Opera commences its season on the 1st November. The Sisters Marchisio are engaged in the place of Mme. Lucca.

BRESLAU.—The programme of the concert which Herr Ferdinand Hiller gave a short time since consisted exclusively of works of his own composition. They were: Third Sonata, Op. 78; Four Studies, for Piano and Violin: pieces from the Operette ohne Text: solos for piano, and vocal solos, and duets for female voices. Herr F. Hiller was supported by Miles Schorbel and Herr Lüttner, who kindly gave their services on the occasion.—At the last concert given by the Singacademie, the works performed were Actus tragicus, J. S. Bach; and the Requiem, Mozart.

MUNICH.—Herr R. Wagner's Rheingold has at length been given. It achieved only a very moderate success, even on the first night, when the Wagnerites mustered all their forces to support it. In every probability it will not be repeated very often. A writer in the Neue Freie Presse speaks of it in the following terms:—"I have just come from the first performance of Rheingold by R. Wagner. The King was present from the beginning to the end. For his courage in having the opera produced, in spite of Wagner's opposition, he was received with tumultuous applause upon entering his box, but this fact rendered it impossible for the audience to express their feelings during the performance, because by a stupid piece of etiquette still in force among us, if a Royal, or any other such like personage has been publicly received, no marks of approbation are allowed to be bestowed upon art. It was not till the end of the opera, when his Majesty left with most striking rapidity, that the audience were at liberty to give vent to their feelings. The machinery had worked properly and blamelessly; there had not been a hitch, either in any of the changes of scene, or in the much talked of rainbow, on which the Gods mount to the Walhalla; the singers and the band had done their duty; and Herr Willner, to whom the direction of the opera had been confided had honorably fulfilled his task of rendering it fit for performance in a fortnight, though nearly all the male characters had been cast afresh; so there was good reason for a party among the public beginning to applaud at the fall of the curtain; but another party opposed this. The first party, however, gained the day, and so, in obedience to a call, the singers appeared before the curtain. When they had done this the enthusiasm was over, and the public flocked out of the overcrowded theatre. Such was the result of the first performance of Rheingold."

The orchestra, specially reinforced, for Herr Wagner's Rheingold, consisted of 18 anvils (!) tuned to the proper pitch; 16 first violins; 16 second violins; 12 tenors; 12 violoncellos; 8 double basses; 2 harps; 3 flutes; 1 piccolo; 3 oboes; 1 English horn; 3 clarionets; 1 bass clarinet; 3 bassoons; 8 horns; 3 trumpets; 1 bass trumpet; 3 trombones; 1 contra-bass trombone; 1 contra-bass tuba; a pair of kettle drums; triangle; cymbals, and gong. Thus there were 120 instruments actively employed. In addition to this, the members of the company exerted themselves to the very utmost; the scene-painters and carpenters effected wonders, while three thousand gas-burners were alight on and above the stage, and behind the scenes. And with what result? Parturiunt omnes, nascitur ridiculum Rheingold! Despite all that has been done for it in the way of trouble and expense, the last production of Herr Wagner's Muse fails to attract very greatly. Even at the third performance of this precious production, the attendance of the public had greatly diminished.—It is said that either Herr Willner, or Herr Max Zenger will be appointed Chapel-Master to the Court, in the place of Herr von Bülow, and, subsequently, of Herr Hans Richter.

London.

CRYSTAL PALACE MUSIC.—The managers of the Saturday concerts have put forth a modest prospectus for the season just begun—modest, that is, by comparison with the announcement last year of a novelty for each programme. This time only a small number of new works are promised, on condition that no serious obstacle 'occur.' Looking at the list, we turn instinctively to Schubert's name, hoping that the historical cupboard of Dr. Schneider may again have yielded up treasure. The result is disappointment. Though we have the authority of Mr. George Grove for believing the cupboard anything but bare, nothing has come out of it this time; while of such of the master's nine symphonies as are known, only No. 5, the 'Tragic,' and the unfinished No. 8, are set down for performance. With Mendelssohn the case is hardly more favorable. Those who for years kept the dead composer's manuscripts under lock and key, as though posthumous music were sure to do the world a mischief, seem frightened at their recent liberty, and nothing more is forthcoming. True, a motet ('Tu es Petrus') and certain selections from the Wedding of Canacho are in the list of Crystal Palace novelties, but those belong to a former dole, and are of insignificant account. Schubert and Mendelssohn thus barren, the prospectus becomes uninteresting till we see that a really earnest attempt has been made to supply the deficiency from other quarters. The managers promise first hearings of a symphony by Haydn, No. 5 in D; of another by Mozart, No. 8 in D; of another by Spohr, No. 6, the 'Historical,' and of another by Ferdinand Hiller, the 'Approach of Spring.' Moreover, they have looked about among English composers, and, finding that Dr. Sterndale Bennett is a symphonist, they promise his 'G minor,' in addition to Mr. G. A. Macfarren's cantata, May Day, and Mr. Arthur Sullivan's new oratorio, The Prodigal Son. Even if this did not supply the lacking interest, we should find it in the statement that due attention will be paid to the compositions of writers who either claim to be or are acknowledged "representatives of their great predecessors." As the acknowledged representatives of Mozart and Beethoven are, unhappily, very few, the managers' assurances are not so far important. But the works of those who claim to be such representatives will present a wide if not enticing field of choice, and the probability is that countless composers have already dispatched their manuscripts to the Crystal Palace. With the catalogue of standard works which the prospectus contains no fault can be found. Six of Beethoven's symphonies, the last two of Mendelssohn, the 'Rhenish' and 'D minor' of Schumann, together with a host of favorite overtures, Acis and Galatea, the Mount of Olives, the Hymn of Praise, the First Walpurgis Night, and Paradise and the Peri, are adapted to satisfy everybody, by pleasing every variety of classical taste. As regards the executive department nothing more is said than that the band is to be maintained in its old efficiency, and the chorus augmented and improved. We care little about the augmentation, but there is still great need of improvement.—Pall Mall Gazette, Oct. 4.

The first programme (Oct. 2) was as follows:

Overture ["Der Freischütz"].....Weber.
Arietta, "In questa tomba oscura".....Beethoven.
Air, "Love sounds the alarm" ["Acis and Galatea"].....Handel.
Symphony, No. 2 in D (Op. 36).....Beethoven.
Cavatina, "Ma la Soli" ["Beatrice di Tenda"].....Bellini.
Song, "The Thorn" ["Faust"].....Schubert.
Entr'acte in E flat—Ballad airs in G ["Rosamunde"].....F. Schubert.
Cradle Song "Sleep, dearest, sleep".....Handel.
Song, "Birds of Erin".....Benedict.
Overture ["A Midsummer Night's Dream"].....Mendelssohn.

We quote from what the Times says of the second concert:

At the concert of Saturday (the second of the series) another work by Schubert was brought forward—one of the many rescued from neglect by Mr. G. Grove, during his visit to Vienna, in Nov., 1867. Shortly before, the Crystal Palace concerts had introduced to an English public Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor, the first of his two "Italian" overtures, a "Salve Regina," and some of the incidental music to the drama of Rosamunde and Miriam's Siegesang. We have now a fresh obligation to record in the addition made at Saturday's concert, the programme of which was as follows:

Overture ["Die Freunde von Salamanka"].....Schubert.
Symphony "Reformation".....Mendelssohn.
Arioso, "Forget me not" ["Nozze di Figaro"].....Mozart.
Song, "O ruddler than the cherry" ["Acis and Galatea"].....Handel.
Concerto—Pianoforte—in E flat (C. Hallé).....Beethoven.
Cradle Song, "Birds in the night".....A. S. Sullivan.
Song, "A Sister's Smile" ["Faust"].....Gounod.
Solo—Pianoforte—"Clavierstück," in E flat minor.....Schubert.
Valse, "Godism".....Bergmann.
Overture ["Gilda"].....Adam.

Schubert's overture belongs to an operetta (in two acts) composed in 1815 to a libretto by Mayrhofer—the music alone being extant, having fortunately escaped the destruction which has befallen the manuscripts of other of the composer's dramatic productions. If the vocal portion of Die Freunde von Salamanka is equal to the instrumental prelude to the work, it is to be hoped that it may come to a speedy hearing—as, although not so characteristic of Schubert's individuality as his more mature productions, there is a melodious freshness and a genial charm of style in the overture which render it especially welcome amid the violent efforts at originality made by some contemporary composers devoid of imagination. When Schubert produced this work he was but eighteen, and his tendency was towards the clearness of form and the regularity of melodic phrase which are prominent features of Mozart's style. The young composer had not then felt the influence of the giant Beethoven, soon to be the object of Schubert's reverential admiration, and the prompting of his genius, which, in a gentler and milder aspect, had many points of analogy with that of Beethoven. The overture performed on Saturday is throughout bright as sunshine, having no trace of that melancholy which, in later music, tinges at times even his lighter productions.

OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT'S oratorio, Ruth, revised by the composer, is to be given at Exeter Hall, early in November—Mme Lind-Goldschmidt, Mme. Patey, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Santley sustaining the principal parts.

- THE PICNIC. A Cantata. By J. R. Thomas. 1.00
A pretty affair with an unpretending title, which is hardly good enough for the music, that being very pleasing. Arranged for mixed voices, but an added staff renders it equally available for three female voices. So it is just the thing for Seminars, as well as for the outside world. Incidents and Pieces are The Gathering, The Departure (Boat song), The Arrival, Swinging Song, Flower Song, Waltz Song, Laughing Glee, Skipping Song, The Storm, The Sunshine after Rain, Farewell, and Homeward Bound.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Handel and Bach.

ADAPTED FROM THE GERMAN.

Turning to Bach's oratorios, we at once see their instinctive difference from those of Handel. Bach did not, like Handel, seek his subject; it overpowered him. He had no public before him, longing for new things, and eager to hear new singers. He was a servant of the Church. His originality lies not in the choice, but in the handling of his theme. He tried to make his Church music accord with the service of God, and, through it, to give an echo of the words of prayer or praise.

His Cantatas, with subjects drawn from the Gospels, number one hundred. [The MS. scores of nearly three hundred lie in the Royal Library at Berlin.—Ed.] His Passion and Christmas music has its appointed place in the Lutheran service, and no other music of the kind can compare with his. His St. Matthew's Passion is the most powerful of all his productions of this kind, and the best known.

As Handel's music can be understood only through a knowledge of his career in Italy and England, so Bach can be understood only by those familiar with the German school of music. Joyousness of tone and manner are the characteristics of Italian music; but the old spirit of German art, before all things, strives after character and truth. The words must have their full right; the music must only make them more clear and transparent. To bind words and manner harmoniously together, like body and soul, is Bach's great effort; and in it he has met with grand success.

The imperishable truth stands higher with him than the intellectual, beautiful form; therefore he dares express the thought with the utmost boldness, sometimes even with harshness. Every melody is characteristic; no one chorus like another. This estranges from him many ears. "Bach is as national as Goethe and Lessing, but not popular as Schiller and Mozart," has been justly said of him.

Bach's music is polyphonic, or many-toned. The ears of many cannot bear this. There are people so sluggish in hearing and thinking, that they must have everything perfectly plain in music. Handel can accomplish this, but Bach cannot. Every voice forms a part of the great whole, and must stand alone. A chorus of Bach's is a great conversation of voices, where each must be silent when he has nothing to say, and fall in at the right time. Often in the beginning and concluding chorus we are obliged to follow two or three melodies at a time. It has been truly said: "Bach's music is like a primitive forest, full of grotesque growths and gnarled branches. One should not send children into this wood."

Over-pregnant with thought and meaning, his music is especially the music of the future; still amidst all its depth, it contains a romantic element which makes it truly German. Whoever fully drinks in the spirit of his melodies, is as under a spell of enchantment. His orchestra, also, is different from Handel's; not only sustaining the music, but standing by it like its twin brother. Sometimes the sentiments are reflected in the voices; at others in the instruments. The orchestra, as well as the voices, can interest of itself. In the beautiful words of Hiller: "The orchestra of the Saint Matthew's Passion is a fine veil, behind which a tear-moistened, but most lovely, face shines forth."

In this fine, spiritual orchestration, this man has indeed followers, but no predecessor. The few instruments are finely chosen, and gently and impressively they move the thought of the aria. In the Saint Matthew's Passion, flutes, harps and organs have their place but horns, drums, bugles and trumpets are not heard. Where Christ speaks, the string quartet usually softly accompanies; but at the words, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" even this is silent.

A mysterious power, depth and spirituality, are the signs-manual of Bach's music. It is as if he spoke to us of a better world. He touches our finest sensibilities. We give him our hand, and he leads us into an intricate labyrinth of tones, but securely we go on by the Ariadne thread, and our feet stand at last in the Holy Place.

The musical world of the present is full of the praise of John Sebastian Bach. It may not love the seriousness and transcendent depth of his music, but it honors the master whom Beethoven has called "The great father of harmony." Over his nameless and unknown grave, many a one whom his strains have edified in spirit blesses him, and, in the concluding words of his Passion-chorus, says:

"Rest gently, gently rest."

To both Handel and Bach the Scriptures were the undoubted truth of God. No mortal could have written such music, had he not believed. To the full measure of their powers they sought to serve and honor Him, but each in his own way. Handel should not be called the more worldly of the two, if the words are to be taken in their usual sense. Like Paul at Athens he preached God from a world stage—the living God of history, speaking in deeds and miracles. From the Scriptures he seized whatever would most deeply move the soul, and knew how to present it in the best light. He could sing of the world's allurements and deceits, for he had known them all; and he could compass the whole scale of emotion, from despair to rapture, from the woes of death to the joys of heaven.

From his text he grasps, like Luther, the principal thought, and indelibly impresses it upon the mind of his hearers. He is the singer of the Old Testament, jealous for the Lord's house and honor—an Asaph in the temple-court—his orchestra the whole one hundred and fifty Psalms—his text-book Moses and the prophets—and from the summit of David's mountain he gazes afar to the morning twilight of the great redemption.

Bach is a Church believer, a pious man, who has God always before his eyes and in his heart. Not upon the theatre of the world, amid its honors and disgrace, its loves and hates, were unfolded to him the eternal truths of the Scriptures, but in a life of silent, blessed meditation, like that of a hermit in a forest-sanctuary. He was a Lutheran, with an inward leaning toward a monastic life. Not the defiant Luther before the Imperial Diet, but Luther in the narrow cell, resembled Bach. A deep, mysterious strain runs through his music, which shows that he—the Lutheran Cantor—was capable of writing a high mass.

The sympathetic element was not wanting in Bach—he, too, could sing of mortal loves, and hates, and passions, but this human sympathy was only the back-ground before which appeared the shining image of his Lord. Not what God does for men with the strong arm, but what God does for men in his love, in his inconceivable condescension, affects his heart. Spiritually to sink himself in this history, to embody its eternal substance in his harmonies, this was Bach's art. To him the smallest passage of the Scriptures is full of meaning. He is not, like Handel, a preacher to the multitude; his power is not on the stage or in the concert-hall, but in the Church. If over his utterances the veil of mystery lies, still he explores into a hitherto unexplored kingdom, only to let us know how inexhaustible its treasures are.

His music seems to be ordained not for the people, but for only a consecrated circle. And still this is only seeming. We unjustly call Bach "a solitary artist without a public," because he is too high and too deep for the multitude. He who only says what all understand, will, in the end, have said but very little; and he who says more, will not of necessity be always incomprehensible.

Bach's music is a giant, Gothic dome, in which a forest of mighty pillars of harmony swells upward, their branches crossing and interlacing each other in the most wonderful and intricate forms. Cross and crozier fail not, and through the windows, painted with scenes from sacred history, stream in the broken beams of day. Every uncorrupted nature feels, without comprehending the great structure in all its parts, that the spot whereon he stands is holy ground. This is the secret power of Bach's music. It is with this music as with the stars of heaven. The unlearned man feels their greatness and sublimity, but the astronomer, who knows their orbits and their course, admires and wonders still more.

Bach is the singer of the New Dispensation. He well knows how to sing of old things; but it is his delight to seek inspiration in the simple majesty of the Gospel, in the deep thoughts of Saint Paul. He knows the Lord as the king, the conqueror over death, and thus he represents him in that Cantata for the sixth Sunday after Trinity; but still it is the mournful joy of the true Lutheran to stand under the cross of Jesus, to support his weary head, and, with gushing tears, follow him to the sepulchre, softly saying, "My Jesus, good-night!"

In Handel breaks forth from the burning bush an armed and mantled prophet before all the people; in Bach, a silent priest goes into the holy of holies to light the candles, and burn incense before the Most High.

Two great masters have stood before our eyes, to comprehend whom in their deepest meaning it is given only to earnest souls. Handel and Bach have risen from forgetfulness, because in their works lies an eternal truth, which, though it may slumber for a time, can never die. To have brought these great masters from obscurity is an honor to our generation, but may Heaven forbid that to this or any other age they shall be in their music, what they once were, witnesses of God against the degeneracy of the time!—Ladies' Repository.

Musical Amateurs of the Period.

We confess we do not like musical amateurs. They are a weariness to us, and we listen to them with pain—especially when they are our own personal friends, and we are expected to applaud them. Amateur actors are bad enough; but it is permitted, from time to time, to laugh at them—at least we believe so—we always do so ourselves. Amateur singers must not be laughed at, however, and they resent it as a personal insult if you do not applaud them. We quite approve of amateur singers singing together for their own entertainment, if it really entertains them. What we object to is their inviting friends to come and listen to them, and then taking offense if those friends come when the concert is just at an end, and supper about to begin.

Partiality to the sex may have something to do with it, but we certainly prefer lady amateurs to their male friends and associates in the same line. In the second place they are more up to their work. The number of ladies who can play and sing tolerably well is infinitely greater than that of the gentlemen possessing the same talent and skill. The great fault of the ladies is, that they are too ambitious. A girl who has a good voice, which is really effective in a small room, thinks—and herein deceives herself—that it will be equally effective in a large concert-room or theatre. She sings ballads admirably, as well, perhaps, as they need be sung. Therefore she attempts bravura airs, and does not sing them nearly so well as they would be sung by a fourth-rate seconda donna on the Italian stage.

We have spoken hitherto of the better class of amateur vocalists. But there are some really terrible specimens, especially among the men, as we descend in the scale.

From the amateur who "sings a good second" may heaven defend us! May queer things happen to him, and may he, some day, find himself in the company of other amateurs who also sing good seconds; and may they all (we being absent) sing good seconds together, while none sing first or thirds or fourths, but only seconds—good and bad. The amateur who says he can sing a good second is not necessarily a vain amateur; but oh, how ignorant! If he said he could improvise a melody it would be untrue; still it would be possible. But the notion of his improvising harmony is preposterous. It is all the same to the amateur who sings a good second whether he knows the melody to which he proposes to adapt his good second or not. He listens to the tune, makes a guess, after hearing the first few notes, as to how it is likely to go on, and then does what Mr. Bright calls "a little childish tinkering," in the way of furnishing an additional part. He soon gets utterly wrong, and after a certain time begins to suspect that he is not quite right. Then, being possibly a modest and more or less well meaning man, he pauses until he sees a safe opportunity for going in again, when his fine voice is once more heard a sixth below or a third above the notes of the melody (he is not particular which, nor, while aiming at these intervals does he always hit them); and the new concord of sweet sounds lasts sometimes for two or three bars together, until another obstacle, slight but sure, presents itself, and the amateur who sings a good second is a second time floored. It is amusing to see him at these moments (out of hearing him there is never any fun to be got), and to watch him looking round as if to discover whether any one has discovered him. At such a juncture a half-suppressed bravo is very effective; indeed, ironical applause is the only method by which the amateur who sings a good second can be civilly reduced to silence. "O sainte ironie!" cried Proudhon; and approbation punctually bestowed on every mistake cannot in the end fail to open the eyes even of the blunderer himself.

It must be admitted, however, that in the present day the amateur who sings a good second is not often to be met with in the society of educated or even of well-bred people. There is no secular edifice in which the present writer has encountered him for some time past. The avoidance may have been mutual—let us hope so. At all events we have not encountered him.

But is he for that reason extinct? Alas! no. Where, then, has the amateur who sings a good second taken refuge? By our use of the epithet "secular" we have already, a contrario, indicated his chosen asylum. With a refinement of cunning, so subtle as to be almost diabolical, he has fled to a place where he knows that we must all cease from applauding, and where, consequently, the amateur who sings a good second is at rest. He has retired to church, where he can sing any part or parts that he may consider suitable, without the slightest fear of being turned out, or even interfered with, in the practice of his harmonic and anti-harmonic recreations. If, from behind the jester's mask, we may be allowed to speak a few words in solemn seriousness, we would entreat bishops, priests, deacons, and all whom it may concern, to bring this weighty scandal to an end, through the agency of churchwardens, beadles, sextons, and, if necessary, gravediggers.

The organist is, of course, not consulted in the matter, or he would at once say, "If the congregation will sing, let them sing in unison or hold their peace." In the Protestant churches of Germany no maniacal attempts are made to "sing second." The organ furnishes the harmony, the congregation confine themselves to the melody. Even then the effect is not good, but it is at least as good as, under the circumstances, is possible. The proceeding, too, is orderly, whereas in our churches—owing, above all, to the presence of the amateur who sings a good second—hymn-singing is an anarchical proceeding, worthy, if for that reason alone, of the severest condemnation. A sad, discordant noise, which men would not tolerate, is impiously offered to the Divinity.

Worthy of being married to the gentleman amateur who sings a good second is the lady amateur who can "play an accompaniment to any air." She can, perhaps, do so as well as the late Mr. Charles Sloman, "the only English improvisatore," could extemporize verses on any subject; but extemporized accompaniments, like extemporized verses, must of necessity be conventional and common-place; and the notion that they can be furnished at will to suit any melody, without reference to its character, is based on the delusion that accompaniment-writing is a mere process, demanding no originality of invention.

Is the amateur who plays by ear, who only needs to hear an air once to be able to reproduce it, who, after going to the opera, can come home and give you all the melodies on the piano, is he also to be spoken of? Such a one may really possess the talent attributed to him by his admiring friends. If so, let him understand that it is chiefly valuable as a possible sign of better things, and that it is worth very little in itself. Blind Tom, on hearing an air, or, indeed, a whole piece, once, could play something very like it on the piano; yet it is quite certain that Blind Tom was nearly an idiot. The secret of his power seems to have rested in the possession of a strong imitative faculty—the faculty, in short, which constitutes the genius of the buffoon. What Blind Tom could do, the greatest pianist of the day could not do. Nor would an educated musician think of attempting the feats performed more or less successfully by the amateur who plays by ear. After witnessing a new drama, a servant girl may amuse herself by declaiming striking passages in imitation of the principal performers; but a person of taste, who wished to study the work, would, of course, do so from the book.

Here we are reminded that there is such a thing as the amateur in musical criticism. The gentleman who sings a good second, the lady who can supply an accompaniment to any air, the amateur, in particular, who plays by ear, may turn round upon us, even as we pull him by the ear, and say: "And you, my counsellor, instructor, and reprover, don't you criticize much as I play, the best way you can, and chiefly by ear? Talk of studying from the book, by which you imply that, instead of indulging in reminiscences, more or less precise, of a work, I should be better occupied in examining the score—what if I cannot read the score? I come away with certain impressions of works that I have just heard, and these impressions I can reproduce with some approach to accuracy on the piano. Can you do more, or even so much, in reproducing your impressions with the pen in the shape of criticisms?"

Having by an effort brought ourselves to a sufficiently charitable frame of mind to be able to overlook the impertinence of an amateur who should venture to address any such observations to us, we should, perhaps, confide to him our belief that, after all, he was not far wrong; and that, as he may succeed in amusing a small circle of persons more ignorant than himself, by his operations on the piano, so there are amateur critics who amuse (if they happen to be amusing) a large circle of readers by their observations on music. Certainly there are amateur critics, as there are amateur executants; and at least half our musical critics, though they may know something of music as an art, know little or nothing of it as a science. They could not, for instance, pass an examination in the elements of musical composition. We do not say that they would be much further advanced as critics if they could. We only say that they could not pass such an examination. The amateur critic, however, has a right to exist and perform his functions in the capacity of amateur critic, provided he will do so honestly and with modesty; not vainly pretending to a knowledge of things which are concealed from him, like the students whose perversity and presumption were so trying to St. Augustine. There are, indeed, very few critics of art, and not too many of literature, who possess at once a full knowledge of their subject, critical aptitude, and a good literary style. A musician may know a work by heart. He is not for that reason able to analyze it and explain the principles on which it is constructed, to show how it proceeds from this work, how it resembles that one, and to assign to it, ultimately, its definite position by itself, or by the side of other works. Who can be better acquainted with the music performed season after season at our opera-houses than Sir Michael Costa and Signor Arditi? It is not certain, however, that they could pen readable analyses or good general accounts of the works; and it is quite certain that one musical conductor who does duty in a morning paper as musical critic, writes as if with his own stick. Among English composers, we only know of one, a man of high reputation, writing under the initials, "G. A. M.," who criticizes music in print. To undoubted knowledge of his subject, he unites great critical aptitude—which, by the way, does not mean that we always agree with him; but there is no denying the fact that he occasionally writes like an amateur. He does not write with a stick, he writes with a very good pen; only he sometimes forgets to mend it.

The amateur critic is almost a necessary evil, then. But he is only an evil by comparison with that critic armed at all points, whom it is so difficult to find, though we know that he is not by any means beyond the reach of discovery. Indeed, the amateur critic, if he will keep to his own proper sphere, and write sincerely according to his own lights, may even do good; and he may prove a true benefactor to society, if, by judicious expostulation and satire, he helps to keep down the pretensions of amateur vocalists and musicians.—Girls of the Period Miscellany.

The Quackery of Concerts.

[From the Evening Bulletin, Philadelphia.]

The exhibition of music as an art, and one of the most refined and refining of arts, seems to have almost gone out of vogue. The good old days of really grand opera, of great dramatic singers, of vocal skill free from tricks, of conscientious study for instruments as well as voices, of enthusiasm free from quackery and of ambition that is not wholly sordid, seems to be gone forever. Even the men and women of great genius in music have become mere mercenaries. They are the hirelings of charlatans and showmen, who study the tastes of the most vulgar among the public, and degrade the gifts of the genius they employ to do such work as will please those whose admiration is excited by the monstrous rather than by the beautiful; by the marvelous rather than the artistic.

It is a misfortune to music and musical taste in America that New York is the chief port, we may say the only port, where foreign artists of all kinds land on coming to America to seek their fortunes. The business of art has thus come to resemble all other kinds of business in New York. It is a business of humbug, of deception, of gambling; resembling in manner, if not in degree, the business of Wall street or the Gold Room. The chief of the gold and stock gamblers, in fact, has been lately noted as one of the chief operators in musical speculations. The most scandalously managed railroad in the country is identified with what is called a "Grand Opera House." The manager of the railroad and the lessee of this Grand Opera being one, there is gambling and swindling in Erie, while there is vulgarity, nastiness and vice in music. The same system that resorts to a "corner" in a stock, or a "locking up" of gold or currency, resorts also to the exhibition of shameless women in a ballet, and filthy acting in what is avowedly a burlesque of music as well as morality in an opera. There is money to be made by the degradation of art, as well as by the degradation of morals, and New York is full of speculators in vice of all kinds.

Even the most conscientious musical artists must pass through New York before going to Philadelphia and other great cities, and they must fall into the hands of those gamblers and speculators who have taken the musical or dramatic line of business as a safe and comparatively genteel line. It has become a pretty well established fact that few musical entertainments, given by strangers in New York, pay more than their expenses. An artist, arriving there, has to pay an agent; then the agent has to pay enormous advertising bills, and has also to pay the Bohemians of the press for first class notices; then come the expenses of a concert hall, of an orchestra, of printing, of a claques, of bouquets and baskets of flowers, and of various other things required to secure a tolerable reception in a packed audience of dead-heads. It is pretended by the speculators that all this expenditure of money in New York is essential to the success of the artist in other cities. For when the New York papers report a reception such as we have described, the reports are expected to be copied or quoted from in other cities. Part of the business, indeed, of the agent or business manager is to cut out these so-called "metropolitan" notices, and send or take them to the offices of papers in other cities, with the modest request that they be copied, and with promise of abundance of free tickets when the puffed artist arrives. A good many papers, even in Philadelphia, have submitted to this imposition; though most of them have discovered that these polite agents are very sparing with their legitimate advertising, when the time arrives for the artist's debut. There are twice as many papers in New York in which concerts and operas have to be advertised, and the average cost of advertising is twice as high as in Philadelphia. The number of "dead-head" tickets is, of course, proportionately greater in New York. So when the artist comes to Philadelphia, it is expected that the receipts of the concerts shall not only pay the artist, the troupe, the manager, the advertising, the rent and the other expenses here, but also the enormous expenses in New York, including the pay of the Bohemians, whose so-called "critiques" we are expected to copy and commend.

In submitting to all this kind of humbug and imposition, consists the "provincialism" of the newspaper press outside of New York. Nobody really believes that the talent, the taste, or the incorruptibility of the criticism of America, is concentrated in New York. Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, St. Louis and New Orleans have each their fair share of educated and honest writers on music and the other fine arts. But they are not always all bold enough to resist the exactions or the cajoleries of the ingenious, well-trained, diplomatic professional managers of the New York school of agents for artists. There are many that are willing, for the sake of saving trouble and securing a small advertisement, to adopt and print the ready-made puff that the agent hands them, along with a package of "complimentary" tickets. Against this sort of humbug the press outside of New York ought to protest; and first of all, the "dead-head" ticket system for concerts, &c., ought to be abolished. This can only be done by concerted action among all the respectable newspapers; for if only one paper, or only two or three, in a large city like Philadelphia, reject the so-called "complimentary" tickets, the rejection would be looked upon as quixotic or presumptuous. Harmony of action, among well-established papers, can do much towards correcting the taste that the New York press is vitiating, and securing a standard much higher, in morality as well as in taste, than that of New York. Then if, in addition to a reformation of newspaper criticism, there was a little more boldness in the audiences at our star-concerts and operas, there would be a decided gain for art and honesty. There is a great deal more virtue in a well-directed hiss, than most people are aware of. If it were only sustained by courage equal to that of the hireling claques that always applaud, art and the public would be the gainers. It would be almost worth while to hire a claques, in the interests of true taste, to hiss many of the musical performances that are presented in our mis-called Academy of Music and our principal concert rooms.

In these remarks on concerts, we are referring to those known as "star concerts." The noble performances of the New York Philharmonic Society, of Theodore Thomas's orchestra, and of some other recognized and legitimate organizations in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and other cities, that show real earnestness in art, are not, of course to be classed with the entertainments that are managed by the professional charlatans, and their being free from the vices of the quack system gives them an additional claim upon the generous support of people of taste. But the system of humbug, deception and clap-trap, by which the travelling managers from New York impose on the press and the public, ought to be known and condemned, until a reformation becomes absolutely necessary.

Revival of the Oratorio.

[From the London Orchestra.]

If the "new cast" in the performance of Oratorio composition settle down into a fashion, modern composers will pay increased attention to this high school of writing, and there will be a revival of the dramatic religious mystery. The new drama will not stop at the hash up of some scriptural historiette; we shall have a resurrection of the old personages, the virgins and saints, pilgrims and martyrs, and the strange and weird myths from the Golden Legend; situations that will try the vaunted powers of descriptive music far more than anything yet attempted on the operatic stage. The Oratorio fever is no new disease. Between the years 1759 and 1769 there were at least a dozen new Oratorios presented for public entertainment, so thoroughly had Handel tutored the general ear into a patient listening to his semi-theatrical exhibitions of song, duet, and chorus. There was a Judith by De Tesch, and a Judith by Dr. Green, and a third by Dr. Arne; a Ruth by Giardini, Hannah by Dr. Worgan, a Zimri by Stanley, Abimelech and the Prodigal Son, by Arnold, and half a score others made out of the comparatively unknown works of Handel. Tobit and the Angel; The good Samaritan, the thieves and their victim; Job and his three Comforters, with the hurricane and the new homesteads; Herodias, her daughter and the famous dance, and its tragic consequences—have all been realized in some sort of way, and are open to revivification. Good and grand as are the Oratorios of the Messiah, the Creation, and the Elijah, general interest has ceased with these works unless associated with some "new cast;" and new singers, especially new great singers, are not of every day occurrence. If Exeter Hall is to continue to be filled—and filled it easily and readily is when first-rate talent is announced—there must be fresh impulse shown in the grand school of composition and a new development of sacred drama. Verdi may better employ his time and talents in writing the religious dramatic than in joining unworthy partnership with a dozen second-rates in the concoction of a Requiem. The new sensation Oratorio is the true arena for a composer of such powerful and almost illimitable conceptions [!]

We have had no grand new Oratorios—the reduced demand has naturally led to the reduced supply. Italian and French artists, as a rule, do not read and recite in English, and without this accomplishment the foreign vocalist stands on no sure ground in the Oratorio. Our modern composers make a spring, and jump into the grand style with but the most moderate training in the principles and forms of choral writing, and with none in the higher necessity—the art of declamation in recitative and song, the true types of musical expression in the Oratorio. They grasp at a mastery over that which requires a combination of a Verdi and a Wagner!—the unfeeling flow of melody joined to the subtle portraiture of every incident, prominent or its opposite. And in these days musicians make supposititious great music at small pianos; big choruses at the keyboards of two-stringed piccolos. Is it any marvel that the result is unsatisfactory? Haydn wrote the Creation when sixty-five years old, and Handel the Jephthah when sixty-three; and these composers had been taught to work on paper without a piano, and each had passed through the ne plus ultra of composition half a century before. On leaving their tutors, the chapel masters, they were no doubt capable of composing an Oratorio; but they did not commence their career with testing such power, well knowing that nothing short of careful experience could clear their heads of elementary modulation and contrapuntal chaos. They had been familiarizing their heads and hands with the secrets of art; and before composing sacred dramas had to gain power over the heads and voices of vocalists, and to watch for and learn what in practice would touch and subdue the human heart. Haydn wrote the Creation without a first tenor part, for Vienna had no celebrated Tenor; but it had a magnificent Baritone for whom the new part of "Raphael" was specially composed. Mendelssohn wrote his Elijah for Jenny Lind and Staudigl, and the grand cast made the grand composition. The extraordinary and peculiar gifts of the two vocalists led to the new study and the distinctive character of the new music. There could be no following the common route with such help at hand.

Oratorio composition should be, and is, the true ideal of the dramatic. There may be in the Oratorio all that is in the Opera, but without anything that is low and mean, trivial and commonplace, meretricious or base. However heroic the action, if it be dull, cold, or tiresome, it is unfit for the Oratorio. It must be of that interest as to please for all time; hence, if the action is proper, and the characters well supported, and the music be written in the right spirit and with right power, the course of time does not endanger its musical position, as it so constantly the case with regard to the Opera. The Oratorio deals with the good passions of humanity, the Opera oftentimes with the malevolent and the debilitating. There may be misfortune and misery, temptation and iniquity, in the themes of an Oratorio. But these things are never introduced so as to pervert the judgment or corrupt the heart. A tableau of uninterrupted high virtue, with no shadow, or error, or indiscretion, would prove antagonistic to the feelings of a mixed audience. The Athenians grew wearied of Aristides the Just. It is not for virtue to escape calamity; a good man may be the victim of distress. Nor does retribution always take place. We hear of the decapitation of St. John the Baptist, but not of the awful judgment that swept away the sanguinary Herod. The distinguishing character of the Oratorio, is the fact that the course of events are of that high and absorbing nature as to forbid the association of light or low music.

With the revival of the Oratorio it would be desirable, for a time at least, to break away from the Scriptural hero and heroine. The novel theme of the Creation manifestly assisted in the new style of its composition. Haydn imagined his Cantata of the Seasons to be inferior to his Oratorio of the Creation; and accounted for the supposed fact, by being engaged with angels in the Oratorio, and with mere ordinary humanity in his Cantata. He was wrong; for the Seasons far transcend the Creation; his men and women in the former are realities, but angels discoursing over the first chapter of Genesis can, with difficulty be supposed to be so. The Creation was the first advance; Guglielmi had done something in his Oratorio of Deborah—and Guglielmi had been the favorite pupil of Durante—but the enormous power of developing movement manifested in the Creation threw everything of its time into the shade. It is in the development of the forms of modern school in high and noble spirit that we look for the legitimate advance in Oratorio composition. Take for instance the one form—the duet between two male voices. Since the days of Handel what has been done with this? Nothing. What is there to approach the famous duet of "The Lord is a man of war?" There are splendid duets by Rossini, Meyerbeer, and Verdi for male voices, but nothing of the kind has been attempted in the Oratorio. One is led to imagine that Oratorio male singers were so many tailors, and that it required more than seventeen to make up the duet; not a new joke, but one as pertinent now as when first made, if the practice of our composers be looked into. Again, there is the dramatic chorus of the opposite emotions, of which Handel gives an illustration in his Oratorio of Sampson—the believing Jews and the infidel Philistines. Modern Opera teems with examples of this striking combination; but nothing in the Oratorio has been done in shape, proportion, or style, to rival or even approach these magnificent examples of high imagination and consummate skill. As to the Aria, the field is quite open, for not much has been really effected since the days of Haydn. The first tenor song in the Elijah is a parody from a modern German; the "Hammer Song" is written upon Handel; and the "Hear, ye, Israel" a close copy of Sebastian Bach. Mendelssohn has thrown all his sweet and seducing spirit into these Arias, and thus made them his own, but they are sympathetic associations, not original developments. There is nothing of that originality, felicity, and perfect freedom that marks the Arias in the Creation; although it is but justice to remark that Haydn is by no means original in his celebrated aria, "With verdure clad!" He kept a note-book; so did Mendelssohn; a note-book is dangerous at a pinch. Handel kept more than a note-book; he treasured up outside manuscripts of high worth and walked into them boldly and nobly. The "new casts" of our popular Oratorios will, we trust, do something for English singing. We want new singers; native vocalists of real worth and talent. The youths and maidens of fine and rare voices must be secured and properly instructed. Why should not Oratorio singing pay? Why not pay as well as Opera singing? As a rule it has not paid, because the oratorio singer has not been the great singer. Oratorio singing has been remunerative to our really great native vocalists, but it will not support sham. So also with composers; the able man, the accomplished scholar in music, is well employed in the Oratorio and will be well paid. But the Oratorio is a stumbling-block for third-rate talent; and the common sense of the English mind is dangerously opposed to composers of this class.

THE INCAPACITY OF SINGERS is astonishing. Those who boast a musical education are popularly supposed to be able to read music at sight, and they certainly ought to be able to do so; but not more than one in a hundred can, except in the most limited way. If a composition departs from the beaten track which the voice has been accustomed to follow, they are at once in a maze, and only after special study and practice are they able to perform it. This is true of all amateur and many professional singers. We doubt if there is a person in Springfield or the whole Connecticut valley who is capable of singing any elaborate vocal part at sight, or after the careful reading over with the eye, which should fairly precede every test in sight-singing. We are not behind other sections in this matter; some of the famous soprano singers in Boston choirs are noted in musical circles for their "poor reading." Whether singers as a class are deficient in the perceptive faculties, is a matter we will leave to the phrenologists to settle; but their slowness and unreadiness in the respect we have mentioned cannot be questioned. There are ten instrumental performers who are ready and expert readers of music that is new to them, where there is one vocalist of equal capacity. The singers who are said to "sing anything that is placed before them," don't do any such thing.

The chief reason for this incapacity is the superficial knowledge of music which most singers possess. Unfortunately it has not been considered necessary that a singer should know much more than musical notation and something about the management of the voice. A broader and deeper culture is needed. A good singer ought to understand the laws which govern harmony and the structure of musical compositions. With this knowledge he is able to grasp the composer's idea (unless it be deeply concealed) almost at sight, and then can interpret intelligently the portion of it which is allotted to him to perform. Some singers discover these laws by intuition, but only those who have mastered them, and can give a reason for the faith that is in them, tread securely and on firm ground.—Springfield Republican.

A Musical Imposition.

I happened, one evening, to be at the house of the Baron de M., an intelligent and sincere lover of art, with one of my old fellow students at the Academy of Rome, the accomplished architect Duc. Every one, except myself, was playing at cards, some at écarté, some at whist, and some at brelan. I hate cards. By dint of patience, and after the efforts of thirty years, I have succeeded in knowing no game of the kind, so as to be safe, under all circumstances, from being carried off bodily by players in want of a partner.

It was pretty evident that I was being rather bored, when Duc, turning round, said to me: "As you are doing nothing, you might as well write a little music for my album." "With all my heart," I replied. I took a sheet of paper, and traced a few staves, on which there shortly appeared an andantino in four parts for the organ. I fancied I perceived in it a certain character of rural and simple mysteriousness, and the idea of fitting to the music words of the same description suggested itself to me. The piece of organ music vanished and became a "Chorus of the Shepherds of Bethlehem" bidding adieu to the infant Jesus, as the Holy Family are about setting out for Egypt. The players suspended their game at whist and brelan to listen to my sacred fabliau. They were as much amused by the mediæval cut of my verses as by that of my music. "Now," said I to Duc, "I will put your name underneath, for I want to compromise you." "What an idea!" he exclaimed. "My friends know that I am utterly ignorant of composition." "Well, really, that is a fine reason for not composing," I answered. "Since, however, your vanity scouts the notion of adopting what I have done, I will just make a name of which yours shall form part. It shall be that of Pierre Ducré, whom I appoint chapelmaster at the Holy Chapel, Paris, in the seventeenth century. That will give my manuscript all the value of an archaeological curiosity." As I said, so I did. But I had got in the vein of playing the part of a Chatterton. Some days subsequently I wrote, at home, the piece of the "Repos de la Sainte-Famille"—commencing this time, however, with the words—and a little fugued overture, for a little band, in a little innocent style, in F sharp minor, without a major seventh, a mode which is no longer the fashion; which resembles plain chant, and which the learned will inform you is derived from some Phrygian, Dorian, or Mixolydian mode of ancient Greece, a fact which has nothing at all to do with the question. In this mode there is evidently the melancholy and somewhat stupid character of popular laments.

In a month's time, I had forgotten all about my retrospective score, when we were disappointed of a chorus for the programme of a concert which I had to conduct. I thought it would be a good joke to replace it by that of the Shepherds of my Mystery, which I still announced under the name of Pierre Ducré, chapelmaster at the Holy Chapel, Paris (1679). The choristers at rehearsal, immediately conceived a great liking for this ancestral music. "Where in the world did you disinter it?" they asked. "You are pretty well right in saying disinter," I replied without hesitation: "it was found, during the late restoration of the Holy Chapel, in a cupboard that had been walled up. But it was written on parchment, in the old notation, and I had great trouble in deciphering it."

The concert took place. The piece by Pierre Ducré was very well executed and received even better. The critics praised it two days afterwards, and congratulated me on my discovery. Only one expressed doubts of its authenticity and age, a fact which proves that there are clever men in all classes. Another critic grew sentimental on the misfortune of the poor old master, whose musical inspiration had not been revealed to the Parisians till after a hundred and seventy-three years of obscurity, "for," he observed, "none of us had ever heard of him, and he is not mentioned in the Dictionnaire biographique des Musiciens, by M. Fétis, though that work contains so many extraordinary things."

The Sunday following, Duc, being at the house of a young and handsome woman, who was very fond of ancient music, and expressed great contempt for modern productions, when their date was known, thus addressed her: "Well, madam, what did you think of our last concert?" "Oh! it was a great medley, as usual!" "And what do you say to the piece by Pierre Ducré?" "Perfect; delicious! that is music if you like. Time has not robbed it of any of its freshness. It is true melody, of the rarity of which modern composers render us very sensible. Your M. Berlioz, for instance, will never give us anything like that." At these words, Duc could not help bursting into a laugh, and was imprudent enough to reply: "Alas! madam, it is my M. Berlioz himself who is the author of the 'Adieu des Bergers,' which he wrote one evening, in my presence, on the edge of a card table." The fair hostess bit her lips, and the roses of vexation mounted to tint the paleness of her face. Turning her back on Duc, she launched at him the cruel phrase: "It is very impertinent of M. Berlioz."

You may fancy how ashamed I felt, when Duc came and told me what she had said. I lost no time in offering reparation for my conduct. I published humbly in my own name the poor little production, but on the title page I put the words: "Attributed to Pierre Ducré, an imaginary chapelmaster," to remind me of my guilty imposition. HECTOR BERLIOZ.

A Torch-Dance, by Meyerbeer.

It is as instructive as interesting to observe how rapidly, in our days of universal intercourse, musical reputations adjust themselves, after the heat of immediate controversy has subsided. While Meyerbeer was writing,—reconsidering his operas,—agonizing himself over their preparation on the stage,—using every means of influence, direct and indirect, such as an ample fortune and an acute wit could compass, in order to win golden opinions from those who are thought to direct judgment,—his merits as a stage composer were attacked and defended with an acrimony alike overstrained and insincere whether in attack or defence. Now that he is dead and gone, the world is beginning to admit that he was more than an ingenious and opulent trickster—than a mere accumulator of sounds devised to tickle the ear at the expense of all truth and propriety: in brief, that he was an original individual man, who has left a mark on the music of his time which will not be very easily effaced.

Leaving undiscussed Meyerbeer's grasp over dramatic situation or passion, it may not be amiss to dwell for a moment on one of his excellences, which has been too generally overlooked—his power, felicity, and variety as a composer of dance-music. Why the subject of "the mirth of feet" should, in general, have been so disdainfully ignored by the critics and historians of Opera, I have never been able to comprehend. Consideration of it is indispensable to all those who have to deal with melody, and who conceive that rhythm was engendered by the dance and not by the song. No appreciation, at all events, of the grand and peculiar series of dramatic operatic, produced in and for Paris, by great men of every country, can be arrived at without a close study of ballet music. This, from the days of Lulli to those of Rameau, Gluck, Saccini, Spontini, Rossini, Auber, and Meyerbeer, has borne a most important and integral part in the show. As the last of a long and brilliant line of writers, no one among the list has been, in this department of the art, so felicitous, so spontaneous, and so varied as the one last named. I need merely recall his dance-music in Robert (including the three fascination-scenes), his gipsy dance and admirable statly minuet in Les Huguenots, his four dances in the ice-scene of Le Prophète, to illustrate my meaning. There is more beauty, genius, and charm in any single specimen of the above mentioned "incantations" than in the entire dreary Tristan and Rheingold of the unblushing and amazing Herr Wagner, who aspires to blot the Jews from the face of music.

This was most unexpectedly brought home to me here at Scarborough a day or two since, with a force strong enough to justify putting a word of impression on record. Among the many attractions of a place which has become the fashion to praise in print, the excellent music, provided as a standing attraction for the visitor to Scarborough, has hardly been sufficiently dwelt on. The results—produced with limited forces, by Herr Meyer Lutz, the conductor, speak emphatically of his skill, intelligence, and energy. Of their kind, and with reference to means, "times, and occasions," they are almost as praiseworthy as the performances at the Sydenham palace, organized by Mr. Manns, which have grown from modest beginnings into one of the most noteworthy institutions to be found anywhere. It is odd, and not over-creditable to those concerned, that the Londoner should have to go to Sydenham or Scarborough to make acquaintance with some of the most interesting music of modern time; such, for instance, as the ballet music of M. Gounod in his Nonne Sanglante, and Reine de Saba, or (to come to my immediate subject) a pageant dance by Meyerbeer, commissioned, even as Handel's Water-Music was in his day, for a regal festivity.

The four torch dances of Meyerbeer, written during his court service at Berlin, exhibit the most individual phase of their composer's talent as a master and inventor of rhythm. The one I have been hearing here—produced for the reception of the Crown Princess of Prussia, is in every respect admirable. The opening bar, a simple trumpet flourish, thrown into the stately tempo of a Polonaise, seizes the ear at once. The relief in the episode, which carries on the movement, more delicate and gracious in its melody than that of the principal theme, yet no less courtly and pompos, is admirable in its freedom and nature. The final climax, leading to the explosion of our national hymn, with the full force of the orchestra, is bolder, less shift, and less tormented than other examples of the kind existing in Meyerbeer's more ambitious works, and which have led to the not unjustifiable idea that he was deficient in resource, owing to his imperfect scientific training. Be this as it may, it is long since I have heard anything so distinct, so bright, so admirably adapted to its purpose, as this music; let the transcendentalists abuse it as they please, in uneasy confession of their own impotence and want of idea.

Scarborough, Oct. 18, 1869. HENRY F. CHORLEY.

Music Abroad.

ELDERFELD.—Herr August Lange, the composer of Die Färlie, has entered upon his duties as Capellmeister at the Theatre.

DRESDEN.—First concert given by the board of General Direction of the Theatre Royal, and Royal Chapel: Overture to Gnomon, Schumann; Air, Handel; Violin-concerto, Beethoven (Herr Lantersbach); Air from Titus, Mozart; "Variations," Rode; and C major Symphony, with Fugue.—First Soirée for Chamber Music, of Herren Lauterbach, Grütz-macher, etc.: Quartet in B flat major, Haydn; Quartet in E minor, Op. 59, No. 1, Beethoven; and Sextet, Brahms.—Concert given by Mdlle. Mary Krebe: Italian Concerto, Bach; "Carnaval," Schumann; Pieces for the Violoncello, Herr L. Grütz-macher; Pianoforte Solos, Beethoven, Rameau, Rubenstein, Seeling, Jakssohn, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Moschowski, Scarlatti, Raff, and Liszt; and Songs, Schubert, Krebs, and Schumann.

—The King has most liberally resolved that, despite the destruction of the Theatre Royal, the engagements of all the company shall remain in full force, and the salaries be paid as heretofore. The members of the company have had a two months' leave of absence granted them. The construction of a temporary theatre will be commenced forthwith. Meanwhile, Neumüller's Theatre is being prepared for a series of performances. So great was the rapidity with which the fire at the late Theatre Royal spread, that it was impossible to save anything in the building. Fortunately, the library was kept elsewhere, as were also the scenery and costumes. Thus with few exceptions, the different parts and the music were preserved. Nearly all the instruments required for the performance in the evening of the fire were likewise preserved, but a number of other instruments, which were in store, fell a prey to the flames. Among them was an old Italian double-bass of very fine quality.

DARMSTADT.—A short time since, there died here, in his eighty-ninth year, Herr Ferdinand Pohl. He was born at Kroibitz in Bohemia, where his father was a manufacturer of musical glasses. Ferdinand Pohl, having soon become a proficient on these glasses, studied composition under Naumann, in Dresden. He then travelled through Germany, Poland, Russia, and Sweden, playing at concerts with great success. He resided at Berlin for six years (1810-1816), giving concerts every year. His last professional tour was along the Rhine, and through Switzerland and Italy. On his return, he took Stuttgart and Darmstadt on his way, and, in the year 1818, was admitted a member of the Grand Ducal musical establishment at the latter town. In 1830, he was pensioned on account of ill health. He was, probably, the last virtuoso upon the once popular, but now long since forgotten Glasharmonica.

LEIPZIG.—Madame Norman-Neruda, the celebrated lady-violinist, played, with great success, at the first Gewandhaus Concert.—Herr R. Wagner's Rienzi has been produced.

VIENNA.—The Society of the Friends of Music propose opening their rooms, on the 2nd January, with grand ceremony, the Emperor himself being expected to honor the Society with his presence. The works for the programme of the inaugural concert will be furnished by Viennese composers, Beethoven contributing the overture to Egmont and the Sinfonia Eroica; Mozart, the "Ave Verum;" Schubert, the chorus, "Der Friede sei mit Euch;" and Haydn, the "Variations" from the "Kaiser Quartet." The programmes of the subsequent concerts will include, among other compositions, Faust Symphony (new), Liszt; Cantata (new), Weber; Reformations-Symphonie, and Elijah, Mendelssohn; Paradies und die Peri, Schumann; L'Enfance du Christ, Berlioz; and Pianoforte Fantasia (new), and Der Thurm zu Babel, a sacred opera (new), Rubinstein. Herr Herbeck, the new musical director at the Imperial Opera-house, made his first appearance as conductor at that establishment a short time since, when he conducted M. Ambroise Thomas's Mignon.

MILAN.—It is said that the first opera at the Scala, during the approaching Carnival season, will be Pietro di Medici, by Prince Poniatowski, and that the new opera d'obbligo will be furnished by Señor Gomez, the young Mexican maestro. There is some talk, also, of the production of Amleto, not by M. Ambroise Thomas, but by Signor Faccio, a young composer; who, according to his friends, has a brilliant future before him.

FRANKFORT ON-THAINE.—Herr Wilhelmj, unquestionably a violinist of the very first class, as far as manual dexterity is concerned, appeared at the first Museums Concert, and played Paganini's first Concerto, and Ernst's Otello Fantasia. His success with the public was naturally something extraordinary; critics, however, cannot be satisfied with Herr Wilhelmj's professional principles. It is now about a year that Herr Wilhelmj has played nothing but the same four pieces (a Violin Concerto, Rubinstein; the Otello Fantasia, and "Ungarische Lieder," Ernst; and the First Concerto, Paganini). Now, in our opinion, the automaton-like rendering—far, after all, such it must in the end become—of these pieces does not afford much proof of artistic feeling. It is plain that the artist is wearied by his own performance, and that his great object is to get it over as soon as possible, so as to repeat the same manoeuvre at another concert. Were Herr Wilhelmj less highly gifted than he is, it would be unnecessary to waste a word upon the subject. But as he has been endowed by nature with the most eminent talent as a violinist, such a course ought to be most severely censured. It is to be hoped that Herr Wilhelmj will not allow his youth to pass away so uselessly, but, for the benefit of true art, that he will strive to attain that ideal, which, up to the present time, no one save his master, Joachim, has achieved. Let him do this, and he will assuredly reap a rich reward. —Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

At the first Gürzonich concert, Dr. Ferdinand Hiller appeared in the triple character of conductor, composer (the overture to Demetrius), and virtuoso (Mozart's concerto in A minor).

ST. PETERSBURGH.—It is the intention of the Philharmonic Society to give, during the approaching season, and on a plan drawn up by Professor J. Promberger, three grand historical concerts, which shall comprehend the most striking phases and stages of development in the history of music. The first concert will embrace the period from the Gregorian chant down to Bach and Handel, inclusive; the second will be devoted to the great German reformers, Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven; while the third will represent the romantic school, with Beethoven (in his third period) and C. M. Weber at their head, followed by Schubert, Rossini, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Berlioz, Schumann, Glinka, and the founder of national Russian opera, and Richard Wagner. In addition to the resources of the Philharmonic Society itself, all the Vocal Unions in the Russian capital will take part in these concerts, for which Herr J. Stockhausen is also engaged.

Two new Russian operas are to be produced at Moscow during the next season:—Les Habitants de Nischni-Novgorod, by M. Naprawnik, and L'Ondine, by M. Tchaikowsky. There is talk of a third:—Le Courtier de Mariages Thaddée, by M. Kaschperoff. Scratch a Russian now-a-days, and we may find a musician.

KONIGSBERG.—Ivanoff's opera, Cendrillon, has been very successfully revived.

GENOA.—The new management of the Teatro Carlo Felice has announced a series of buffo operas during the autumn season. Among them will be Il Matrimonio segreto, by Cimarosa; and Il Conte Ory, by Rossini.

Musical Correspondence.

LEIPZIG, OCT. 24.—Thinking you may like to hear something about musical matters in Leipzig, and from a pupil of the Conservatorium, I take the liberty to address you a few lines. I am no correspondent, but simply a musical student, and, I trust, a true lover of the divine art.

First, to tell you something about the Conservatorium. It has at present about two hundred scholars. For the violin there are just thirty. David tells me it is the largest number they have ever had at one time. For the 'Cello, I am sorry to say, there are only two or three pupils; one of these is a colored young man from Cuba, who plays now in the theatre and in the Gewandhaus concerts. Among the violin pupils there are several that are very good, especially for the orchestra. They have plenty of technique for solo playing; but something is wanting, it seems to me, to make them genuine solo artists. Whether the fault lies in the school, or in themselves, I will not undertake to say. There is no question that David is a great teacher of the violin; he likes to teach, and takes a great interest in all his scholars. His School for the Violin, no doubt, is the best ever written. And then he has done so much otherwise for the violin students, in revising all the best Studies, Solos, Sonatas, &c., of the old masters, marking new bowings and fingerings, so that they can be played in the best and easiest manner; for which I think he cannot receive too great praise. He has also done a great deal for orchestral playing, of which I will speak hereafter.

Concertmeister Röntgen, the second teacher—a pupil of David and the Conservatorium—is also very good; he teaches exactly the same as David. Their system for the Violin Classes is very good; for instance, Röntgen will have a class one day, and David the same class the next day, and they will play the same thing over to David which they have played the day before to Röntgen; this makes every thing quite perfect.

The course of studies, too, is very thorough. In fact, it is a regular School, such as one cannot now have in America. The beginning and middle classes (for Violin) have four lessons a week, and the higher classes three. Besides the lessons, there are other great advantages for the pupils of stringed instruments. These are: the ensemble playing, three times a week; and the Friday evening Abendunter- haltung. Monday afternoon, from four till six o'clock, we have Quartet and Orchestral playing, under the direction of David; one hour Quartet, and one hour Orchestral. The Quartet played is almost always that which is played the next Friday evening, in the Abendunterhaltung. For the Orchestral portion, the Overtures and Symphonies which are played in the Gewandhaus concerts are rehearsed, the wind instrument parts being played on the Piano. Wednesday, from three to five o'clock, the Ensemble is under the direction and teaching of Capellmeister Reinecke, when Sonatas for Violin and Piano, Piano Trios, Quartets and Quintets are played; sometimes Piano Concertos, with string accompaniment. Thursdays, from three to five, it is again under the direction of Concertmeister David, when the Quartet is again played, after which there come Piano Trios, Quartets, &c. Every pupil in the Conservatorium has the advantage of this Ensemble playing, either in performing or listening. Friday evenings, from six to eight, we have the Abendunterhaltung (evening entertainment), in which the pupils perform. First, a Quartet is played; then there are Piano Solos, Sonatas for Violin and Piano, Piano Trios, Quartets, singing, &c.

You will readily understand that all this tends to make good musicians of all the pupils of the Conservatorium. As probably you already know, this is one of the best, if not the best, school in Europe for the study of musical theory. Their system is very thorough; and if one wants to go through the whole course, he must remain here at least three years. The teachers, at present, for Harmony, Counterpoint and Composition, are Prof. Richter, Capellmeister Reinecke, Dr. Papperitz and Dr. Paul. Reinecke teaches Composition altogether. Richter, no doubt, is the best Teacher of Harmony. Papperitz and Paul are both pupils of Richter and Hauptmann. The teachers of the Piano now are Prof. Moscheles, Capellmeister Reinecke, Theodore Coccias, E. F. Wenzel, and Dr. Papperitz. Moscheles has been a very admirable teacher as well as performer; but he is getting a little old (about seventy-five) and of course a little childish; still he is liked by many for his thorough knowledge of Beethoven's music, and the manner in which it should be rendered. He still plays well. Reinecke is one of the finest pianists I have heard in this country; his technique is not so great as that of Tausig, and some others; but his expression and touch are beautiful. He is also an excellent teacher, especially for advanced scholars. Coccias is a very good teacher. Wenzel is eccentric, and does not play much, but is valued by many for his great knowledge of all kinds of piano composition. Papperitz as a Piano teacher, no doubt, has his good points, but his instrument, I believe, is the Organ. The teacher of the 'Cello is Emil Hagar, a pupil, I think, of David, the former teacher here; he plays very well.

Carl Gloggnier is the present teacher of singing. He studied in Italy and Paris. I think he is pretty good, but has poor material to work with; his best pupil is an American, a Tenor. I hear few good voices in Germany; they are by no means a singing people.

With all the good things, this Conservatorium has faults; it is a little "old foggy." The building is very bad and in a miserable place. The pianos they use in the Conservatorium are also very bad; in fact, there are no very good pianos made here; still they might have better than they have. But, with all its faults, this is a good place to study. It seems to me it ought not to be a long time before we have in Boston a Conservatory even better than this. I hope the time is not far distant.

Now for the Gewandhaus concerts. We have had, so far, three, and very fine they have been, I assure you. Last season I heard all of them, twenty regular ones, and two extra, for benefits. This season

I have the pleasure of playing in them. It is very instructive, as well as a pleasure; all the advanced violin scholars of the Conservatorium play in these concerts. Here is the programme of the first concert of this season (Thursday, Oct. 7): First Part.—Overture: "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," Mendelssohn; "O Deus, ego te," by Cherubini, sung by Frau Josephine Zinck, Königl. Dänischer Hofopernsängerin; Concerto (F sharp minor) for the Pianoforte, composed and played by Carl Reinecke; Recitative and Cavatina from La Donna del Lago, Rossini, sung by Frau Zinck.—Second Part: Sinfonia Eroica, Beethoven.—The programme of the second concert consisted of: Weber's Euryanthe Overture; Concerto for Violoncello, by Schumann, played by Herr Jules de Swert; Aria from Donizetti's La Favorita, by Frau Zinck; Air and Gavotte for 'Cello, Bach; Songs by Lindblad and Josephson (Frau Zinck); and, for Part Second, Schbert's great Symphony in C.

The third concert gave us: Overture to Anacreon, Cherubini; Adagio and Rondo from the Concerto in B minor for two Violins, by Spohr, played by the sisters Bertha and Emmy Hamilton, of Edinburgh; "Die Priesterin der Isis in Rome," by Max Bruch, sung by Frau Joachim; Variations for two violins, by Kalliwoda; Songs ("Von ewiger Liebe," Brahms; "Die Soldatenbraut, Schumann). Part II., Schumann's Symphony in C.

The Overture and Symphony were played as only the Gewandhaus Orchestra can play them, in a word, to perfection. Now why does this orchestra play so much better than most others? I cannot help thinking that David is the cause of it. He has brought it to this perfection. He marks all the bowings and fingerings in all the string parts, from the 1st violin down to the bass parts, and drills them to play everything as he has marked it. This, of course, makes all the parts play together like one man. And then they are made to pay the greatest attention to the expression; every piano and forte must be observed. This season there are fifteen or sixteen first violins; fourteen second; eight violas; eight 'cellos, and six basses, with the regular number of wind instruments. The wind instruments are good, but no better, and, it may be, not so good, as those in some other orchestras in Europe. Jules de Swert, the 'cellist, who played in the second concert, as you will see, is certainly the best I have ever heard; he is a Belgian, I think. I forgot to say that the Piano Concerto, composed and played by Reinecke, in the first concert, I liked very much; it is very well spoken of here. The third concert was also very fine. Frau Joachim sings very well, though perhaps she is not equal to Miss Phillips. The Hamilton sisters play very nicely together. Next Thursday we have Madame Schumann, which will be a rich treat.

Next Tuesday, the Enterpe concerts commence. The orchestra is not very good, but many times they have very good solo performers, and they play generally good music.

Nothing of account in the way of Opera has taken place in the theatre lately, excepting, perhaps, Wagner's "Rienzi." That has been given several times of late. I believe they will give soon Cherubini's Medea, which of course will be interesting. They give trashy operas here as well as in other places. Considerable Offenbach stuff has been given here this season, and it is well patronized, too. Still we get many good things during the season. The principal singers, with one exception, are poor; the chorus is pretty good; the orchestra is the best I have heard in any opera house in Germany, and I have heard those in Dresden, Berlin, and other places. The orchestra in this theatre numbers between fifty and sixty, and makes a splendid effect, the theatre being of just about the right size, and very good for sound.

NEW YORK, NOV. 8.—MAX Maretzek commenced his season at the Academy on Wednesday evening, and has thus far given four representations with marked success. His company is an unusually strong one. He has made extensive and careful preparations for the campaign, and is unquestionably entitled to success. Mme. Briol, the new prima donna, is extremely well spoken of by competent critics; while in Lefranc, the tenor, it seems to be universally conceded that Maretzek has secured a trump card. Opera-bouffe being laid out cold, Max has only to give us unhackneyed works, good chorus singing, fresh voices for leading roles, and his success is an assured fact. Miss Kellogg appeared on Friday evening in "Linda," and will appear this evening in "Crispino."

The Richings opera troupe has arrived here, and will appear in Fisk's Opera House on Monday evening, Nov. 15, in Wallace's "Maritana." Among the curious events of the season will be the production of Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" in English.

Madame Anna Bishop, who has visited all the habitable and uninhabitable regions of the globe, is now in this city and will give her first concert on Wednesday evening at Steinway Hall. She will be assisted by several artists, among them Mr. Kowalski (a new pianist from Paris) and Stephen Masett (Jeems Pipes). Mme. B. has given concerts in India, China, Australia, and various other out-of-the-way places, and has returned from a four years' professional tour around the globe, during which she met with much pecuniary success, and encountered all sorts of romantic adventures. I believe it is her intention to reside permanently in New York.

Mr. F. L. Ritter, our eminent musician and composer will deliver, at Weber's pianoforte warerooms, a series of five lectures on the "History of Music," on the Tuesday evenings, Nov. 8, Nov. 23, Dec. 7, Dec 21, and Jan. 4, at 8 P. M. Mr. Ritter states in his prospectus that in undertaking this enterprise he is "prompted by an earnest desire to promote real musical knowledge, and through this a genuine and unprejudiced enjoyment of, and judgment in regard to, fine musical works of art." It has been his endeavor in writing these lectures to treat, in each of them, as completely and comprehensively as the difficult subject would admit, of a distinct period in the historical development of music. Mr. Ritter also announces a "second series of the Historical Recitals, which were given here and elsewhere last season with the assistance of Mills, Von Inten, and others." Mr. R. is a man of great ability and of unfaltering earnestness of purpose, and these Lectures and Recitals will undoubtedly be very interesting and instructive.

Nov. 16. Mlle. Anna Mehlig, a German pianiste of distinction, has arrived in this city and will soon appear in public. I heard her in London, in 1867, at one of the concerts of the "New Philharmonic Society," and remember that she impressed me favorably as being an artist of ability.

On Thursday evening the Arion Society gave its concert at Steinway Hall. There was an orchestra of about 40 members, under the direction of Carl Bergmann, which played a Concert Overture by Raff, and there were solos by various people, also choruses by the Arion. Mr. Mills played the Chopin Concerto (E minor) admirably, albeit he occasionally forced the tone of the piano. The other artists acquitted themselves creditably, and the large audience, perhaps 1,200 in number, behaved in a good un-American manner.

On Friday afternoon the first "Rehearsal" of our Philharmonic Society took place. Why it was called a rehearsal it would perhaps be difficult to tell; for out of the five programme numbers but two are to be performed at the concert. Mozart's Symphony and the Midsummer Night's Dream music were in rehearsal, while Weber's Oleron Overture and two vocal solos were thrown in to attract the general public. Mrs. Moulton, the soloist upon this occasion, sang Mozart's "Voi che sapete," in a very enjoyable way. The lady is an amateur of acknowledged musical ability, is well known in social circles in this city, as well as in Boston and in Paris; and has a very rich, round, deliciously smooth mezzo soprano voice, which has been very highly cultivated. Her middle and upper notes are much better and stronger than her lower ones. She received much applause and evidently created quite a sensation. She is not to sing at the concert.

On Saturday evening occurred the first concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic society. The orchestra numbered about sixty, and the programme was the same that I quoted in my letter of Nov. 1, excepting that Miss Phillips substituted the Rinaldo aria "Lascia ch' io pianga" (Handel) for the one by Meyerbeer.

The fine and capable orchestra played the "Eroica" carefully and well, especially the first and last movements. In the Scherzo the trio was a little scratchy, owing to the uncertainty of the horns, which were weak, and occasionally failed altogether to be heard. The best orchestral playing of the evening was in Bennett's "Wood-Nymph" Overture; all the delicate points of shading, the crescendos, diminuendos, pianissimos, &c., were done with great fidelity and satisfactory attention to detail.

Liszt's Concerto is a pleasing illustration of the contempt shown by that author for all rules of musical syntax and prosody, and is apparently termed a "Concerto in E flat," for the excellent reason that this particular key is less used than is any other of the twenty-four. The piano part was superbly played (from memory) by Miss Topp, whose self-possession and thorough mastery of the instrument are simply amazing.

Concerts in Boston.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. The fifth season of SYMPHONY CONCERTS (ten in number) opened on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 4, with every encouragement. The season subscription is larger even than it was last year, and the Music Hall seldom looks more full for mixed and popular entertainments than it did for this feast of pure and classical music. Indeed the demand has been beyond anticipation, and there can be little doubt that, could people be persuaded that all the seats in the Music Hall are good enough for hearing (as is the fact), in a crowd so cultivated, quiet, sympathetic, hundreds of tickets more would readily be taken. The orchestra numbered on this occasion just sixty-five instruments, being slightly increased (in the "Janissary" department) to meet the requirements of the Spohr Symphony. The regular force is sixty-two:—12 first violins, 10 second do., 9 violas, 6 violoncellos, and 7 double basses,—making 44 strings, with the usual proportion of wood and brass. Mr. LISTEMANN leads the violins, Mr. A. SUCK the 'cellos, the brothers EICHLER still head the second violins, and Mr. STRIN the basses, so that, much as Schultze and Wulf Fries and the others of the Quintette Club are missed, we are not without ground of contentment. The wind instruments remain essentially in the same hands as before; while in the rank and file of the strings there are several good accessions, and, we think, the average quality improved; at all events the tone and volume of the ensemble is richer and more satisfactory.

The quickening to the musical sense and to the musical ambition felt here after hearing Theodore Thomas's fine orchestra, has perhaps improved our own symphonic prospects more than we can realize at once. If it has made our audience more exacting, so too it has made our musicians eager to come up to the new ideal. There was evidence of this already in the improved arrangement which Mr. ZERRAHN had made of his forces on the stage. The 'cellos, like Thomas's, were grouped together in a solid body in the middle front, the contrabassi behind them, and the wind band raised in two long rows above and behind all; the drums and heavy brass were better placed than Thomas's—the former back of the centre, instead of at the extremity of one wing, to stun those listening on that side.

The programme, as announced, stood thus:

Overture to "The Magic Flute,".....Mozart.
Aria from the same: "Ah! lo so,".....Mozart.
Symphony: "The Consecration of Tones,".....Spohr.

Overture, Op. 115, in C (first time in Boston),.....Beethoven.
Soprano Arias, from Italian Operas [arranged by Robert Franz],.....Handel.
Overture to "Anacreon,".....Cherubini.

The symmetry and charm as a whole of this programme suffered somewhat by the untoward accident of Miss WHITTEN'S illness, who was to have sung the Mozart aria, and the fresh melodies which Robert Franz has gathered from the neglected scores of Handel's operas. But an obliging and most welcome substitute appeared, at a few hours' notice, in Mrs. C. A. BARRY, who sang, between the two Overtures of the second part, three choice little songs to the apt accompaniment of Mr. LEONHARD. These were "Quando miro," by Mozart, "I saw in dreams," by Franz, and "O far away in visions," by Mendelssohn. Mrs. Barry never sang better; her voice seems to have gained in strength and richness, while the delicacy and purity of expression which has always marked her song interpretations was more than usually appreciated. The Franz song, particularly, made a deep impression.

Spohr's descriptive Symphony—on the whole the best of his orchestral works—had been heard here only once (six years ago) since the days of the "Germania." It was chosen with full knowledge that there would be various tastes and opinions about it. For our own part we are not partial to Spohr's music. It falls just short of inspiration, and often raises fine expectations which it as often disappoints. A rare musicianship, restlessly yet hopelessly refining on itself in the pursuit of delicate or strange modulations, till the effect grows monotonous, and its very beauty becomes mannerism, by no means devoid of feeling, of a certain drowsy sentimental kind, you cannot hear it long without satiety, and if with thankfulness, it is too much like that of the latter hours of a Thanksgiving day. But Spohr is one of the musical characters, one of the symphonic masters in his way; four seasons of these concerts have given us repeatedly about all of the great works in this kind; Spohr had never figured in them in any shape: he has too his great admirers; the Weihe der Töne Symphony, particularly, was remembered with great interest; how many new things are there better deserving a place? and, as the Die majores are to come in in every programme, would not Spohr sound better before than after the renewed impression of these great ones? Hence his place in the first programme. There is objection too on principle with many, and very justly, to any kind of a descriptive, "programme" Symphony; and such this is, professedly and purposely. Spohr always placed before his audience the key to its intentions in the shape of a somewhat lengthy poem by Carl Pfeiffer; the following briefer "Argument" did duty, not for the first time, here:

1. The first part opens with a slow minor movement, of a dull and broken character, representing the dreary silence of all things before the creation of sound, or more properly of Tones, when "Lonely lay the fresh, green meadows,

In the flow'ry pride of Spring;
Man amid the voiceless shadows,
As in night, was wandering.
He his own wild impulse followed,
Not the soft way of the heart;
Love no wondrous tones had hallowed,
Nature's meanings to impart."

Presently the music brightens, the harmony modulates into a more hopeful key, and the whole acquires a more eager and decided motion. Tones is born! A soft, flowing, fascinating melody (in the pastoral key of F major, like Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony), is commenced by the violins, and threads its way through the mingled voices of awakened Nature, the rustling of leaves, the murmur of brooks, the songs of birds, etc. In the clarinet you hear the earnest, syncopated notes of the nightingale; in the flutes, snatches of smaller bird melodies; in the oboe, the quick stroke of the German Wachtel (translated "quail," though not our quail); in the horns, the cuckoo, etc., etc. These cheerful sounds give way for a time to the wilder uproar of the elements, but return to close the picture in sunshine and serenity, as it began.

II. To the music of Nature succeeds the music of Humanity. The tones commence their ministry with the infancy of life; first we have the mother's lullaby; the merry dances of childhood; then the lover's serenade, etc. There is a strange commingling of different kinds of measure here—how like the changing pulse of youth!

III. To the music of youth and joy, succeed the spirit-stirring tones of manly energy and duty. This part of the Symphony begins with a vigorous march, and describes the departure for battle, the feelings of those who remain at home, the return of the victors (to the first melody again), and a chorus of Thanksgiving. In this last, one of the old, simple Ambrosian Chorals is carried on in unison by a portion of the instruments, while the others play round it in a figurative accompaniment, echoing and imitating each other's little joyful phrases.

IV. The mournful ministry of tones. It opens with another old Ambrosian Choral, commonly sung at burials in Germany, here gravely chanted at intervals by the violoncello, while the harmonies are richly and deeply colored, and the pauses are filled out with various touching melodies and motives in the other instruments. "Consolation in tears," is the title which the composer gives to the closing movement, which succeeds it like a soft summer shower caught by retiring sunshine. The piece ends in the pastoral key of F.

The Symphony was on the whole well played, although those "teasing realisms," as the Advertiser happily calls the bird sounds, &c., of the first movement, were not done by some of the wind instruments as if they were "to the manner born." But the violins led off beautifully, outlining the broad opening theme with delicate precision. If the whole Symphony realized the promise of that introduction and leading melody, it would be indeed a noble work. It is not a little to the credit of the orchestra that the mixed rhythms of the second movement, all of which is very charming, were so clearly marked and the unity of the whole preserved; the serenading solo sang itself out well in Mr. Suck's cello. The march was buoyant and enlivening, and the serious movements with Chorale were grandly impressive.—Yet how inspiring was the first chord of Beethoven after all that!

The Overture in C, op. 115, called "Namensfeier," because it was written for the "Name-day" festivities of the Emperor Francis II., in Vienna, in 1814, is commonly regarded as a companion to the much larger and grander overture (op. 124) in the same key, "Weihe des Hauses," or Dedication Overture, as it was called when given here last year. It was not a work to be neglected in these concerts, though it is not one of Beethoven's colossal overtures. But it is full of the Beethoven genius and vitality. The light, at first seemingly sketchy, quick movement, develops with a marvellous, delicate beauty, fulfilling each strange expectation with an easy certainty that still surprises and delights. It requires to be rendered with extreme precision and delicacy, and the orchestra were more successful than one might well have feared. At all events it made an impression. (This Overture, which ought to be heard more than once, will be given again in the fourth concert, which occurs Dec. 16, the day before Beethoven's birthday, when a programme made up wholly of his works will be presented.—The Zauberflöte Overture opened the concert in the best tone and with sure charm; the only pity was that Pamina's Aria—one of Mozart's divinest moments—could not follow, as had been expected! The Anacreon Overture was indeed remarkably well played, better than it ever has been here before. There was really a sustained piuissimo, and good light and shade throughout. All recognized the stimulus received from the Thomas orchestra, and the more than usual care which Mr. Zerrahn had given to rehearsal.

The second concert (this week), owing to Thanksgiving, had to anticipate its date by one day, and took place on Wednesday. Miss WHITTEN having recovered the use of her voice, the programme was as follows: Part I, Gade's "Ossian" overture; Aria from Zauberflöte: "Ah lo so;" Beethoven's Violin Concerto (first movement), played by B. LISTMANN.

—Part II, Overture to "Manfred" (first time), by Schumann; "Devil's Sonata," for violin, Tartini; two Arias from Handel's Italian Operas; Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony. We shall discuss it in our next, and, we hope, shall then be able to give the programmes for all the remaining concerts. That of the third concert, however, for Dec. 2, is in order now. It is this: Part I, Overture to "La Vestale," Spontini; Concert Aria (bass): "Mentre ti lascio," Mozart, (Mr. M. W. WHITNEY); Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52, Schumann,—all of these for the first time in Boston. Part II, Symphony No. 8, in B flat, (second time), Haydn; Ballads by Franz and Schumann; Overture to "Leonora," No. 3, Beethoven.

ERNST PERABO'S second Matinée, Friday, Nov. 12, excited so much interest that Chickering Hall was almost uncomfortably full. Three works were selected for interpretation,—all by Beethoven. First, an effective arrangement of the Egmont overture by Henselt, which the young pianist played with great fire and power; but we cannot help feeling that, while there is so much important matter written for the piano, overtures might as well be left to the orchestra;—we speak, of course, of the concert room, and not of private study. The second piece was the well known (but never too well) "Kreutzer Sonata," which was admirably played by LISTMANN and PERABO. Finally came one of the least known and most remarkable of Beethoven's Sonatas, op. 109, in E major, the last but two of them all. It has only been played in Boston once before, namely, by Mr. Dresel in 1865. At that time we described the work somewhat in full, but have no room to do so now. To us it is a work of rare interest, though in some parts strange. The real Sonata movement in this case is the second, the Prestissimo. The Andante theme and variations are full of the profound Beethoven feeling, though one or two of them may seem fantastical. Would not a repetition repay? for really the extreme heat of the room, that afternoon, must have dulled even the liveliest musical sensibilities.

Next Friday, Mr. Perabo will play Beethoven's Sonata, op. 110, in A flat; and Mrs. BARRY will sing an Aria from a Cantata by Bach, and a ballad by Loewe.

THEODORE THOMAS and his Orchestra returned to give us two more concerts, on Friday and Saturday, Nov. 19th & 20th, when large audiences showed how much their excellent performances are appreciated here. But the hurry of Thanksgiving has left us no room for more than this mere mention now. The same of CARLOTTA PATTI's second visit. We shall try to gather up these threads hereafter.

NEXT IN ORDER. This evening, at the Music Hall, Mr. HARLEY NEWCOMB'S Concert, with quite a combination of artists: Miss ALIDA TOPP, the fair pianist; Miss JENNIE BULL, mezzo-soprano, from New York; Miss WHITTEN; Mr. DUDLEY, baritone; Mr. J. K. PAINES, at the Great Organ; Mr. ARBUCKLE, Cornet; Mr. DOW, accompanist.

Next Wednesday, at 4 P.M., Chickering Hall, the LISTMANN QUARTET will begin. Beethoven's op. 59, in F, will open; and a Quartet by Raff, one of the new men, will conclude the first. Mr. WHITTEN will sing a Concert Aria by Mozart, and Schumann's "Two Grenadiers." Mr. ALEXANDER HEINDEL takes the cello part this year.

Many of our musicians and leading friends of music have arranged a Testimonial Concert to Mr. MATTHIAS KELLER, for Saturday evening, Dec. 4, at the Music Hall, which is looked forward to with a great deal of interest. Mr. Keller has been for years a worthy member of our Orchestra, a man of modest, quiet merit, and has acquired considerable distinction as the composer of Keller's "American Hymn," which has rejoiced the patriotic heart of many a large gathering, during and since the war.

"A Midsummer Night's Dream," at Selwyn's, with all of Mendelssohn's music done by Kopplitz's nice little orchestra, exquisite new scenery, artistic ballet, and all the resources of the admirable company of that beautiful theatre, will draw delighted crowds for many a night.

MR. RITTER'S FIRST LECTURE.—The Weekly Review, (New York) gives the following interesting report:

At Weber's hall, last Tuesday evening, Mr. F. L. Ritter gave the first of a series of lectures on the history of music. The discourse was characterized by ample and various learning, a skilful treatment of topics, and an earnest, impressive style of delivery. Mr. Ritter throws the force of a sincere nature into all that he undertakes, and embellishes his work with the fruits of abundant culture. His first lecture related to Harmony and the Folk-song, from the Christian era to the latter part of the fourteenth century. It must not be mistaken for a mere re-hash of historical works. While Mr. Ritter examines every authority to which he has access, on the subject of which he treats, he always bases his conclusions on his own judgment, after thorough examination of the works whose composers are mentioned. On this occasion he presented several original philosophical speculations on the aesthetics of the art. As the lectures will be published, when the entire series is completed, the public will have an opportunity to judge of their originality and substantial value. The lectures are in no sense a compilation from other writers. Mr. Ritter's audience was not large, though sympathetic, and full of interest in the subject. Mr. Ritter did not expect to attract the general public at once. Interest in these subjects has yet to be created here. As a speaker, Mr. Ritter's manner is pleasing and unembarrassed, his voice is sufficiently powerful, and his foreign accent not so pronounced as to render the meaning of what he says in any way obscure. After introducing his subject, and touching on the condition of music in America, Mr. Ritter said:—"No one of the other arts is encumbered with so many prejudices as music. Many even consider it an unfit occupation for masculine minds; its right position in the family of arts is in many cases not understood at all; its philosophical and æsthetic meaning is entirely overlooked. While we possess exhaustive works on architecture, sculpture, painting, and poetry, music has yet to struggle to find its true place. This is due, in some cases, to the one-sided education of musicians in general, and to their want of logical power. Thus, the interests of music are either in the hands of philosophers, devoid of the necessary technical education and experience, or in those of amateurs, who write about the art as their mistaken fancy dictates. Though there are everywhere honorable exceptions." After treating of the various arts, and their relations to each other, Mr. Ritter ranked their position thus:—Architecture as the low at and most material; then the plastic arts of sculpture and painting; then music, in which "the world, with its emotions, its feelings, is driven back into the heart. The artist's ideal thus rests in his own bosom, and it is reproduced in tone forms. Thus, though deeply felt by every man, music's real nature is less understood than that of the more realistic plastic arts. It is intensely subjective, and does not possess the advantage of uniting subjectivity with objectivity in so well balanced a manner as its older sister, poetry." Then followed a sketch of the true artist's mission. Mr. Ritter then gave a clear and detailed description of the gradual rise of music as an art, from its cradle among the early Christians, with remarks on the Oriental, Greek, Roman and even the barbarian efforts in a musical direction; a full account of the Gregorian chant, and of the services of St. Ambrose in the cause of sacred music. Many authentic and scarcely known anecdotes were related by the lecturer. "It needed but one step, and the solid foundation of that beautiful art temple, which stands in its wonderful glory to-day before us, would be laid; and this step was the discovery of harmony, and its general use in the practice of choral music." The gradual discoveries and improvements of Huchald, Guido d'Arezzo, Franco of Cologne, and others, were clearly explained. "Thanks to the devotion and industry of these monks in their solitary cells, the remains of the great intellectual life of old Greece and Rome were saved from utter destruction. Through their speculations and experiments, no doubt often crude, pedantic, and, to the superficial mind, seemingly insignificant, they unwittingly sowed the seed of those art forms which delight us to-day." Mr. Ritter concluded with a sketch of the history of the Folksong, which has existed for so many centuries, and which possesses so much significance in regard to the development of melody. "The Folksong is a naturalistic efflux of popular lyric song; the product of innate artistic instinct among gifted individuals of the people, seeking speech for those feelings which are awakened in the soul by the varied events of life." The whole of this portion of the lecture, treating of the hearing of the Gregorian chant and the Folksong upon each other, and on the music of the church, with observations on the minne-singers, etc., was especially interesting. "The Folksong," said Mr. Ritter, "long abandoned to itself, transplanted as chance would have it, to all the different climates of social and religious evolution and migration, overtook its more favored companion, the Gregorian chant, towards the beginning of the seventeenth century; and, as I shall prove in my lectures on the musical drama and instrumental music, supplanted it altogether. For, with the perfection of the musical drama and instrumental music, the tonality, which governed the Folksong, gradually became the pivot upon which all modern musical art forms were henceforward to turn."

More Elegant Extracts.

I. The Orpheonist, of New York, that spicy organ of the idiosyncrasies of Mr. C. Jerome Hopkins, is rich in matter for this column. In his last, after some pretty contemptuous thrusts at other musical journals, Mr. Hopkins honors us with one of his both-handed compliments:

Dwight's Boston Journal of Music is a delightful contrast to some of the above. It is like a glass of nectar taken to wash down a mouthful of dry ship biscuit. Here is at least one musical American periodical in which sound editorial scholarship and varied mental endowments are discernible on every page. Of course we do not swallow its old-fogyism—we never could. But it is pleasant to learn something from a musical paper, if only from the novelty of the thing; and there is a great deal to be learned even from old fogies, bless their dear, sincere old hearts!

When Mr. Beecher said that there was much to be learned on board of the Fulton ferry boats, it was not to show disrespect towards schools and colleges, but was only to prove that he cherished no contempt even for ferry-boats as schoolmasters. We always read Dwight's.

II. The New York Weekly Review furnishes our second extract, which is all we can afford this time; to-wit:

HOPKINS AND HAVOC.—The Orpheonist and Philharmonic Journal, the first number of which has just reached us, objects to everybody and everything—excepting C. Jerome Hopkins, the Rev. John H. Hopkins, and the late Bishop of Vermont, whom we take to be Bishop Hopkins, the father of C. Jerome. Etiquette would have placed the father first; but the business sign of C. Jerome must read thus:—C. Jerome Hopkins, Rev. John H. Hopkins, and father. "Ourselves" and "we," whenever alluded to, are italicized. On page two is an article which is hard upon the directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, more particularly one of them, Mr. George W. Warren, who wrote a mazurka called the "Little Gipsy," not the "Wind Demon" by C. J. H. Next, the Review catches it; but as our particular griefs do not concern the public, we will forbear to wipe our eyes on it. The next notice is to the effect that (our) C. Jerome Hopkins "did play and conduct as well as our poor abilities, and hearty laughter, would allow" in Boston. Dwight gets mauled next. Dr. Peck gets a hard rub for wearing "kid gloves" at an "oratorio" as conductor. Bernard Boekleman comes in for a column, in which his "grammar," "business," local habitation and name are rather indefinitely handled. F. L. Ritter gets a goodly share of "knock down." Mr. Ritter, who has the largest musical library in the country, comprising 3,000 volumes, in all languages, and who has written several symphonies, oratorios, overtures, classic songs, pianoforte pieces, and concertos for almost every instrument, dares to lecture on the subject of music! Poor Mr. Ritter, we believe, has abandoned the idea on account of these strictures in the Orpheonist, and will only appear on the nights announced. The recent so-called "National Musical Convention" gets the next connister—in which a statement is made that "we," (Hopkins and the Hopkinses) feel like the Pharisees and are inclined to thank Providence "that we are not as other men are." Other men are alike thankful for this arrangement. The Messrs. Steinway & Sons then get a shot. They unfortunately own a hall and organ, a "wheezy," "asthmatic" old machine. But the organ of the Young Men's Christian Association is praised on account of a "drum and bell accompaniment" which it contains. "These novelties," says the Orpheonist, consists of a "bass drum," "side drum," "cymbals," a "complete set of bells," and an attachment by which to imitate a hail-storm! And the Steinways are asked to furnish another kindred monster of discord. St. Cecilia forbid! Happily Hopkins cries havoc in vain. As was the case with Benedict, "nobody regards him"—save for merriment, and the marvel is that he will still keep talking.

WHO IS HE? The following explanation will relieve the minds of any who were anxious.

MR. EDITOR:—Lest some of my brother pianists be unjustly suspected of the crime mentioned by your N. Y. correspondent, I beg to relieve all possible anxiety of mind by confessing that I am the man who received the letter from Liszt, which letter is framed and exhibited in Ditson's window, in Broadway.

Instead, however, of consisting merely of "half a dozen lines" it is two pages long, and instead of being "recently received" it is dated "1859," so that I had "bottled it up" for ten years before allowing it to be exhibited.

By publishing these facts you will perhaps further justice by removing unjust and disgraceful suspicions from the innocent, and placing the disgrace upon the proper immodest and guilty head of your

Very obedient servant,

Beethoveniana.

The articles of which the following is the first have been communicated to the Musikalische Zeitung of Leipzig by Herr Nottebohm, of Vienna, who is well known as a profound and exact student of Beethoven. Mr. Nottebohm has devoted himself for many years to the exploration of Beethoven's sketch-books, of one of which he has published a reprint, accompanied by many useful and interesting comments,* and these articles bid fair to be a worthy continuation of that work, and of the new edition of Brietkopf and Härtel's Thematic Catalogue of Beethoven's works (1868), edited by Mr. Nottebohm, with many addition, and a most important contribution to the literature of the subject. ### I.—OVERTURE IN C MAJOR—OP. 115.

The Overture, Op. 115, is occasionally mentioned in catalogues and concert programmes under the title "Overture zur Namensfeier." The question arises: What right has it to this title? The original manuscript in the imperial library at Vienna bears the superscription: "Overture von Lu Bliven am ersten Weinmonath, 1814—abends zum Namenstag unsers Kaisers;" from which it appears that the overture was written for the Festival of the Emperor's Name-day, and intended to be performed on that occasion. It was not, however, performed either on the 4th October, 1814, the name-day of the Emperor Francis II, or on the eve of that day; but on the 25th December, 1815, at a concert in the Great Redoutensaal, for the benefit of the City Hospital of St. Marx, on which occasion it was announced merely as "an Overture."

The following is an exact copy of the programme, from which it will be seen that there is no indication of the overture having any relation to the Emperor's, or any other name-day:

"Die dabei vorkommenden Musikstücke sind sämmtlich von der composition des Herrn van Beethoven, und bestehen:

1. Aus einer neuen Overture,
2. Aus einem neuen Chor über Goethe's Gedicht: die Meerestille, und
3. Aus dem grossen Oratorium: Christus am Oelberge."

It was performed for the second and third time under the direction of Hänsel on the 16th and 23d April, 1818, at two musical evenings given by Messrs. Moscheles, Giuliani, and Mayseider. Upon the former of these the Leipziger Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, for 1818, p. 150, remarks—"The concert opened with a new overture, by Herr L. van Beethoven, which has only been given once before in public;" and at a later date (p. 174) apropos to the two concerts, "The very beautiful and spirited new overture by Beethoven delighted all the connoisseurs." Schindler in his Biography, third edition, I. 248, and II. 153, says, that "on the 10th May, 1818, this overture was performed for the second time in a concert of Messrs. Mayseider, Moscheles, and Giuliani, under the title of à la Chasse (Schindler's date is evidently wrong, but this by the way): Beethoven," he continues, "enquired the reason of the title and who had permitted it, but upon this subject nothing satisfactory could be discovered, each of the persons concerned laying the responsibility upon the other. In the catalogue * Ein Skizzenbuch von Beethoven: beschrieben und in Auszügen dargestellt. Breitkopf und Härtel, 1865.

† The "Wiener Zeitung," of Jan. 6, 1816, in its notice of this concert remarks that "Wrantsky conducted and Umlauf was at the piano." Why should Umlauf or any one else have been at the piano? Schindler (I. 248), says that Opp. 112 ("Meerestille") and 115, were first performed with the "Oelberge," on Christmas day, 1815, under the personal conduct of Beethoven himself. A report of the performance will be found also in the "Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung" of Leipzig, for 1816, page 72.

of Breitkopf and Härtel, the overture is entitled Namensfeier, probably because it was performed for the first time on Christmas day." On reading this passage it is necessary to remember that Schindler had no knowledge of the inscription quoted above from the original manuscript.

After this the overture was performed on the 6th Dec. 1818, in a concert by the brothers Wrantsky, in the criticisms upon which concert it is called Jagdouverture. Before leaving this part of the subject, we may mention that in the correspondence from Vienna, in the Leipziger Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung for 1819, p. 72, we find the following: "Beethoven's so-called Jagdouverture gave the same delight to its friends that it has always hitherto done." In Paris it appeared under the title of La Chasse, grande ouverture en Ut, &c.

The work was published by Beethoven himself (Steiner, Vienna), under the title, Grosse Overture in C dur, gedichtet für grosses Orchester und Seiner Durchlaucht dem Fürsten und Herrn Anton Heinrich Radziwil, &c., gewidmet, &c. As a proof that Schindler is incorrect in stating (II. 123) that the work did not appear till after Beethoven's death, we may mention that in the tenth number of Cecilia (August, 1825) mention is made of "Beethoven's overture Op. 115, lately published by Steiner in Vienna." A further notice appears in the 17th number of the same magazine (July, 1826).

These dates show unmistakably that if Beethoven did originally write the overture for the Emperor's name-day, he at a later period relinquished all indication of such a thing. The overture therefore can make no pretence to the title, zur Namensfeier.

The question still remains, Is there anything in its origin to entitle it to that designation? Was it written for any special occasion or was it not? Is there, for instance, any truth in the tradition that the two quavers which so often recur, are meant to express the word "viva"? We think not, and the following are our grounds for so doing:—

The first sketches for any composition containing a subject which is also employed in this overture, are found on loose sheets belonging at latest to the year 1811. It is a composition which Beethoven evidently intended to complete, and he has commenced writing it in score. What it would ultimately have been there is nothing to tell, as a few sheets only are in existence, and the score contains but one part (evidently the first violin) written on the top as follows:—

The remaining staves were left blank at the time, and have been subsequently filled up by Beethoven with other matter—sketches for the finale in King Stephen, and for the overture and other numbers in the Ruins of Athens, excepting the Turkish March, and the wind music behind the scenes.

It will be remembered that King Stephen and the Ruins of Athens were written in 1811, and first performed at Pesth on February 9, 1812.

At a later period Beethoven resumed his first intention, though in a different manner from that in which he commenced, but before examining this it may be well to mention that Fischenich, writing from Bonn to Schiller's sister, Charlotte, about Beethoven, on the 26th January, 1793, says:—"he intends to compose Schiller's Freude verse by verse;"—from which it is evident that Beethoven even at that early date, had the intention of setting Schiller's Ode to Joy to music. The sketch books contain continual references to such a composition, but the intention was never realized until the finale of the Ninth Symphony, in 1823.

In a sketch-book chiefly occupied with notes for the seventh and eighth symphonies, which Beethoven had with him at the Bohemian Baths, in the summer of 1812, and which is now in the possession of the representatives of the late Gustav Petter of Vienna, we find in the midst of the sketches for the first and last movements of the Eighth symphony, the following words:—Freude schöner Götterfunken Tochter Oeuvre ausarbeiten;" and two pages later a sketch, of which the following is an exact transcript:—

Freude schöner Götterfunken Tochter aus Elysi-um allen gut abgerissene Sätze wie Fürsten sind Bet-ler, u. s. w. nicht das ganze abgrissene Sätze aus Schillers Freude zu einem ganzen gebracht vielleicht p anfangen de Freude de scho - ner Got - ter Fun - ken

From these sketches, there can be no doubt that the subjects of the chief and middle portions of the overture, Op. 115, were intended to be used to the text of Schiller's ode.

The remarks interspersed in the above sketches show, first, that it was not Beethoven's intention to set the whole poem; and secondly, that the form he intended it to take was that of an overture; but it is not easy to see how it was possible without injury to the poem, to reject those stanzas in which Schiller rises to sublimity, as for instance—

"Ihr stürzt nieder, Millionen?
Ahndest du deſen Schöpfer, Welt?"

or on the other hand, how those stanzas were to be composed with the others into a consistent whole. Nor is it clear how the necessary vocal element for the illustration of the text could be infused into subjects of so eminently instrumental a character as those just quoted. Whether these considerations occurred to the composer or not, it is enough for us to know that the piece was never carried out according to this conception. In fact the attempt divided itself into two portions. Schiller's words assumed the necessary form, some ten years later, in the finale to the Ninth symphony, which is an extended system of variations, and of double counterpoint based on simple and broad foundations, giving opportunity at once for the greatest contrast and the greatest variety. With regard to the purely instrumental part, the "joy" which was inherent in it required a definite occasion to bring it to its proper development, and this may have been supplied either by the approaching Name-day, or by the prospect of a performance of the work. In this way its completion was hastened. Sooner or later some occasion was sure to arise for the production of the work. Thus the Overture, Opus 115, was neither in origin nor intention composed for any special occasion, but is the result of a study for the finale of the Ninth Symphony.

It is now easy to understand why Beethoven protested against the title, à la Chasse, and why both at the performance and in publication he allowed the overture to appear without any special title at all.

Before closing these remarks we would mention that, in a sketch-book belonging to the year 1814, and containing notes for this overture, the principal subject of the allegro appears, as in the quotations already made, in 3-4 time.

A Father of Opera.

Jean Baptiste de Lulli, the eminent French musician and composer, was born in Florence in 1633. When a mere child, he left the land of his birth; but not until an old shoemaker had taught him how to play the guitar. He was brought to Paris by the Chevalier de Guise, and presented by him to the Princess de Montpensier; for he had promised to bring her back a little boy from Italy. Subsequent history justified the selection the Chevalier had made; but at that time slight regard was paid to the foreign child, and he was sent into Mademoiselle's kitchen. Engaged in menial offices, he found recreation and delight in music. He purchased a cheap and broken-down violin, with which he made unto himself sweet music. It soon came to be known that the Italian boy could play skilfully. The Princess was told the story of it. She heard him, and preferred him in her corps of musicians. But Lulli was ungrateful. He spoke evil things of the Princess, and published verses reflecting injuriously upon her. He was dismissed, and from that time the vices of his Southern nature grew and strengthened themselves with the growth of his unrivalled talents.

He did not long remain without employment. The time was singularly favorable for the rapid rise of genius, and Lulli hastened to introduce himself to royal notice. He knew that if he could secure the king's favor he might defy competition. For it was the time of Louis XIV.—that bad and brilliant time, when great and illustrious thinkers engaged in miserable rivalry for the sordid favors of the court, and beauty of form and expression was held to be of more value than the discovery of truth. The King was the patron of literary and artistic talent. The national intellect was enslaved and impoverished under the closest system of protection. To be recognized by the monarch was the only avenue to distinction. Lulli's first step was to obtain a position in the King's band of violins. From that time he enjoyed uninterrupted success. He set himself vigorously to work as a composer. He trained a new band of violins, which rapidly became the best band in France, and he had not then completed his twentieth year. He took a leading part in the games which the King furnished to the people. The airs de ballet, to which the King danced, were composed by him. He was introduced to Molière, as great in France as Shakespeare in England, and wrote the airs for his comedies. Molière would employ no other pen than his. In return, Molière wrote parts for Lulli; and Lulli went upon the stage as a comedian and danseur. He played Pourceaugnac in 1669, and, in his flight from the doctors, jumped boldly in among the orchestra, smashing instruments, and causing consternation among the musicians, to the great delight of the King and spectators. No music pleased as did his. The King would listen to no other. Mme. de Sevigne could find no adequate expression for her admiration but in tears. "She could not think there was any other music in the heavens."

The King was no niggard in the bestowal of his favors. He showered goodness on his favorite, and the favorite got rich and saucy. He was naturalized as a French subject. Letters patent authorized him to found at Paris a Royal Academy of Music, out of which grew the French Opera, which Cardinal Mazarin had attempted to establish, but unsuccessfully. His work was immense, and his success amazing. He brought together and trained the actors and actresses, he re-organized the ballet, and established the orchestra, which up to that time had no existence. He was director of the theatre, manager, master of the ballet, composer of the music; and he had besides to preside over the complicated machinery for giving due and adequate representation to the compositions of his genius. Nineteen operas of his have come down to us, and are still high in the estimation of connoisseurs. Quinault, the unrivalled poet of French music, whose lines were already music before they came to the composer's hand, worked in partnership with Lulli. The method of mutual work was this: Quinault drew up sketches of operas, and laid them before the King, who selected one. Lulli studied the sketch plan, and made himself acquainted with it. He then wrote the music with variations, put in the dances and composed the overture, while the poet versified the piece. When Quinault had finished he read his work to the French Academy, and made such corrections in it as were suggested to him by that learned and cultivated body. If Lulli was satisfied with the poem, he wrote off the melody and the bass, and tossed the sheets, still wet, to his pupils, Lalonde and Colasse, who inserted the orchestral parts; for Lulli deeply detested the manual labor of composition. Then the piece was ready for representation.

Lulli was much sought after. His wit was bold and vagrant, and many noble men and women visited at his house and sat with him while he worked. Before the production of "Armide," one of his operas, he was very sick. His confessor insisted that he should burn the score of the opera, or he would not give him absolution. For at that time Romanism was at war with the theatre, and all professional actors were pronounced to be in a condition of mortal sin, and doomed, if they died in their profession, to eternal perdition. Lulli bought his absolution by apparent compliance. The Prince of Condi, who was visiting him the same day, said to him, "Baptiste, have you destroyed so valuable a work?" "Never mind," said the patient, "I knew what I was about; I have another copy." Sometimes his brusquerie paid scant respect to exalted people. At one of the plays given by the court, the King was wearied with the time spent in preparation, and sent to say so. Lulli replied, "The King is master here; he may weary himself as much as he chooses."

Lulli died in 1687, in the fifty-fifth year of his age. His character has been much aspersed. He is represented as a low, grovelling, mean courtier, selfish and jealous, brutal and insolent to those beneath him. It is said that he made use of his position at court to ruin and humble every artist that stood in his way, or seemed likely to attract the Royal attention; that he persistently persecuted Caubert and Bernier, and drove his pupil Lalonde from the orchestra because he acknowledged himself the author of an incomparable piece of music. He is described as a little creature of shabby appearance and slovenly gait. His eyes, small and piercing, were edged with a red-ochreish color, and shone with a dim lustre, betraying no less malice than spirit. A mocking leering expression sat upon his features, and eager restless movements dominated in his manner. The same unfriendly hand states that he was feared for his cleverness and cunning, and died unregretted.

But such a portrait of Lulli must be received with great caution. It is drawn in anger, and by an enemy. No doubt he was ambitious, unscrupulous, avaricious; but, like most men, he had some redeeming qualities. Besides outwitting the priests, he was a good husband and a good father, and his wife had no fault to find with him. He labored incessantly, not, as we believe, because he loved money and loved power, but from a pure love of work for its own sake. He belonged to that hierarchy of talent to whom work is meat and drink—and idleness degradation. He married Madeline Lambert who brought him a substantial dowry. It was a happy marriage. Lulli knew how to make money, and Madame at home knew how to turn it to good account. His houses, of which he had several in Paris, were remarkable for their good management. Without waste and without sumptuousness of living there was no penuriousness. He had three sons, two of whom, with less success, followed their father's profession. He died enormously rich, 630,000 livres of gold being found in his possession.

As a musician, Lulli was celebrated for the versatility of his genius: operas, symphonies, airs de ballet, occasional pieces, variations, Miséreres, Liberas, Jubilates, Te Deums—all were familiar, easy work to him. But his fame chiefly reposes on the music of his operas and lyrical tragedies, which appeared in quick succession from the establishment of the French opera in 1672 to his death, fifteen years afterwards. If we compare his style with that of the great Italian musicians of his time, we shall find nothing at first sight which does not belong to them in common. The choruses and the system of instrumentation recall the manner of Carissimi; the airs are copied from Cavalli; but we do find a difference in the strength of the dramatic passion which lives in and animates his compositions. It was the passion of his southern nature, breathing of the vines, and glory, and gloom of Italy; the power of forcible expression, of deep feeling that gave his works their lasting strength and hold over men's hearts. They were the first fruits of true, noble art in France. Rameau, who came after him, with all his power, could not drive from the stage the works of his forerunner. It required no less than the sublime inspirations of Gluck to shatter the foundations of that great popularity. The last representation of an opera of Lulli's ("Theseus") was given in 1778. It was then 103 years since it had first appeared on the stage. In the same year were played "The Armide," "Iphigène," and "Orphée," of Gluck, and the "Roland" of Piccini. In such imposing company were celebrated the musical obsequies of the founder of the French opera.

Lulli's works have their defects, and modern connoisseurship may smile disdainfully at the mention of his name. But be that as it may, the strains that he propounded struck a chord that vibrated through the land, and for more than a generation they were known and loved by a people educated, susceptible and discriminating. He wielded a magician's power in the ness, strength and quality of his expression, though he was open to censure for his lame periods, his instrumentation, feeble at times, his halting finales, and the undue repetition of melodious phrases.—Peoples' Magazine.

Bach's Passion Music.

Bach wrote five oratorios, called Passions. Of the five, three are probably all that exist; and of the three, only two are printed and accessible. These two are "the Passion according to St. John," and that "according to St. Matthew." The latter is the more important of the two, and probably the later; on the whole, it is the greatest work of the author. By a Passion is meant an oratorio which has for its subject the transactions of the last hours of the life of our Saviour. It has been the custom in the Protestant churches of Germany, ever since they existed, to perform a piece of music on the high festivals and solemn ecclesiastical days, as part of the religious service proper to the day—a custom probably originating in the "Mysteries" or Sacred Plays, common in mediæval times, and which still survive in the Marionette dramas annually played in the churches of the south of France and of Lombardy. On Good Fridays, the History of the Passion and Death of the Saviour would naturally be chosen as a subject of such a solemn music. In these compositions, the narrative of one of the Evangelists was taken, and delivered continuously in recitative by a solo voice, and the story was interrupted by verses, sung by the congregation, out of the Hymns appropriate to the occasion, drawn from the vast Hymnology in which Germany is so rich, set to those Chorales which form at once so individual and so interesting a part of her musical literature. This is exactly the method followed in the earliest Passion known, the date of which is 1573. By degrees, however, the strict and simply didactic form of the composition was much departed from; meditative and devotional poetry bearing on the subject was interpolated, and the Chorals were treated in a more scientific manner, or were varied in harmony, so as to lose the congregational character which they originally had. These changes were gradually introduced by the great masters of the German School, Koiser, Mattheson, Telemann, Graun: names strange to English ears, but in their own land highly honored; all of whom tried their highest flights in Passion-music. But the Matthew Passion of Bach far excels any of these works in dramatic power, and it would be perhaps impossible for anything to be acted with more effect if the solemn nature of the subject admitted of such a mode of performance.

The ignorance which exists with regard to all but a small proportion of the compositions of Bach, is truly remarkable. Besides more than 200 works for the organ; as many for the clavier solo; 30 for the orchestra; between 20 and 30 for the clavier and orchestra, including concertos for 3 or 4 pianos—besides all these, he left behind him no less than 250 great vocal works; Masses, Passions, Magnificats, Motets, and Cantatas or Anthems, containing music of the loftiest, alternating with the sweetest and most plaintive character. Many of these works are printed and to be had. They are of all kinds, severe and pleasing, easy and difficult. There is, therefore, no excuse for continued neglect of these great treasures. Let it cease to be the rule, that whenever a work of Bach is to be produced, the most difficult, harsh, and crude thing obtainable is chosen—let that false notion die, that he wrote nothing but difficulties, and that as long as his fugues were correct, he cared for nothing else.

Organs in England.

[From the "Orchestra," Oct. 29.]

I. THE ORGAN AND THE ORGAN PLAYER.

In after days these present will be signalized as the times for new organs. Never before in the history of this country have so many organs been erected in so short a time. Every new church and every new chapel, whether in connection with the establishment or outside it, has its organ; the instrument of moderate capabilities and unpretentious appearance being the ordinary type, although here and there crop up those of full growth and imposing exterior. The type has somewhat changed as to the character of these aids to church song. Our old organ as an artistic mechanism dates no further back than the days of Father Schmidt—the times of the great violin makers and the rise of concerto violin players—when the loud organ was made full of fire and force, and the soft organ was the very perfection of relief and contrast—a piano exquisitely distinct, sharp and clear. Father Schmidt's pipes cannot be commended for the beauty or symmetry of their shape; he thought fine tone of more value than exquisite workmanship, and resigned the pleasure of the eye to the industry and genius of the carvers. Schmidt's art work is to be found in his flying angels and oak-foliages, spread with generous profusion over the frontages and sides of his organ cases. There was no advance in organ construction until the days of Snetzler—the well-known builder of the Halifax, and many other fine organs during the last century. This great builder conceived fine tone to depend much upon beauty of shape, and under his direction the interior of the organ displayed a well laid out plan, and much care and labor bestowed on the outward appearance of the pipes. Upon these two types English builders continued their work, no builder exceeding Father Schmidt in force and weight of tone, none rivalling Snetzler in clearness and delicacy. Both are now however voted to be mediæval—the modern term for describing the organ of 1680 up to 1850. Mediæval work, as it is called, required but few stops to make a strong and harmonious chorus organ; modern work demands double and treble the number of pipes, and gets noise and not infrequently astounding discord as the result. Mediæval work could extract the most lovely tones from small metal open pipes, and a singularly light brilliant tone from the half stopped, or chimney metal diapasons. Modern art contents itself with making honorable mention of mediæval doings in this respect, and resigns all pretensions to rivalry. The modern Anglican fabricator of organs is an imitator of the great French builder, Cavaillé Coll, following, however, at a very long distance. We have lost our old noble diapasons of Schmidt's breadth and Snetzler's round and grateful characters. The old English choir organ of its famous five registers is extinct; and we are now supplied with pipes loud and soft, as the case may be, but without volume, and destitute of all true character. The pipes made on the principle of the ordinary whistle, no doubt whistle, and that is all that can be said of them. The wood closed pipes—the lovely stopped diapasons as they are termed—leave more to the imagination than they suggest to the ear; and the harmonic compound registers, the sesquialtras, mixtures, and so forth, are hard, close, and copper-toned, utterly innocent of the silver ring of the mediæval chorus. The modern trumpet, horn, and oboe stops are unquestionably infinitely better than the ancient work, and Parisian handling in these departments has come up to a high degree of perfection. Many of the French reed stops are wonderfully fine.

In every organ, whether large or small, each stop or register of pipes must sing its very best, for general beauty of tone can only result from individual beauty. Great vocalists make the finest chorus singers; and the combination of pure tones—soft, cheerful, brilliant, inspiring, forcible and fiery—makes the grand organ. There are two things which have led to the deterioration of the modern English organ—the low price, and the frisks of the architect who ordinarily knows nothing about an organ. The first great essential in the creation of an organ is room for it; all the fine organs in Europe attest the stern truth of this necessity. The pipes must not eat up each other; must not feed upon their mutual tone. The modern architect neither gives frontage, depth, nor height. The mediæval organ was commonly from 10 to 16 feet in frontage, 7 to 12 in depth and some three or four feet from the church wall, and from 18 to 36 feet high. The modern organ is often not more than 8 feet front, 6 feet in depth, and from 11 to 15 feet in height. Where Snetzler would plant twenty pipes our modern fabricator will stuff in double the number, and, as a matter of course, get just a quarter of his tone. Now that electricity can be applied to organs, that the key-board may be at any distance from the sound-boards, that one part of an organ may be in a chamber underground, another in the roof or next adjoining, and a third in the choir, and a fourth in the nave—that every possible kind of accompaniment is within the grasp of the player, if the organ builder has the brains, the place, the means, and the money—there is really no excuse for the present melancholy state of things. All that is touching and exquisite, graceful and elegant, noble and magnificent, is at the command of the organist, if the public will but pay, and the organ builder dwell over his work like an artist. There are violins to be had for half a sovereign, and there are those which are not to be had under a hundred and two hundred pounds—the difference arising from work and material. So it is with the organ. The real laborer must be paid, and properly paid, for his labor. Fine tone in the instrument is the expression of the patience and passion of the tone maker. It makes the great performer of sensibility and taste, and renders the audience universally sympathetic. It bears the character of its creator; it is the unchanging demonstration of his art-life, and invests the instrument with a warmth and individuality that time cannot take away. Our modern organs are without sentiment and feeling; there is nothing alive about them. They are without character and without style.

All this has a disastrous effect upon the organ player. Only the genuine organ performer knows the delight and resources, the enlargement of thought, the heightening enthusiasm, which the command of masses of pure tone always afford. Old Bach was ever more of himself when playing on a large Silbermann; and Handel, when young, often locked himself in St. Paul's Cathedral to revel for an hour or two with Father Schmidt. No one can bestow the highest finish of performance upon imperfect mechanism, and tone that betrays absence of finish and style. The finest player becomes dull and sluggish at a bald, meagre, and harsh-toned organ; and singers accustomed daily to sing to the accompaniment of a second-rate organ invariably fall into a negligent mode of producing their tone, and too frequently are found to have adopted some of the worst offences of the organ-tone maker. When there is an inferior instrument it would be well for the choir occasionally to sing an Alla Capella anthem without any accompaniment, and thus seek to avoid the possibility of a negligence which must necessarily accumulate into a habit if not carefully watched and constantly opposed.

Without fine ensemble in an organ, there can be no proper rendering of the master-pieces of the old organists. The preludes and fugues of Sebastian Bach are absolutely hideous on a bad organ. One may smile at coarse, vulgar, and extravagant music on a miserable organ, but good music on such an instrument is tenfold more disagreeable. Fine composition requires its complementary auxiliary in fine tone; and the preservation of purity in the ear can only be attained by excellent work in the organ builder. Many a clever youth has been utterly ruined by a bad organ. The essential and vital principle of fine performance can never be gained, or indeed associated with impure tone and inaccurate tune. Much that we have depicted touching the modern organ is in some degree the consequence of want of due care on the part of the clergy. The harshness or sweetness of an organ is too often measured by its price, and a muffled heaviness of tone is atoned for by economy in outlay. This is sad injustice to the church, the organist and the congregation. There is a degree of perfection to be procured at moderate cost, and nothing below this degree ought ever to be used in divine service. Bad work in the long run is the dearest of all work.

II. MODERN V. MEDIÆVAL ORGANS.

To the Editor of The Orchestra—

SIR,—I must surely echo the feelings of many when I express my thanks for your able article on organs in your last impression.

While agreeing in the main with your opinions, permit me to supplement your remarks with two reasons why modern organs are inferior to mediævals, and with two reasons why they are superior to them. Modern organs are inferior:—1st, on account of excessive scale. I take it that the principal cause of the sweetness observable in the organs of Schmidt, &c., is, that the proportions of pressure and scale are accurately balanced. Some of your readers may need informing that, as organ building advances, there is a growing tendency to increase scale (i. e. circumference of pipe.) This principle may be developed up to a certain maximum, and, so far so good. To obtain a round, full volume of sound, a large scale is, of course, necessary. But it may be increased beyond that maximum; and then it will be seen that the wind capabilities of the instrument are inadequate to the supply necessary to a pipe of very great breadth; hence the coarse, gurgling noise frequently heard in the powerful stops of modern organs. My opinion undoubtedly is, that this maximum has been exceeded by modern builders; and that, so long as the system continues, it will be vain to expect the round sweet tones of old organs. To prove my assertion, let any one take a pipe of a certain length (say four feet) and blow through the foot so as to cause a sound: then let him take gradually broader pipes of the same length, and he will find that his lungs are increasingly taxed, and that there is a breadth which will be beyond his power to inflate. Therefore, Sir, I think it would be well if our builders would somewhat diminish the present excessive scales.

2dly. I take the inferiority of modern organs to be occasioned by the presence of solo stops in the full organ. The proportions of diapason, octave and mutation stops are no human whim. They are constructed upon a natural law of harmonics as suggested by the monochord; and, when covered by a good reed, present a perfectly homogeneous quality of tone. This characteristic I believe to be completely impaired by the presence of such stops as wild flute, harmonic-flute, flageolet, gamba, claribel, bell diapason, &c., which create a totally contradictory tone, and in my opinion, destroy the purity of the full organ. Ardent as I admire those last named as solo stops, I would suggest that, when they must be placed in the great organ, they should not be acted upon by the full combination pedal; thus their presence would be excluded from full effect, while they would always be available separately and singly. But, when means are sufficient to provide choir and solo manuals, how important that such stops should be placed there, when they might stand upon a different pressure of wind from the rest of the organ.

Now as to the reverse case:—why modern organs are superior to mediævals—in addition to what you justly remark about modern reeds, I must place:

1st. The establishment of the C principle as opposed to the G; and, for the introduction of the former into England, allow me to say that we are indebted to no man so much as to Dr. Gauntlett, who, amid storms of opposition, persevered in the advocacy of its claims, and succeeded in convincing almost all the profession of its superiority.

2d. The adoption of the principle of equal temperament. However beautiful the tone of Schmidt's organs, music in extreme keys cannot be played upon them; e. g., it is perfectly impossible to accompany Mendelssohn's Elijah on an old organ. In these days, when wolves are extinct in England, I would that we had an Edgar to extinguish our acoustical wolf. For efforts in this direction let us be grateful to that accomplished musician, Mr. E. J. Hopkins, whose labors in this matter have been herculean.

Your remarks as to want of height in modern organs should be read by every clergyman and builder. I know of many instances where, for want of adequate height, pedal-pipes are actually laid horizontally on the floor, almost blowing in each other's mouths, and thus hundreds of pounds and months of labor are completely thrown, or rather blown away. I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

What is Music?

The answers to various questions differ as widely as the characters of those who offer their solutions. It depends altogether upon whom you ask, for upon the individual grade depends the quality of the answer. For instance: the magnitude and grandeur of human existence looms upon you, and you ask in the wonderment of dawning revelation, "What is a human being?" Question the anatomist. He will tell you of a marvellous bony structure, so exquisitely fashioned, so flexible, so light, so perfect in mechanism, so responsive in motion, so obedient in repose, so vigorous yet so pliant, that it forms at once the armor protecting from without, and the power exerted from within; the shield in which the human is enclosed, and the instrumentality at one with the actor. Ask the physiologist. He will tell you of a wonderful organism, a tissue of muscles, veins, viscera inwoven and over-laid upon the osseous structure, and supplementing its foundation; a complication of function, a complete system of action and reaction, by which the human is sustained, and nourished and impelled. To the physiologist, man is a vital being, throbbing, and pulsating, and breathing, and moving under the sense of life, actuated by its propelling and resistless force. Ask the materialist. He will reply that the human being is a creature endowed with a mind, therein differing from other grades of animal life; the natural life is similar, but there is a presiding intelligence that lifts to a higher level and calls forth a higher range of faculties; the mind governs the body, but there is nothing higher to guide the mind and direct its action. Ask the metaphysician, and he will affirm that there is an abstract something which has eluded the scientist, and baffled the materialist, and confounded the curious investigator of all ages; which yet, subtle, intangible, elusive as it is, is the essence of the human, the spark from which all action is ignited, the life-centre in which all things are conceived, and from which form, structure, function, vitality, results, all are evolved. So after all, life is more than anatomy, physique, mentality, or the concerted action of these effective forces. It is something back of them and apart from them, using them or reframing, but in either case distinct and apart from the organism which it constructs as well as controls. Perfect form depends upon the symmetry of the concealed skeleton, perfect health depends upon the good condition of the internal viscera, perfect sanity depends upon the balance of the ever active mind; and yet when we witness the noble action, the graceful mien, the dignity and power, the wisdom and discretion of a fine human being, we forget the ribs and the spine, the blood and the muscles, eye, and even the brain, in recognition of the spirit that animates the true identity of the person.

This preamble is not digressive, for to the swift thought I have already carried music through the analogy, and it seems almost superfluous to add words in explanation. It is true of music, as of the life, that "Soul is form and doth the body make,

For of the spirit body form doth take."

The truth is, we have too many anatomical musicians, who are not only confined to the form, but have not even filled in the skeleton, which is fleshless, bloodless, cold. To such it is yet, and will be for an age to come, twenty-four ribs, twenty-four vertebrae, eight bones in the wrist, five in the body of the hand, and fourteen in the fingers and thumb; it is all clavicle, scapula, sternum, thorax, and spinal column. These prate on science and dote on thorough base, and so execrants string their old bones together upon a wiry and rapid touch, and give you the glittering and polished outlines from which all substance has escaped,—empty ribs void of inspiration, hollow sockets bereft of vision, and smiling jaws that would fain assert the superiority of the remains that survive the life. Especially is this true of pianists—our modern pianists. The keys under their professional fingers rattle as glibly and dovetail as nicely as the bones of the skeleton, or rather, it is the mechanical action of their own fingers and wrist upon an instrument adapted to their dexterous manipulation; an action which fails to reach or touch even that sentimental organ, the heart, of which the physiological musician is so justly proud. To the latter music is vital, ruddy with the heart's blood, throbbing with passion, quivering with pathos, beaming with sentiment, surcharged with the natural emotions, and expressive of the natural relations and changes of this mortal existence; it shadows forth death in all its terrors, love in its intoxication, human hopes and fears in their bewilderments, and is always over-wrought, intense, exhilarating, sensuous, and fanciful in its effects. The Opera is of this school, and all warm-blooded, ardent, susceptible and easily affected characters are its admirers. Then there are the learned musicians, less fervent but more thoroughly skilled, who revere the wonderful thought-processes, and the rare powers of combination and construction evinced by the master composers.

And lastly there are—but where do we find them?—the sacred few who catch the interior meaning, deep hidden from the careless and shortsighted under the skeleton, under the flesh, under the finished exterior which the mind may note; these discover the soul of the music, which is the music, and which alone is responsible for the form that it assumes, for the rhythm through which it breathes, for the manner, resolute or tender, victorious or suppliant, dormant or pleading, exultant or de-pairing, rebellious or patient, that is a faithful transcript of the spiritual state, and never a meretricious effect giving the lie to the real experience. Parody genuine emotion by any imitative process, and the music becomes a burlesque and the performer a trickster. I suppose that all persons have been astonished at some time in their life by the feats and antics of a harlequin, and have caught themselves exclaiming: "How surprising! I did not imagine he could do that." Listen to the remarks in the concert room and compare them with the preceding: "What wonderful execution! What velocity! What power! What superb technique! What thorough mastery of the instrument! What a brilliant touch! What breadth and prolongation of tone! Did you ever hear any body play so softly? Was that left hand execution ever excelled? Truly it is a wonderful performance." Thank Heaven! Thomas and his orchestra quelled this stupid admiration and absorbed it in a worship that forgot at once composer, orchestra, director, men, management, everything, and dwelt for a space all breathless and intense and rapt, in the realm of pure sound, where the spirit of music left the form and transcended personality.

Look at the candidates for musical honors. I mean among pianists,—for the violin commands homage, and disarms, through its pitiful discordant screech, the pseudo artist,—but the piano, with its ready made tones and easy manipulation, seems to invite the digital gymnast to the attempt, and none are so deeply cognizant of music as to frown these down and check them effectually. These men advance to the instrument; we look at them, and find them as they average, small, young, flippant, insignificant, profound in nothing but a sense of their own importance, exquisite in nothing but their toilet, fine in no respect save in their mechanical skill, which is faultless. Some are endowed with good mental power, and all are gifted with the mechanical faculty; their exterior is fair, comely, and complacent, showing no signs of inward struggle or conflict, ravaged by no grief, torn by no doubts, troubled by no strange and inexplicable vicissitudes of spirit, nor yet filled with that sublime calm that succeeds the storm; they make their pleasant way in the world by means of their talents, which at once charm the people and extract dollars. What is this interesting person going to play? If he had a little more spirit he might play a capital polka; a little more poetic languor and he might glide over a waltz, although the Yankee business spirit might jerk it somewhat brusquely; or, if he was a little less civilized, with something weird and untamed in his nature, he could play a Tarantelle of Heller. But, to our amazement,—no, not to ours for we are used to it,—we glance at the programme and find that this poor little clerk in the storehouse of music is going to interpret Beethoven, or Mendelssohn, or Chopin; but whether Beethoven, or Mendelssohn, or Chopin, (or something of his own) the programme alone will enlighten us, for the illustrious works are all ground over in the same mill, and come out the same grain or chaff—which shall we call it? Look at the person and do not expect the performance to transcend the possibilities so clearly indicated. Do not expect an immature boy with a precocious intellect, to render Beethoven in his grand and incomprehensible moods, or Schumann in his rare and subtle tone-language, which is an intricate and obscure enigma to the present, and may be to the next generation of hearers. (?)

So great as thou art shalt thy works appear, but do not echo the sublime results which great souls have achieved by a re-awakening of tones that had better be buried than thoughtlessly evoked. Music is not purchased by any amount of study or practice, by any expenditure, by any travel, by tutelage at Leipzig, or obedience to its masters, by neither toil, nor persistence, nor willful endeavor, but only when the life has grown and rounded into harmony will it meet music as two advancing tides meet each other, and clasp in that embrace which is eternal!

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, NOV. 13.—The Parepa-Rosa English Opera troupe is just closing what is probably the most successful opera season ever given in this city. During the season the following works were performed: Il Trovatore (2), Fra Diavolo (2), Martha (4), Black Domino (2), Bohemian Girl (3), Sonnambula (2), Puritan's Daughter (1), Maritana (2), and Mozart's Marriage of Figaro, three times. Of their performance of Maritana, Sonnambula, Puritan's Daughter, and Bohemian Girl, I have before written. The Bohemian Girl was afterwards twice given, with Mme. Parepa-Rosa and Mr. Castle in the roles originally assigned to Miss Hersee and Mr. Nordblom. In respect to singing it was perhaps an improvement to put Mme. Rosa in Miss Hersee's place; but as far as appearance goes, it pleased me more to see Miss Hersee in the role of "Arlene." The other substitution, however, was much to the advantage of the performance. No tenor is more admired here than Mr. Castle, and on the occasion of his benefit we had one of the largest houses of the season.

Martha was a great success. The light and pleasing music of this opera, the unobjectionable nature of the plot, and the perfect familiarity of the singers with the music and the requisite stage business, combined to make a very pleasing ensemble. Martha is also better known here than any other opera, it having been played in Chicago upwards of thirty times.

But the event of the season was the production of Mozart's Marriage of Figaro, for the first time in English, and for the second time in this city. This opera was announced as "Mozart's chef d'œuvre," by which many understood "the master-work of Mozart" (the chief of Mozart's works), and not "a chief work by Mozart," which, your readers know, is the real state of the case. This work was written at a time when singers were plentiful in Italy, and demands two sopranis, two contraltis (if Cherubino be played by a contralto), two bassi, a tenor, a basso buffo, and one or two other quasi prominent voices. In the present case the roles were taken thus: "Susanna," Mme. Parepa-Rosa; "The Countess," Miss Rose Hersee; "Count Almaviva," Mr. Laurence; "Figaro," Mr. S. C. Campbell; "Don Basilio," Mr. Nordblom; "Antonio," Mr. Seguin; "Cherubino," Mrs. E. Seguin; "Doctor Bartolo," Mr. Gustavus Hall; "Marcellina," Miss Fannie Stockton. On this cast there are a few observations to be made. It admits of question whether Mme. Parepa would not more properly have been the "Countess," and Miss Hersee "Susannah." It is thus they do it in London, Tietjens taking the role of the "Countess." "Doctor Bartolo" ought to have been a primo basso of a voice at least twice as heavy as Mr. Hall's. Miss Fannie Stockton is a good actress, and, I am told, a most estimable person, but she has such a habit of singing out of tune as to render it necessary to omit the duet she sings with Susannah in the first act, and her song, "The hart and hind together," in the last act. The part of "Cherubino" was excellently done by Mrs. Seguin, who is good in everything she undertakes. Mr. Nordblom did well. "Figaro" was hardly lively enough, but the music was well sung. Besides, allowance should be made for the very great demands that this opera makes on the singers, requiring so much of their attention as to render it a labor of time to become easy in the stage business. The other three leading parts were done so well, Mme. Parepa, Miss Hersee and Mr. Laurence being so entirely competent to their respective roles, that it is unnecessary to praise them. Mr. Laurence, however, is entitled to the general commendation of doing all his parts in a thoroughly artistic manner. His presence is easy and graceful, his voice (a high baritone) of excellent quality and great compass, his enunciation distinct and elegant, and his acting animated. All these excellencies combine to form an artist whose accession to English opera was a most valuable one, and whose return we shall welcome with great pleasure. Miss Hersee also had the good fortune to prove herself equal to all demands made upon her, and she became a great favorite with the public. In the duet "Canzonet to the zephyr," in the third act, she has to sing alternate phrases with Parepa, and this charming ensemble piece, in which the smooth-flowing melody comes out through the combined exertions of the two singers and the orchestra, received the heartiest encore of every performance. The other pieces that received encores were Cherubino's song, "Thought cannot reach thee," and the long and difficult concerted finale of the second act.

The orchestra did very well indeed, thanks to Carl Rosa. How then was Mozart's music received by our public? Three performances were given. The house was entirely full every night. That is, every seat was occupied and several hundred people were standing. The last night was the fullest. Notwithstanding the enormous houses, there was less enthusiasm than on some less pretentious occasions. The music is so smooth and melodious, there is so little mere noise in the score, the pieces are of such equal excellence, while the arias do not terminate with a grand flourish of cadenzas, that the public were often at loss to know where to applaud. But the crowded houses at the end of the season, and the general interest, spoke more for the appreciation of the public than the most violent applause could have done. For one, while I find none of the grand and terrible in this, such as there is in Don Giovanni, I recognize throughout the same wonderful genius for melody, harmony, and instrumentation, that characterize that work. And I am quite sure that our public will welcome future performances of it with even greater interest. The troupe has Faust, Norma, and Oberon in preparation. I ought also to bear witness to Mme. Parepa's wonderful endurance. I have never seen a singer capable of enduring so much hard work.

I find that my allusions to organists in a former letter stirred up quite a hornet's nest. I might have said that Mr. Creswold, although faulty enough in his performances, is regarded with great favor by the public. He shares with Mr. Buck the distinction of being our leading concert player. We have a lively musical prospect. Yours,

DER FREYSCHUETZ.

NEW YORK, NOV. 30.—On Saturday evening we had our first Philharmonic (evening) concert. The programme included the following works: Symphony, E flat, Mozart; Pianoforte Concerto, E flat, Liszt (Miss Alide Topp); Midsummer Night's Dream music, Mendelssohn; with assistance of Mrs. Scott-Siddons and female chorus.

Of the symphony—the one with the famous minuet—it is unnecessary to say anything, except that one never tires of the freshness, spontaneity, and fluency of ideas so characteristic of the author, and so abundantly manifested in all his works. It was well played.

The Liszt concerto, played by so large and competent an orchestra, and in a building so well calculated for the transmission of sound, impressed us far more favorably than it did at the Brooklyn Philharmonic. Moreover Miss Topp, upon that former occasion, used a piano of very unsatisfactory tone and of but little power; whereas on Saturday evening she made use of a magnificent Steinway grand, whose full, powerful tones greatly aided to give the proper effect to the solo passages. The Concerto has four movements (an innovation upon the old rule which allowed only three), and each of them is merged into the other according to the plan adopted by Mendelssohn, so that there are really no pauses between any two of them, and each glides naturally and gracefully into the next. There is much quasi-recitative, and the changes of key are very frequent, and often intensely confusing to the unaccustomed ear. The Allegretto Scherzando is very neat, and, although somewhat uneven in rhythm, its very oddity is an additional beauty. The Adagio, too, has a piquant effect with muted strings, and is much more melodious than one could fairly have expected from Liszt.

The feature of the concert was, of course, the Mendelssohn music, which is the only sensible descriptive music I have ever heard in the instrumental line. The fairy Overture—breathing a very elfin atmosphere—the dreamy Nocturne, piquant Scherzo, and all the incidental bits, such as the exquisite Fairy March which preludes the advent of Oberon, Titania, and their train,—all these were performed, under the watchful guidance of Bergmann, with that excellence of execution and taste which has already given to our Society a distinguished name both here and elsewhere. Perhaps the most perfect performance was that of the Scherzo, in which the flute passages, especially, wore marvels of smoothness and finish.

The text and prologues were entrusted to Mrs. Scott-Siddons, who acquitted herself most admirably in her difficult task. It is no trifling thing for a woman—more particularly one with a comparatively weak voice—to so modulate it and its inflections as to take, with any degree of success, parts like those of Oberon, Titania, Puck, Flute, Bottom, Quince, &c. All this did Mrs. Scott, and did it well, too, albeit she scarcely filled the auditorium in every part. Her "action" and gestures were natural and appropriate, and, altogether, she achieved a decided and most gratifying artistic success.

The audience was a very large one, and it is most gratifying to believe that under the skillful pilotage of the President and his earnest condutors, the Society has entered upon its twenty-eighth season—with the 122d concert—with the brightest prospects. It is also pleasant to perceive that the unfailing presentation of the best music, performed in the best way, has gradually but surely elevated the standard of musical taste among us, and thus accomplished a noble work for art and for mankind.

The second evening concert will occur on Saturday evening, Jan. 8, 1870, and the fourth afternoon performance on Friday afternoon, Dec. 10. The orchestral works to be played will be a Symphony in C, by Raff; Berlioz's King Lear Overture, and the "Jubel" by Von Weber. The soloist will be S. B. Mills, who will play Chopin's F minor Concerto.

Music Abroad.

MR. CHARLES HALLE'S CONCERTS AT MANCHESTER.—Mr. Charles Halle inaugurated his twelfth series of grand concerts on Thursday, the 28th of October, being assisted (in addition to his band) by Mme. Norman-Neruda, as solo violinist, and Mme. Vanzini, as vocalist. The band this year consists of eighty performers, and is much strengthened, the string force being decidedly more vigorous and full. The programme was as follows:—

Overture "Egmont".....	Beethoven.
Aria "Qui la voce" (Puritani).....	Belini.
Concerto violin (E minor).....	Mendelssohn.
Aria, "Nobil Signor" (Huguenote).....	Meyerbeer.
Symphony (Jupiter) in G.....	Mozart.
Concertatauck, pianoforte, F minor.....	Weber.
Entr' Acte in B.....	Schubert.
Air de Ballet in G } from Rosamunde.....	Schubert.
Aria, "Vedrai carino" (Don Giovanni).....	Mozart.
Solo violin, Adagio in F.....	Spohr.
Solo pianoforte, Gigue in G minor.....	Handel.
Overture, "Crown Diamonds".....	Auber.

The excellence of the band and the advantage of the additional string power was very apparent in the "Allegro Molto" of the Jupiter Symphony and in Beethoven's dramatic overture. The first subject of Schubert's Entr' Acte is almost identical with that of the popular Pianoforte Impromptu in the same key, by the same author. Mme. Norman-Neruda has now fairly established her position in Manchester as a great artist. Both the pieces she selected have been played, and that recently, at these concerts by Joachim, so that comparison was inevitable. Nor need Mme. Neruda fear such comparison. Her interpretation of Mendelssohn's concerto was perhaps not so vigorous as that of the great Hungarian violinist, but nothing could surpass her rendering of Spohr's plaintive Adagio. She was recalled after both performances. Mr. Halle's performance of the Concertstück was delightful. The presto assai was deliciously clear in spite of its extreme rapidity. Mme. Vanzini was not quite in place at one of these concerts. Her intonation is far from irreproachable, and although she apparently prides herself upon her bravura singing her execution is often very unfinished. At the concert on Thursday, November 4th, Handel's Samson, was given, the principal vocalist being Miss Edith Wynne, Mme. Sainton Dolby, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Thomas. The concert will chiefly be remembered from the fact that Mme. Sainton Dolby made her final bow to a Manchester audience. The choruses were not uniformly well sung, those at the earlier portion being far from steady, and there was a deplorable want of uniformity of pronunciation, the defects being at times quite painful. It need hardly be stated how magnificently the band played the accompaniments under the able conductorship of Mr. Halle.—Choir.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.—The concert on the 30th ult. opened with a brilliant performance of the overture to Figaro. It was so well played that the enormous pace at which it was taken almost escaped observation. The "pièce de résistance" was Mendelssohn's ottet in E♭ for stringed instruments, which was performed by all the strings in the orchestra, 63 in number, including the contra-bassi. To stern upholders of the sanctity of the works of the great masters, this innovation would doubtless savour of presumption, Herr Manns, however, as was stated in the interesting analysis in the programme under the well known signature of "G," had almost the composer's own authority for so doing. "This ottet," says Mendelssohn, "must be played by all the instruments in the style of a symphony": that is, possibly, with a view less to the display of individual talent in the performers, be it in execution or in "reading," than to the completeness of the quasi-orchestral ensemble. However this may be, certain it is that the ottet gained in grandeur, and more especially reaped no small advantage from the firm foundation afforded by the contra-bassi, which did not play a "ninth part" but only reinforced the cello in particular passages. The graceful and sparkling scherzo (in G minor,) was played firstly with strings only, and then with the wind parts added by the composer for use in his C minor symphony. This work, exquisitely played, was applauded most enthusiastically. Herr Pauer performed Weber's pianoforte concerto in E flat No. 2, a work which the composer himself calls "much more brilliant and noisy (than No. 1.)"—a truly extravagant piece of storm and stress. He also played Beethoven's popular Andante in F, and a Tyrolienne by Mayer. Miss Delmaine, a debutante of no little promise, and a pupil of Mr. W. H. Monk, of King's College, sang with much feeling Weber's "Softly sighs" and a song by Wallace. She possesses a clear, delicate voice, skill in its management, and good enunciation, but uses much more gesticulation of a somewhat "stagey" character than is usual in a concert room. The other vocalists were Miss Sofia Vinta and Mr. Vernon Righy, the latter of whom contributed a most graceful song by Costa. The overture to Oberon concluded a delightful concert.

LEIPZIG.—Speaking of Mme. Joachim, a correspondent of the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung says: "The third Gewandhaus Concert again presented us with a most welcome visitor from your capital, namely, Mme. Amalie Joachim. This fair artist, unique in her way, was received with lively applause immediately she appeared, and, by her perfect performance, electrified the audience into uproarious manifestations of delight. As her first piece she sang a new scene with orchestral accompaniment, by Max Bruch, Die Priesterin der Isis zu Rom (The Priestess of Isis in Rome). For some time past, Bruch has not been very successful with his new compositions; the Symphony in E flat major; the Violin Concerto; the additional scene of Fridtjof; and lastly, the present work, all announce that the composer has made no satisfactory progress, a fact the critics have repeatedly asserted. It appears to me that Bruch writes too much, and exercises too little criticism on what he does write. The scene sung by Mme. Joachim produces a monotonous effect, in consequence of the form being too much spun out; it made, therefore, no particularly favorable impression, despite the admirable manner in which it was rendered." The other pieces sung by Mme. Joachim were "Von Ewig Liebe," Brahms; and "Sol-datenbraut," Schumann. The last she was obliged to repeat. Misses Bertha and Emmy Hamilton, of Edinburgh, met with fair success by their performance of an Adagio and Rondo, from Spohr's Double Concerto in B minor, and Variations for two Violins, by Kalliwoda. The overture to Anacreon opened the concert, the second part of which consisted of Schumann's C major symphony.—The Euterpe Association have moved into their new quarters, the old theatre, and commenced proceedings under their new conductor, Herr Velkand, who has taken the place formerly held by Herr S. Jadasohn. The two principal instrumental pieces at the first concert were Herr Bargiel's overture to Prometheus, and Schumann's D minor Symphony. The soloists, instrumental and vocal respectively, were Mlle. Mary Kreba, and Herr Scarla, both from Dresden.—A great feature at the fourth Gewandhaus Concert was the performance of Beethoven's Overture, No. 3, to Leonore. At the same concert, Herr Albert Dietrich, a pupil of Robert Schumann, made his debut as a composer, with a new Symphony, in D minor, which he conducted himself. It was exceedingly well received, Herr Dietrich being twice recalled. The soloists were Mlle. Fichtner, pianist, from Vienna, and Mlle. Steffan, singer, from Strasburg, but the general opinion among the audience was that neither young lady could be, as yet, considered up to the Gewandhaus Concert mark, and, therefore ought not to have been engaged. The programme of the fifth Concert comprised the Symphony, in G minor, by Mozart, and Mendelssohn's music to Athalie.—M. Ambroise Thomas's Mignon much resembles an out-and-out failure. A local paper referring to it, remarks: "In the first act, the public were indifferent; in the second, uncomfortable; and in the third perfectly bored to death. We trust this opera will soon sink into eternal sleep in the library of the theatre!"

The Symphony Concerts.

The second concert, of the 17th ult., instead of Thursday the 18th, which day President Grant, not going by the Harvard Musical almanac, had suddenly seized upon for the National Thanksgiving, suffered more or less in consequence. Partly by the absence of ten or a dozen of the orchestra, on their way to enliven country gatherings with music; partly by the generally unsettled tone of things in anticipation of the old autumn family festival; as well as by the stormy weather. Yet the attendance was very large and the concert generally made the impression of a remarkably good one. Indeed great improvement was acknowledged in the orchestra, as the result of careful drill and a renewed ambition, on the part of leader and of men. This was the programme:

Overture: "Reminiscences of Ossian".....Gade.
Aria, from "The Magic Flute": "Ah! lo so".....Mozart.
Violin Concerto, in D, op. 61 (first movement).....Beethoven.

Overture to "Manfred" (first time).....Schumann.
Violin Sonata: "La Trille du Diable".....Tartini.
Soprano Aria, from Italian Opera (arranged by Robert Franz).....Handel.
a. "Sommi Dei," from "Radamisto."
b. "Il vostro figlio," from "Rinaldo."
[First time in this country.]

Symphony, No. 4 (Italian), in A major.....Mendelssohn.

The "Ossian" Overture, full of dreamy northern eld, and seashore wildness, heroic shadows looming through the mist—music in just the tone of Ossian—had grown somewhat familiar in two past seasons of these concerts. It was on the whole well presented, bating some uncertainty of brass.

The novelty was the Overture from Schumann's music (instrumental and vocal) to Byron's "Manfred,"—all of which we hope to hear here some day with a recital of the poem, as it is done in Germany. It is a work which requires several hearings, and perhaps some study, to be enjoyed at its full worth; but it is certain to repay study. It is an overture not unworthy to be coupled with "Genova," one of Schumann's truest inspirations, thoroughly individual, full of delicate, nervous fire and beauty, intense and concentrated in the expression of its thought, and not the less musical and fascinating because of its dark and gloomy mood, and the restless agitato that renews itself continually after it has stormed itself out, subsiding for a while to pianissimo. It is full of syncopation in its rhythm, and of surprises in modulation. On the whole we doubt whether the great discontent of human life, in a passionate nature, could have been more powerfully expressed in music by any other short of Beethoven. Of course it does not come up to the Coriolan overture, but it will bear hearing after that. It is extremely difficult both for strings and wind, and the clear certainty and spirit with which it went told of earnest rehearsal.

The buoyant symphony of Mendelssohn, full of Italian sky and atmosphere,—hitherto passed over in these concerts on account of its familiarity,—came in refreshing contrast after Ossian and Manfred, closing as it were a rather troubled day with a rich flood of sunshine. It can hardly have been presented in such vivid and appreciable completeness before in Boston. The violins ran through that elastic staccato in the first movement with admirable precision, buoyancy and lightness; and the religious twilight of the Andante, with the measured tread of basses as through the shadowy aisles of some old church, was all beautifully expressed.

MISS ANNA S. WHITTEN, still not wholly free from the cold which had deprived us of her singing in the first concert plainly labored somewhat in that heavenly strain of Mozart, Pamina's short but perfect aria, which often soars so high in the ardor of its feeling; but the fine conception, the sincere, deep feeling of the music, the unfailing taste and sympathetic voice of the singer, so anxious to avoid a second disappointment of such an audience,—being at the same time one who cannot slight an artistic task, but must sing, if at all, with her whole soul and strength,—were equally manifest and had hearty recognition, albeit more reservedly than we could wish in outward demonstration. (Concerts, which are two thirds applause and encore, with more of froth than of the clear liquid music, are our abhorrence; silent listening is vastly better; and sympathetic silence is one of the measures of the sincere goodness of a concert; many people find it hard to lift their hands when the spell of music is on them; but there is such a thing as indulging this reserve too much; thanks and encouragement are due to artists when they bring Art home to us.) The want of more recent rehearsal with orchestra was also felt. In the arias from Handel's Italian operas, revived by Franz, with his admirable piano accompaniment, so true to Handel's score and all deduced from that, with only such freedom as one might use who had thoroughly "lived himself into" that, and so finely played by Mr. LONHARD (who also supplied the harp chords in the Ossian Overture), Miss Whitten was more at ease and very happy. The first, "Sommi Dei," is a noble piece of broad dramatic song, queenly and commanding in its tone. The second is a sort of Spring-like Barcarolle, romantic, fresh, as if written in these days of Franz himself, with a curious little lingering after-beat at the end of each period, and alternating from major to minor with a delicate fine restlessness of mood. Handel was a youth and lover surely when he wrote that. The singer entered into the spirit of both songs and made a rare impression with them.

If there was no Beethoven Symphony, there was the great Violin Concerto, with which one might well be content. Only we wish it were possible ever to persuade an artist to let us hear the whole work; like Mme. Urso last year, like nearly all of them everywhere, except Joachim, Mr. LISTEMANN vouchsafed us only the first movement. To be sure, that is half an hour long, with the elaborate Cadenza by Vieuxtemps, and none but the most assured master and the bravest would willingly risk himself beyond that; but of so noble a creation one would like to have the whole for once. Mr. L's rendering was very true and fine and full of fire; he held his audience completely, he and the composition, with the orchestra. Still more at home he seemed in the quaint and graceful cantabile, alternating with the frolic fancies, of old Tartini's "Devil's Sonata," of which we need not cite the legend. It is well worth while to renew acquaintance now and then with so genial a work. It falls within an easier range of tones than the Beethoven Concerto, which soars at the outset into the upper heights, and keeps itself there for the most part. The interpreter got very warm applause.

This week's concert came too late to pass under review until our next issue; but we fulfil our promise, as well as we can, of giving our readers the remainder of the whole scheme of programmes—premiering that accidents so often unavoidable, especially where singing is involved, may modify one or more of them before they come to performance. The pieces marked with a * are given for the first time in these Concerts; those with **, for the first time in Boston.

Chamber Concerts.

LISTEMANN'S QUARTET CONCERTS.—The first of the four was given at Chickering Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 24. It was a stormy day, and the audience discouragingly small. Surely the excellent character of these concerts last year should have insured a large attendance in any sort of weather. Those who were present had the best of it, enjoying a rare treat. The Quartet consists this year of BERNHARD LISTEMANN, first violin, FRITZ LISTEMANN, second, HENRY HEINDL, viola, and ALEXANDER HEINDL, 'cello—the last named succeeding Mr. Suck of last year. The programme was this: Quartet in F major. Op. 69. No. 1.....Beethoven. Concert Aria, "Per questa bella mano".....Mozart. "The Two Grenadiers".....Schumann. Quartet in D minor. Op. 77. (First time in America.) Joachim Raff. [Born 1822.]

a) Maestig schnell. b) Sehr lustig. c) Maestig langsam, getragen. d) Rasch.

It was interesting to hear the first of the Rasomowski Quartets so soon again, and at the hands of new interpreters, with the impression of it still fresh in one's mind after the recent "Farewell" of the Quintette Club. The wonderful work never seemed so clear, so thoroughly appreciable to us, as it did this time. Perhaps the rainy seclusion and faithful handful of listeners made one more impressible than usual; but we feel that in this respect, of clearness, the Listemann Quartet has the advantage. We wondered, however, at the very moderate tempo at which the first movement was taken. The parts were well balanced, clearly individual, yet well blended; the middle parts quite telling. Mr. Heindl's 'cello has not the sweet, sympathetic tones of Wulf Fries, sounds a little dry perhaps, but bids fair to be very serviceable in tasks of this select sort. Mr. Listemann's leading, is, we need not say, fine, full of verve, informing the whole with unmistakable intention.

The Quartet by Raff was very interesting, though in parts strange and lacking clear intention, at least on a first hearing; particularly so in the first movement (moderato). The Scherzo ("very merry") was certainly vivacious and showed lively fancy. The slow movement impressed by its full, large harmony and its sustained grandeur,—very impassioned withal; and indeed there is much dramatic fervor throughout the work.—Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, who is now really a grand Basso, does a good service in introducing the Concert Arias of Mozart (for a bass voice) into our concert halls. This one he sang superbly; and we shall probably have to say as much of another when we speak of this week's Symphony Concert. No wonder "The Two Grenadiers" were requested, after the effect which Mr. W. made with it in the same place a few weeks ago.—The second Quartet Concert will be next Wednesday, when Haydn's "Emperor" Quartet, and Beethoven's great B flat Trio will be played, Mr. PERABO taking part in the latter. Then we hope to see a full hall.

ERNST PERABO'S third Matinée, Nov. 26,—filling Chickering Hall as usual,—offered these temptations:

Overture to "Coriolan," op. 62 [C minor].....Beethoven.

[Arranged by Adolph Henselt.]

Ballade, a) "Mek am Quell".....Carl Loewe.

[No. 6, from "Blüder des Orients," op. 10, Series 1.]

b) "Wach auf," op. 9, No. 1.

Partita VI. [E minor].....J. S. Bach.

Recitative and Aria, from Cantata.....J. S. Bach.

[From Bach, entitled "Schwarz"]

[No. 9, I. Series arranged by Robert Franz.]

Sonata, op. 110. [A flat major].....Beethoven.

Another of the last Sonatas of Beethoven! which Mr. Perabo, to the gratification of a great curiosity in many, and much more than curiosity in more than a few, is letting us hear in regular succession. This one in A flat, next to the very last, is one of peculiar beauty, depth of feeling, and imaginative charm. It is almost like a drama in its tender, serious cantabile and its recitative-like passages. In the Adagio you feel taken into the inner life of a great soul—a sorely tried, long suffering, triumphant, loving, sweet believer in the absolute, eternal Good. The final Fugue, relapsing now and then into the adagio cantabile, and then rekindling and soaring like undying flame, charms and draws you irresistibly. It was perhaps trusting a half initiated audience too far, to give two such long selections from the old Bach in one concert. The Partita, too, in its seven movements, has some that can hardly hold the attention awake, even when played so clearly and elegantly as they were. But the opening Toccata and the Sarabande are nobly impressive, and the Aria and Gavotte were rewarding; but the Courante, in this as in nearly all Bach's Suites, is dry and lengthy. Mrs. BARRY would perhaps have carried more of her hearers with her in the Bach Aria, had not the Partita preceded it. As it was, she sang it beautifully, both the noble Recitative "The Herald comes," and the quaint melody after, so that, with Franz's piano accompaniment, it made a deep impression upon many. Could she have put a little more outward sign of life into it, and have looked less upon the notes, it would have helped the impression not a little. The Loewe Ballads made a charming feature in the concert.

Next Friday Mr. Perabo gives his last Matinée, when he will play Beethoven's last Sonata, op. 111, in C minor; also a Beethoven Sonata, for piano and cello (HEINDL), a Suite in D minor by Handel, and the "Prometheus" Overture of Beethoven.

THE SOUTH BOSTON CHORAL UNION (numbering 278 members) has organized for the ensuing season with the following choice of officers: Mr. J. R. Winch, President, Mr. C. J. Littlefield, Vice President, Mr. N. C. Connell, Secretary, and Mr. Eugene Thayer, Conductor. They will study the Messiah, Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, with some other works of a lighter character.

PERSONAL. The friends of Miss ANNA S. WHITTEN,—and among them are all our music-lovers,—are grieved to hear of her very serious illness.

Mr. B. J. LANG, having recovered from his long illness, sailed this week for Europe, with his family and several of his pupils, intending to pass a year or so principally in Dresden.

The death of Mme. GAISI, whose name was so long identified with "Norma," is announced.

The testimonial Concert to Mr. M. KELLER comes off this evening, and is looked forward to with quite general interest. Besides his "American Hymn," a number of his song compositions will be given.

The Complimentary Concert to Mr. M. W. WHITNEY,—thwarted by untoward circumstances last Spring,—is now revived under better auspices, and will be given next Saturday evening. The music of Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," was announced as an "Oratorio," will be sung by members of the Handel and Haydn Society, with co-operation of many of our best artists.

Miss ALICE TOPP, the brilliant young pianist, being about to go to California, and then home to Europe, will, besides playing in the Harvard Concert of Dec. 30, have a "Farewell" in the Music Hall, on Saturday evening, Jan. 1. PERABO and other artists will assist.

Mr. Ritter's Second Lecture.

In his second lecture, delivered last Tuesday evening, on the history of music (embracing the great epoch of Catholic church music and the madrigal, from the latter part of the fourteenth century to the death of Palestrina in 1594) Mr. Ritter traced the gradual progress of musical art among the Netherlands, Italians, English and Germans. In speaking of the great school of the Netherlands (Dutch, Flemish or Gallo-Belgic school), he related the inventions and improvements in musical forms, which were the work of those great composers, whose very names are scarcely known to our amateurs, and indeed to many of our musicians. Dufay, Ockeghem, Willaert, Joquin des Prés, especially, present an instructive subject of study. The little that is known of him is blended with so many foolish anecdotes and false statements, that it was satisfactory to hear something trustworthy in regard to this great man. For, as Mr. Ritter said, "a singular fate seems to have persecuted our greatest masters; their real existence, their real characters have been obscured by a store of absurd, untrue, and worthless anecdotes and criticisms, the work of dry theorists and superficial judges, who were never able to understand or appreciate genius when it did not accord with their figures. So it was with Josquin des Prés, the first really great genius who marked an epoch in musical art. So it was with Mozart, the last great universal musical genius. Even Schubert and Beethoven did not wholly escape a similar fate. After relating the circumstances that led to the invention of printing notes, Mr. Ritter gave a succinct sketch of the progress of music in France, Spain and England. The noble life and maxims of the great Morales presented a glorious example to our own musical youth—would they, or could they but follow it. The rise and flourishing period of the English madrigal was thoroughly discussed, and the best English composers in this form were mentioned, as well as many cultivators of the madrigal in the various Italian cities; a fine parallel was drawn between these schools. The life of the great Palestrina then followed; his various biographies, his works, and the well-known event, which gave to Palestrina the title of "Saviour of church music," were canvassed; "Though I could never understand, while studying and deeply feeling the beauties of the works of Palestrina's contemporaries and predecessors, that church music then needed a saviour," said Mr. Ritter; "yet it may have been then, as in our own day, that singers and organists ignored the noble works of truly great and inspired masters, and substituted in their stead, the vulgar, frivolous, insipid productions of mercenary art." Mr. Ritter considers that in Palestrina's beautiful works "Catholic church music found its greatest and purest revelation; they mark the culminating point, and at the same time, I may say, the close, of a great and unique epoch in musical art." In giving an account of the life and labors of Orlando di Lasso or Orlandus Lassus, Mr. Ritter explained the reasons that, in his judgment, have blinded Dr. Burney, and other meritorious historians, in regard to the value of Lasso's works, and deterred students from that study of his compositions (in common with those of all other great musically gifted minds) which is indispensable to progress in our own time. The lecture closed with a review of those masters and works (up to about A. D. 1600) "which gave to the Italian school that prestige which it retained in Europe until the beginning of our century."

Mr. Ritter delivered his lecture on the opera (the next of the course here), on last Wednesday evening in Poughkeepsie, before an audience of several hundred persons.—N. Y. Weekly Review.

THE BEETHOVEN CENTENNIAL IN NEW YORK.—The Evening Post of the 24th ult. reports as follows:

A meeting was held at the Fifth Avenue Hotel on Saturday night, to make arrangements for the Beethoven Centennial, which occurs next year. The following permanent officers were appointed:

Messrs. William C. Bryant, President; Dr. R. Ogden Doremus, Henry G. Stebbins, C. F. Looney, John R. Brady, Signor di Lucca, Clarence A. Seward, Rev. Dr. Joseph P. Thompson, Vice Presidents; Henry Clews, Treasurer, and Colonel Frank E. Howe, Secretary.

The following Board of Managers was appointed, with power to increase their number to one hundred members.

Messrs. A. T. Stewart, S. B. Chittenden, Moses H. Grinnell, Isaac H. Bailey, Charles C. Dodge, John A. Griswold, Richard L. Larremore, Horace B. Fry, D. Lydig Suydam, Charles E. Gregory, Moses Taylor, Townsend Cox, Andrew H. Green, Charles E. Milnor, C. Frank Chickering, R. A. Witt- haus, Frederick Kapp, Albert Weber, William Steinway, John Stephenson, James Geddes Day, T. B. Musgrave, Fordyce Barker, Henry C. Watson, C. T. Christensen, Edward M. Archibald, Blenar de Montmorand, Dr. Hermann Roesing, George Jones, Horace Greeley, James G. Bennett, Charles A. Dana, Manton Marble, David M. Stone, Erastus Brooks, Oswald Ottendorfer, George W. Curtis, H. J. Hastings.

In accordance with the report of the Committee it was resolved that the festival should consist of a succession of musical observances for a number of days, and that application be made to the Central Park Commissioners, asking them to appropriate a site for a building for the festival, and to take charge and management for the construction of the same. It having been further resolved that the Board of Managers be empowered to fill any vacancy of the permanent officers, and to take any further measures deemed necessary, the meeting adjourned.

PHILADELPHIA.—Mr. Carl Wolfsohn gave his first matinee, in the Foyer of the Academy of Music, on the 19th ult. The Bulletin says:—

The programme was filled, chiefly, with selections from Beethoven—for this was the "Beethoven Matinee;" but an Adagio from Mozart, played with exquisite taste and feeling by Mr. Rudolph Hennig upon the violoncello, and an air from Stradella, sung by Sig. E. Barilli, were added, and formed a very pleasing variety. The Beethoven selections were chosen in the best taste. The concert began with the trio in C minor for piano, (Wolfsohn), violin (Kopta), and violoncello (Hennig). The performance was in the highest degree satisfactory. The second movement was received perhaps with more enthusiasm than the other three, but this was due rather to its peculiarly graceful and beautiful character than to any superiority in the performance. Mr. Wolfsohn played two of Beethoven's sonatas (E flat major, and Appassionata) with delightful sympathy and intelligence. To his study of this master Mr. Wolfsohn has brought reverent admiration, keen intelligence, and indomitable energy, and he has succeeded in interpreting Beethoven's works in a manner which must be as satisfactory to himself as it is to his hearers. The remaining piece upon the programme was Beethoven's delicious Romanza in F major, which Mr. Kopta gave upon the violin in a manner worthy of a more pretentious artist. The entertainment was one of the most pleasing of the kind ever given in this city; and we regret sincerely that it was not enjoyed by a larger number of persons. The next, the "Schubert matinee," will be given on the 17th of December.

—The first of a series of oratorio performances will be given by the Handel and Haydn Society, in the Academy of Music, on the evening of December 14th, when Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise will be sung.

Grau's German Opera Company began an engagement at the Academy of Music with Der Freyschütz. It will be fair to judge this performance from a standpoint somewhat lower than that from which we would regard the more pretentious efforts of more eminent artists. Mr. Grau calls his company a "Grand German Opera Company," to be sure, but he understands perfectly well that people who glance at his list of singers will not expect entertainments of the most exalted character, and he has graduated his scale of prices accordingly. What he aims at is respectable mediocrity. He will give clever performances by clever artists, some of whom are excellent. He has no great prima donna and no superlatively great tenor; but, at the same time, he has no singer of any kind that is abominably poor. Madame Frederici has a good soprano voice, which is a little rough here and there, but which is never unpleasant; and she has a comely face and a most agreeable manner, which win for her the kindly sympathy of her audiences. She sang the part of "Agatha" very nicely last evening, and although her performance was not at any time remarkable, occasionally she deserved and received applause. Madame Rotter was even more satisfactory. She has a sweet voice and a great deal of vivacity and spirit. She sang the pretty song in the second act gracefully and well. Mr. Habelmann acquitted himself handsomely. The audience were asked to pardon his deficiencies, because of his hoarseness, but if he suffered from such a complaint, the effect was not perceptible. His performance was about the most satisfactory of the evening. Mr. Weinlich played and sang the part of "Caspar" in an unexceptionable manner. He has a very fine voice, and he is a good actor. Perhaps severe justice might demand harsher criticism of some portion of the performance of these singers, but we are inclined to be somewhat liberal, for several reasons; first, great superiority is not claimed for them; second, this was the opening night, and the singers were not accustomed to each other, or assured of the sympathy of the audience; third, the orchestra was shockingly bad. The orchestration of this opera is about the most delightful portion of it, but we are sorry to say it was given in a very wretched manner. Mr. Carl Anschütz, the leader, evidently entertained such an opinion of it himself, for he indulged audibly in continual criticisms of a very forcible character. The chorus, also, was very small and very poor. We hope Mr. Grau will remedy the defects in these two important particulars. Plenty of good singers and instrumental musicians can be procured in this city. This evening Martha will be given with a cast including Frederici, Rotter, and Messrs. Himmer and Formes.

Nov. 23. We quote the Bulletin again:

Mr. Grau has ventured bravely into newer fields, and has presented a series of operas, some of which we have not heard for a long while, all of which are of the higher class, and are as well worth hearing frequently as Travatore and Norma. Last week we had Der Freyschütz, Martha, The Magic Flute, Fidelio, Faust; this week we have La Dame Blanche, Stradella, La Juive, Don Giovanni, Robert Le Diable. For his enterprise in catering in this manner to the public taste Mr. Grau deserves great credit, and if as much care had been displayed at first in the organization of his orchestra and chorus, as is manifested now, we believe he would have met with even more generous encouragement.

Last night Boieldieu's opera, La Dame Blanche, was produced to the largest audience of the season. It was performed last night very cleverly by the German company. Mr. Habelmann carried off most of the honors, in the rôle of "George Brown," a part which requires for its just presentation a noble voice and fine histrionic powers. Mr. Habelmann acquitted himself in the most satisfactory manner, his vocalization being particularly good. His "Robin Adair," of course, received especial commendation from the audience; but it was not sung in a better manner than other melodies incident to the part. Mmes. Johansson and Dziuba also played and sang admirably well, and Messrs. Formes, Weinlich and Amand were good in their respective parts. The orchestra, under Mr. Dietrich's direction, was immeasurably better than it was at any time last week, and there was very perceptible improvement in the singing of the chorus. To-night Stradella will be presented.

Bach's Passion Music.

[From the German of C. H. BIRKEN.]

Bach, according to the statements of Mizler and Forkel, wrote five Passions-Musiken so-called.

These probably stood in connection with those five full-year courses of Church Music, which Mizler mentions in his catalogue of works left behind him by the great composer.

Of those five Passions two only have come down to us: 1. "The St. John Passion," and 2. "The Passion according to the Gospel of Saint Matthew."

A third Passions-Oratorium, according to the Gospel of St. Luke, of which a copy written in Bach's own hand exists in Munich, and a transcript at Berlin, the latter bearing the mark "di J. S. Bach in Leipzig," is open to most reasonable doubts regarding its authenticity. . . .

I. THE PASSION ACCORDING TO ST. JOHN.

This is probably the older of the two. But the date of its composition cannot be positively ascertained. We only know that Bach submitted this work to repeated revision, and that he set out to work it over again after the completion of the Matthew Passion, which was performed in 1729.

The poem seems to have sprung essentially from himself, at least to have been prepared after his express designs. It leans upon the text to the Passion-Musica, which Brocke had written in Hamburg, which had been composed by Handel, Telemann, Keiser and Mattheson, and to which Bach was no stranger, since he had himself copied off the score of Handel's composition. But this text did not reproduce the Gospel simply, but translated into (partly) very wretched verses.

The epic tone of St. John's Gospel, and the mystical element in this apostle's conception of Christianity, conspicuous also in the text to Bach's composition, may have been the occasion of Bach's following, in the putting together of the work, a more dogmatic philosophical direction, than was the case later in the Matthew-Passion, which passes more into the sphere of immediate life and moves in a more lyrical mood.

On the whole, the poetic structure of the St. John Passion is very simple.

The 18th and 19th chapters of the Evangelist, beginning with the arrest of Jesus, form the groundwork. Numerous Chorales, two Choruses (for the introduction and conclusion), and eight Airs for single voices, with various in part very abstract reflections on the sufferings of the Lord, are interpolated amid the Bible words. In the narrative of Peter's denial the composer has supplied from other Gospels what is wanting in St. John: "And he went out and wept bitterly." So too, for greater completeness, he has included the words near the end of the 27th chapter of St. Matthew: "And behold! the veil of the temple was rent," &c.

The ideal Christian Church, which takes so prominent a part in the action in the Matthew-Passion, we do not find here characterized as such. The great drama, which depicts the end of the Lord and Saviour, passes before us in essentially the simple form which the Evangelist has given it. It is simply the Gospel, which it is the object of this Church music to announce to us.

But the great master, who wrote his sacred works from the point of view of a believing, pious Christian heart, may well have considered, that on the one hand the long drawn Gospel recitatives might have a wearisome effect on the listening congregation, while on the other hand the occasional Choruses and Arias, with all the splendor of instrumental effect and the declamation of the singers, might easily give to the Church music too much of a concert character. To avoid monotony, the connected musical pieces between the recitatives were necessary. But at the same time, to secure the church-like character of the work, and to bring the entire music belonging to the liturgical part of the service of that time nearer to the congregation present, he made use of the Chorales. The listening congregation was also to have an opportunity to join in the song. Unfortunately we have no information as to how far this purpose of the composer was carried out in practice. When we read in the work of Rochlitz "Für Freunde der Tonkunst" (Vol. 4, page 448), that Bach's way of treating the Passion found a living participation in the congregation, so that the performance of such an Oratorio always became really an edifying Art Feast for the town, we may take it for granted as certain, that he reached this end especially through the coöperation of the Choral song.

This semi-dramatic way of treating a religious subject was no invention of Bach's own. Apart from the fact that such performances were known in the churches of Italy, from the very first beginning of the Opera, and were even presented in costume (for example the religious drama, "L'anima e corpo," by Emilio del Cavaliere, performed in the year 1600 in the Church della Valicella at Rome); apart too from the Passion processions and Passion plays, which were introduced in many parts of Germany at a very early period, and which are still customary in certain places, showing the old traditional tendency to dramatize the sufferings of the Lord at Easter time,—various attempts had been made by Bach himself to bring the Passion vividly before us in this half dramatic manner through the aid of song. There the acting persons, the choruses, and the ideal church or congregation were treated in a matter altogether like that which we find in Bach, and even the employment of the chorale had found its place in precisely the same way as with him. The Passion-musics, like the church Cantatas, formed a part of the liturgy of the Lutheran divine service. On Good Friday, even in the smallest church, the history of the Passion of Christ was represented musico-dramatically, or oratorically, according to the means at hand.

In Leipzig the performance, at the time of Bach, alternated between the St. Thomas and the St. Nicolai church, which does not seem to have been the case before. Moreover these performances were made known to the public by printed announcements.

Bach had found the general form of this great Art work, essentially, ready to his hands. To him it was reserved to ennoble it, to develop it to the highest perfection. . . .

The division of the work into two parts indicates that it was designed to be performed one part before, one after the preaching on Good Friday.

The Gospel narrative itself is treated in a simple Recitative form and assigned to the Tenor. The persons there introduced as speaking (Christ, Peter, Pilate, his maid, the servants of the High Priest) are placed directly in the action. So too we find the choruses of the Jews and Priests, as they occur in the Gospel, dramatized in characteristic manner. In all these respects there is a certain corresponding treatment between this work and the Matthew-Passion. But here all is simpler, more easily comprehended. Neither in length of time nor in the general intentions of the whole are certain limits of organic form exceeded.

This shows itself not merely in the arrangement of the poem, but also in its musical treatment. We know of comparative estimates of the two works, in which the simpler character of the St. John-Passion and the richer moulding of the music to the St. Matthew are set in contrast on the ground of the internal characteristics of the two Evangelists. To declare such a supposition unconditionally wrong in a man like Bach, would certainly be very bold.

Yet it can hardly be assumed that the great outward difference between the two works is to be ascribed to this inward difference of character. Eminent as Bach's gift of conception and power of presentation were, he had not, we may well believe, when he wrote the St. John Passion, yet attained to the height, to the great combination of all the means, by which he could excite our admiration, nay astonishment in the later, so much greater work. But this anticipatory judgment is not meant to take from the just appreciation of the work now before us.

It begins with a chorus executed in grand style.

a. THE INTRODUCTORY CHORUS.

This chorus, founded on the words of the Psalmist; "Lord, our God, whose glory is in all the lands, show us by thy Passion," etc., forms an introduction of a general, religious, Christian purport. It is the prayer for a true faith, which would fain be strengthened and confirmed by a realization of the sufferings of the Lord.

In its place stood formerly the Chorale: "O man, bewail thy sins so great." Bach, in his last revision of the work, has taken this away from here, and transferred it to the close of the first part of the Matthew-Passion, where it produces such a sublime effect. In its place we have the present chorus.

In it, besides that perfect contrapuntal and harmonic treatment, such as always flows from Bach's pen, that intrinsic worth which becomes the serious grandeur of the solemnity, we also find the fine traits of symbolical meaning not despised, by which the great master thought to make the beginning of the history of the Lord's suffering present to our minds.

Above the bass moving in short connected notes upon an organ point, and the orchestra of stringed instruments preparing in an earnest figure for the choral song of praise and thanks, rises a mournful melody. Long, sustained tones of flutes and oboes meet above the heaving masses of tone. They begin their mournful song anew with the entrance of the chorus, which, after three brief and strongly marked exclamations of "Lord, Lord," proceeds in a brilliant, but thoroughly earnest figure to extol the majesty of the Lord. Unlimited and infinite, it seems to swell and roar around us, and lift us on the rising flood. The praise of the Lord resounds in strains which mirror the gloomy character of the approaching action. Above them that funereal hymn of flutes and oboes sounds on. Only twice, at the words: "that Thou the true Son of God," do the lamenting instruments take up for a moment the figured movement of the stringed quartet. It is impossible to hear this chorus without deeply feeling in one's inmost soul, how mightily the conflict, the wrestling of the majesty of the Son of God with the sufferings ordained to him, is prepared; how under the superb structure of this hymn of praise the serious tragedy begins, of which the master will bring before our eyes the full development.

As in the orchestra he carries the antitheses through to the very limits of the attainable, so also in the treatment of the chorus we remark traits of individual mastery, such as are only found in Bach. We know that he wrote this chorus after the Matthew-Passion was finished, and after he had transferred to that the chorale originally intended for the introduction to this. The theme of the hymn of praise breaks off after 12 measures, to pass over into another theme fugue-like in its treatment, which repeats itself later in the words: "Show us through Thy Passion."

No one, who knows the two Passions of Bach, will hear this theme without being at once reminded, with all the difference of melody and contrapuntal working, of the "Let Him be crucified" in the Matthew-Passion. Bach certainly has not set these words just so and not otherwise without a definite purpose. As the peculiar structure of the whole work, to which he afterwards prefixed this chorus, did not allow the use of other more extensive means of preparing the hearers in a right earnest, vivid manner for the history of our Lord's sufferings, he was obliged to let the image of the cross appear before the eyes of the multitude at once, beforehand, through the character he lent to this theme. He has taken from the work a masterpiece in withdrawing the Chorale. But in this chorus he has known how to replace it by another masterpiece which surely is its peer.

b. THE RECITATION OF THE GOSPEL.

After the introductory chorus, begins at once the recitation of the Gospel. The recitations throughout are simple, accompanied only by the organ and the fundamental bass. In the noblest style, declaimed in strict observance of the word sound, its cantilena seldom, and only at some marked suggestion of the text, passes into the arioso element, and into that sort of musical painting so peculiar to Bach. For example, at the repetition of the words of Jesus: "The cup which my Father hath given me, Shall I not drink it?" So too in the long-drawn mournful melodic phrases of the twice repeated words of Peter: "And wept bitterly;" then at the words of Christ: "Then would my servants fight;" but above all, at the narrative of the Evangelist: "Then Pilate took Jesus and scourged Him," in which Bach gives free play to his pictorial bent in a long drawn figure over the sharply marked bass. The musical rendering of our Lord's words is not distinguished from the rest of the Recitative. It remains all the time in pure, simple Recitative style.

(To be Continued).

Handel's "Semi-Religious Oratorios."

[From the Orchestra, Nov. 19.]

November and December are the months for the winter campaign in choral music, when Handel and his oratorios are specially in the ascendant. We say "Handel and his oratorios," although after those of the Messiah and the Israel it would be difficult to point out any other certain of being heard in the course of the season. Handel, for about a quarter of a century, gave unbrokenly twelve grand oratorio performances, year after year, and it was by these and not his operatic speculations that he realized the thousands he bequeathed at his death. That oratorio nights with the Harmonic Society in Exeter Hall have not always proved successful in a pecuniary regard, has arisen from the fact that this honorable society has not followed in the wake of the great composer who established the fashion in this country. The Harmonic Society insists upon giving the whole of the particular oratorio—good, bad and indifferent—and nothing but the oratorio. Handel, on the contrary, gave his oratorios with "additions" and "shortenings," with one, two, and even three concertos on the organ, Italian songs interspersed here and there—opportunities to show off Mme. Cuzzoni (who in those days of comparative economy received £2000 for her annual engagement), Signoras Francesciana, Frazzi, Strada, Faustina, and his many other great stars in the dramatic sphere. Nor was he at all particular in what he called an oratorio. Hercules in some of his odd labors figured with him as a character sufficiently obedient to the gods to be classed as the heroic-religious personage worthy of being admitted with the old biblical heroes into the mystic circle; and even Semele, who jilted Athamas, her betrothed, for the more mighty Jove, and disappeared in a cloud of smoke for her vanity and impudence, was cast "after the manner of an oratorio." The Harmonic Society occasionally patronize Samson and Solomon, Judas and Joshua, but steadfastly decline to meddle with either Semele or Hercules. Upon the same principle it sets on one side the ever-living ode of John Dryden—the Alexander's Feast, and the not less entertaining, although more lowly and simple, Acis and Galatea of John Gay. Until all the professedly religious oratorios of Handel have been made familiar to the music loving public, perhaps it may be thought unnecessary for the society to relax the strict rule in this regard—that of eschewing the mythologies. Still an exception might be made for the wonderful oratorio or serenata of Semele, because so great and so short, and requiring so little of "shortening," and possibly nothing in the way of addition. The tale of Semele points a moral, and the Formosa of Thebes in the hands of Handel can be listened to with profit and never without interest. Semele is about to be married to Prince Athamas, and the drama commences with an august wedding ceremonial.

Cadmus, her father, King of Thebes, consults the priests, and the priests consult the oracle; but Jupiter, who has seen the young beauty, and decided upon quite another thing than that of marriage with her betrothed, directs the oracle to portend the direst mischief from the alliance, compels the king to change his mind, and put an end to the ceremony. Meanwhile the autocrat of Olympus has prepared a sweet little spot of his own for the reception of the young lady, and has her supernaturally conveyed into the lone paradise. He prefers his suit, and Athamas is forgotten; the god is too strong for frail mortality; Semele has everything she can desire; curiosity cannot suggest more than that which surrounds her. But Jupiter has a wife, who has not been unobservant of these doings, and assuming the shape of Semele's sister, the innocent Iphigeneia, goes to the sequestered bower, and talks over the event with the unsuspecting happy one. Semele is induced to request the mighty Jove to appear in all his true majesty, and no words of remonstrance on his part can lead her to forego the request. He does so, and the poor girl is burnt to a cinder. The moral is plain; young ladies must not resign their solemn engagements for pretty bowers, sweet isles, and the soft speeches of middle-aged gentlemen. The theme tickled Handel much; it fell in with his own heart; for he had, it is said, been treated in much the same fashion when about the age of Athamas. The scenes are all drawn out with a most masterly hand; the choral effects superb; the recitatives, grand; the supernatural portrayed in his best way, and the songs in his finest style, some indeed, not to be surpassed. The serenata of Acis and Galatea, noble and varied as it is, and inimitable in its own way, is not so large or so highly wrought as the Semele. Handel was in his fifty-eighth year when he penned the latter, and age had not touched his imaginative power, but long experience had given him a terseness and condensation of expression not to be found in the earlier serenata. There are no unmeaning recitatives, and the chief portion of the declaimed dialogue is beyond measure fine.

Handel of course lengthened its performance by his organ concerto playing, which he introduced here and there in all his oratorios without reference to the action of his drama. In these days the Handel concerto for the organ in such situations will not do. The enormous orchestra, so bright, brilliant, massive, and contrasted, would deaden the ear to anything that could be heard from the organ, which at best is but a miserable imitation of the orchestra. There is, however, an inexhaustible mine of orchestral music to be found in the overtures to Handel's operas; and many a sleepy point in the Handelian drama might be enlivened by the interpolation of one of these short and energetic symphonies. The practice would only be an adaptation of the Handelian principle—please the audience at all risks.

He relieved his hearers in the Israel with his best Italian sopranos in some of his best Italian arias; and on one occasion, when the organ had become somewhat too familiar, introduced the violin concerto played by the Paganini of his day. We may be sure that Handel—if now living—would only live for one thing—to fill Exeter Hall: and fill it he would by cutting and clipping, adding and contrasting, playing himself, and getting others to play, drafting in Italian vocalists with English, in short attempting everything until he had accomplished his purpose. We now hear so little of Handel's semi-religious oratorios, because it is insisted that the audience shall listen to them just as the composer left them. Handel never left them alone; he was ever changing, and trying after new points and new effects. Imagine him the present director of his great choral works, and the knife would ever be in his hand, the red pencil ready between his lips. He well knew that although the public liked grand choruses, they liked much better great singers in grand songs. He paid one of his tenor vocalists as much as £4000 for the season, and high prices for high singers was no novelty in his time. The songs remain, although both composer and vocalist have departed. Why not make use of them?

Why not excise the dragging, unmeaning, and useless declamation, the silly by-play, the nothing but old-fashioned passage, the weak chorus, and insert, as the composer did, the song and chorus and instrumental piece that never tire. "See the conquering hero comes" was not written for the Judas, nor the "Dead March" for the Saul. Both are translations from other oratorios; and that which Handel thought good to do cannot be reprehensible as a principle. Samson and Solomon tire, not from the great points lying in these works, but from the utterly faded character of scenes altogether without interest, and quite unconnected with the real story. No one wants them, no one could miss them. The musician dislikes them, the amateur runs away from them. Why offend both from the wish to preserve a rule Handel himself never recognized? Why destroy the chance of success, and keep back the unknown and priceless jewels of the author by playing and singing what he himself would tear up and put into the fire? When are we to hear the Belshazzar or the Athaliah, if this law is to be kept? What is to become of the Theodora and the Susanna, the Joseph and the Alexander Balus? The Athaliah—written for Oxford and Oxford Dons—is a marvellously fresh work even as it stands; it brought him a heap of money at Oxford, which he took, and the offer of a Doctor's degree, which he would not take. But grand and pleasing as is this oratorio, it cannot stand alongside of the Susanna or the Theodora in high tragic interest, nor in closeness of thought and expression. Handel was a much stronger man in 1748 than he was in 1733. Three score years had told off their summers, and his bright brown hair had turned to silver; but his power of original conception, his inspired grasp of the situation, remained with him, and his modes of using all that mind and feeling taught him had culminated to the utmost pitch of perfection.

If Handel could give twelve oratorio performances annually for a full quarter of a century, it is not too much to imagine the same thing could be done now with the music he has left, and with a certainty of pecuniary success provided his rule be adopted of relieving the drama of what does not tell, by shortenings, by additions, by songs by great vocalists, instrumental movements by a fine band, and, if necessary, the solo by the last new foreigner. Where there was one listening amateur in Handel's day there are now a hundred—nay, five hundred; and the great things of the composer are now so grandly given that their effects are felt on all sides. He only requires the same chances he seized upon for himself to keep his position as the greatest oratorio composer the world has ever seen.

Ruth.

[From the "Pall Mall Gazette," Nov. 18.]

The "Sacred Pastoral" heard in Exeter Hall last night was produced at the Hereford Festival of 1867, and condemned with unanimity. Herr Goldschmidt, the composer, moved perhaps by the force of criticism, thereupon amended his work and took it to Hamburg, in which place, and by a select audience, it was received with favor. Ruth might have made a triumphal progress through the German towns (being in accordance with the present foggy state of German music), but Herr Goldschmidt seems to have hankered after homage from the British Mordecai. Hence the performance of last night.

It is due to Herr Goldschmidt to say something about the revised Ruth; as, however, general observations will meet the circumstances of the case, we shall avoid criticism in detail. The libretto calls for but one remark, which is, that it tells the story in an extremely matter-of-fact way. Every one must admit the Biblical narrative to be made charming and life-like by the minuteness of its particulars. But, for musical purposes, the minuteness stands in the way. In treating such a story the composer cannot venture upon pro-Raphaelite detail without an inartistic result. It is well enough to read of all that took place in the harvest-field, or at the gate of Bethlehem; but in Ruth these particulars have an effect which may compare for tediousness with the recitatives supplied to Handel by Dr. Morell. An Oratorio, however dramatic, is not a drama, and, having no action, requires no filling in, that action may run smoothly. Failing to see this, Herr Goldschmidt has encumbered his libretto with narrative, which appears to have given him some trouble, and is by no means handled successfully. There are a few examples in Ruth of the form of recitative which served the purpose of Handel and Mendelssohn; but Herr Goldschmidt has used most the elaborately accompanied declamation of the "advanced school." Undoubtedly, this system of employing the orchestra to enforce the meaning of every sentence is capable of great effects—witness the accompanied dialogue of Mendelssohn's Antigone, Œdipus, Athalie, &c.—but the judgment and skill of a master are required to produce them. In our opinion Herr Goldschmidt has signally failed. As an example of the way in which his recitatives are made, take the long series headed, "In the house of Naomi:"—introduction eleven bars; voice, one bar; interlude, four bars; voice, two bars; interlude, eight bars; and so on. When to this we add that Herr Goldschmidt's orchestral episodes are neither apposite nor interesting, it will be understood what weariness the recitatives of Ruth bring with them. It very often happens that the real weakness of a composer is his fancied strength, and Herr Goldschmidt's seems to be a case in point. He so evidently prides himself on his mastery of the orchestra, that we wonder Ruth did not appear as an oratorio without words. Wherever possible, and often where it would have struck any one else as impossible, the composer has put in an orchestral episode; so that the story, instead of marching steadily on, halts every few minutes while Herr Goldschmidt plays an inappropriate tune. This, in conjunction with the treatment of his recitatives, forms the most remarkable feature of the composer's work. But there are other remarkable features upon which it gives us no greater pleasure to dwell. Herr Goldschmidt, for example, has paid little regard to form in laying out his movements. We can hardly point to a single number in which there is an attempt at symmetrical development. The composer probably reckons this a merit, as showing an accordance with modern ideas regarding the musical treatment of narrative. But till the canons of art established or sanctioned by great masters have been authoritatively set aside, Herr Goldschmidt must be judged by them. We need not, however, insist upon this point. It is enough to observe the incessant changes of theme, time, and key; and to feel the restlessness they induce. Were there no canons of art to violate, censure would follow in this case as an inevitable thing. We might speak of other matters kindred to the foregoing, because arising out of the same fundamental notions; but enough has been said to show that Ruth cannot please those who accept the acknowledged masterpieces of its kind. As already stated, any criticism of the music in detail would be superfluous. The public are not likely to be deceived into loving what is bad in Herr Goldschmidt's handiwork. If poor melody, doubtful counterpoint, and unpleasing progressions be found there—and they are—it must be said that these things honestly exhibit their colors. If it be asked,—are there any merits in Ruth to set against these defects?—we answer, Undoubtedly; but they cannot be generalized; and, if catalogued, it would be necessary to make out also a list of particulars on the other side, for which we have no space. An Academy student could hardly write an oratorio utterly devoid of beauty. The theory of chances would be against him. Ruth, it must be remembered, is the production of a whilom Academy vice-principal.

With reference to the foregoing strictures, we must point out once more the rapid spread of that modern musical heresy which has Herr Wagner for its apostle. The thing crops up everywhere, and is doing infinite mischief—often, perhaps, by unconscious agency. Herr Goldschmidt may repudiate Wagner, but the structure of Ruth shows that the Wagnerian theory has influenced him. To that theory we are indebted for Herr Goldschmidt's neglect of form, his exaltation of the orchestra, and his superabundance of vague declamation. It may be that so it we are even indebted for Ruth itself. Wagnerism makes easy the apotheosis of inferior composers. They have only to be crude and unintelligible to be gods.

But for the fog, Ruth would have had a crowded audience; and not even the dangers of the streets prevented a large gathering—attracted doubtless by the re-appearance of Mme. Goldschmidt. Reappearances are, in many quarters, looked upon unfavorably when the artist has no chance of sustaining the reputation made in earlier days. With this view we are not at all disposed to quarrel; nevertheless, it must be pointed out that those who require an apology for Mme. Goldschmidt's revenue can easily obtain satisfaction. As a wife who came forward to do her best on behalf of the artistic reputation of her husband, she enjoys perfect immunity from blame, if she do not deserve something more. Mme. Gold-schmidt's appearance in the orchestra was hailed with general and hearty applause, which, moreover, attended all her efforts throughout the evening. We desire to speak of the singing of her who was once Jenny Lind in the spirit with which the audience heard it. They recognized and honored a great artist, and the severest critic must admit, with us, that a great artist was plainly manifest. The other soloists were Mme. Patey, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Santley, each of whom, as well as the composer and conductor, came in for a share of the applause so bountifully dispensed at every "first performance." With regard to the success of the work, it must be granted that a large portion of the audience seemed more or less pleased with everything. Certain movements, however, obtained special favor. These were neither Herr Goldschmidt's pretentious choruses, nor his songs, ("Commit thy way," sung by Mme. Patey, excepted), but rather such quiet efforts as the semi-chorus, "Blessed are they that mourn," the duet, "The Lord recompense thy work," and the trio, "The Lord is thy keeper." It was no fault of the audience that these were heard but once. The final air and chorus, "O Lord, I will praise Thee," evoked more than the usual demonstrations; and as far as applause goes, Ruth was a success. For all this however, we are not likely to hear it again. Great pains must have been taken with the performance, and Herr Goldschmidt fairly deserves congratulation upon the way he made the chorus—which, with the band, filled the orchestra—sing his sometimes perplexing, often unvocal music.

Voices.

[From the Saturday Review.]

Far before the eyes or the mouth or the habitual gesture, as a revelation of character, is the quality of the voice and the manner of using it. It is the first thing that strikes us in a new acquaintance, and it is one of the most unerring tests of breeding and education. There are voices which have a certain truthful ring about them—a certain something, unforced and spontaneous, that no training can give. Training can do much in the way of making a voice, but it can never compass more than a bad imitation of this quality; for the very fact of its being an imitation, however accurate, betrays itself like rouge on a woman's cheek, or a wig, or dyed hair. On the other hand, there are voices which have the jar of falsehood in every tone, and that are as full of warning, as the croak of the raven or the hiss of the serpent. There are in general the naturally hard voices, which make themselves caressing, thinking by that to appear sympathetic; but the fundamental quality strikes through the overlay, and a person must be very dull indeed who cannot detect the pretence in that slow, drawling, would-be-affectionate voice, with its harsh undertone and sharp accent whenever it forgets itself. But, without being false or hypocritical, there are voices which puzzle as well as disappoint us, because so entirely inharmonious with the appearance of the speaker. For instance, there is that thin treble squeak we sometimes hear from the mouth of a well-grown portly man, when we expected the fine rolling utterance which would have been in unison with his outward seeming; and, on the other side of the scale, where we looked for a shrill head voice or a tender musical cadence, we get that hoarse chest voice with which young and pretty girls sometimes startle us. In fact, it is one of the characteristics of the modern girl of a certain type; just as the habitual use of slang is characteristic of her, or that peculiar rounding of the elbows and turning out of the wrists, which are gestures that, like the chest voice, instinctively belong to men only, and have to be learnt and practised by women.

Nothing betrays so much as the voice, save perhaps the eyes, and they can be lowered, and so far the expression hidden. In moments of emotion no skill can hide the fact of disturbed feeling, though a strong will and the habit of self-control can steady the voice when else it would be failing and tremulous. But not the strongest will, nor the largest amount of self-control, can keep it natural as well as steady. It is deadened, veiled, compressed, like a wild creature tightly bound and unnaturally still. One feels that it is done by an effort, and that if the strain were relaxed for a moment the wild creature would burst loose in rage or despair, and the voice would break out into the scream of passion or quiver away into the falter of pathos. And this very effort is as eloquent as if there had been no holding down at all, and the voice had been left to its own impulse unchecked. Again, in fun and humor, is it not the voice that is expressive, even more than the face? The twinkle of the eye, the hollow in the under lip, the dimples about the mouth, the play of the eyebrows, are all aids certainly; but the voice! The mellow tone that comes into the utterance of one man, the surprised accents of another, the fatuous simplicity of a third, the philosophical acquiescence of a fourth, when relating the most outrageous impossibilities, the voice and manner peculiarly Transatlantic, and indeed one of the Yankee forms of fun—do we not know all these varieties by heart? have we not veteran actors whose main point lies in one or other of these varieties? and what would be the drollest anecdote if told in a voice which had neither play nor significance? Pathos too—who feels it, however beautifully expressed so far as words may go, if uttered in a dead and wooden voice without sympathy? But the poorest attempts at pathos will strike home to the heart if given tenderly and harmoniously. And just as certain popular airs of mean association can be made into church music by slow time and stately modulation, so can dead-level literature be lifted into passion or softened into sentiment by the voice alone.

We all know the effect, irritating or soothing, which certain voices have over us; and we have all experienced that strange impulse of attraction or repulsion which comes from the sound of the voice alone. And generally, if not absolutely always, the impulse is a true one, and any modification which increased knowledge may produce is never quite satisfactory. Certain voices grate on our nerves and set our teeth on edge; and others are just as calming as these are irritating, quieting us like a composing draught, and setting vague images of beauty afloat in our brains. A good voice, calm in tone, and musical in quality, is one of the essentials for a physician; the "bed side voice" which is nothing, if it is not sympathetic by constitution. Not false, not made up, not sickly, but tender in itself, of a rather low pitch, well modulated, and distinctly harmonious in its notes, it is the very opposite of the orator's voice, which is artificial in its management, and a made voice. Whatever its original quality may be, the orator's voice bears the unmistakable stamp of art and becomes artificiality; as such it may be admirable—telling in a crowd, impressive in an address—but overwhelming and chilling at home, partly because it is always conscious and never self-forgetting. An orator's voice, with its careful intonation and accurate accent, would be as much out of place by a sick bed as court trains and brocaded silk for the nurse. There are certain men who do a good deal by a hearty, jovial, fox-hunting kind of voice—a voice a little thrown up for all that it is a chest voice—a voice with a certain undefined rollick and devil-may-care sound in it, and eloquent of a large volume of vitality and physical health. That, too, is a good property for a medical man. It gives the sick a certain flip, and reminds them pleasantly of health and vigor; it may have a mesmeric effect upon them—who knows?—and induce in them something of its own state, provided it is not overpowering. But a voice of this kind has a tendency to become insolent in its assertion of vigor; swaggering and boisterous; and then it is too much for invalided nerves, just as mountain winds or sea breezes would be too much, and the scent of flowers or a hayfield oppressive. The clerical voice, again, is a class voice; that neat, careful, precise voice, neither wholly made nor yet quite natural; a voice which never strikes one as hearty or as having a really genuine utterance, but which yet is not unpleasant if one does not require too much spontaneity. The clerical voice with its mixture of familiarity and oratory, as that of one used to talk to old women in private, and to hold forth to a congregation in public, is as distinct in its own way as the mathematician's handwriting; and any one can pick out blindfold his man from a knot of talkers, without waiting to see the square-cut collar and close white tie. The legal voice is different again; but this is rather a variety of the orator's than a distinct species—a variety standing midway between that and the clerical, and affording more scope than either.

The voice is much more indicative of the state of the mind than many people know of or allow. One of the first symptoms of failing brain power is in the indistinct or confused utterance: no idiot has a clear or melodious voice; the harsh scream of mania is proverbial; and no person of prompt and decisive thought was ever known to hesitate or to stutter. A thick, loose, fluffy voice, too, does not belong to the crisp character of mind which does the best active work; and when we meet with a keen-witted man who draws, and lets his words drip instead of bringing them out in the sharp incisive way that would be natural to him, we may be sure there is a flaw somewhere, and that he is not what the Americans call "clear gri" and "whole-souled" all through. We all have our company voices, as we all have our company manners, and we get to know the company voices of our friends after a time, and to understand them as we understand their best dresses and state service. The person whose voice absolutely refuses to put itself into company tone startles us as much as if he came to a state dinner in a shooting jacket. This is a different thing from the insincere and flattering voice, which is never laid aside while it has its object to gain, and which affects to be one thing when it means another. The company voice is only a little bit of finery, quite in its place if not carried into the home, where, however, silly men and women think they can impose on their house-mates by assumptions which cannot stand the test of domestic ease. The lover's voice is of course sui generis; but there is another kind of voice which one hears sometimes that is quite as enchanting—the rich, full, melodious voice which irresistibly suggests sunshine and flowers, and heavy bunches of purple grapes, and a wealth of physical beauty at all four corners. Such a voice as Alboni's: such a voice we can conceive Anacreon's to have been; with less lasciviousness and more stateliness, such a voice was Walter Savage Landor's. His was not an English voice; it was too rich and accurate; and yet it was clear and apparently thoroughly unstudied. Ars celare artem, perhaps; there was no greater treat of its kind than to hear Landor read Milton or Homer. Though one of the essentials of a good voice is its clearness, there are liars and catches that are very pretty, though never dignified; but most of them are exceedingly painful to the ear. It is the same with accents. A dash of brogue, the faintest suspicion of the Scotch twang, even a very little American accent—but very little, like red pepper to be sparingly used, as indeed we may say with the others—gives a certain piquancy to the voice. So does a Continental accent generally, few of us being able to distinguish the French accent from the German, the Polish from the Italian, or the Russian from the Spanish, but lumping them all together as "a foreign accent" broadly. Of all the European voices the French is perhaps the most unpleasant, and the Italian the most delightful. The Italian voice is a song in itself, not the sing-song voice of an English parish schoolboy, but an unnoted bit of harmony. The French voice is thin, apt to become wiry and metallic; a head voice for the most part, and eminently unsympathetic; a nervous, irritable voice, that seems more fit for complaint than for love-making; and yet how laughing, how bewitching it can make itself!—never with the Italian roundness, but ad libitum in its own half pettish way, provoking, enticing, arousing. There are some voices send you to sleep, and others that stir you up; and the French voice is of the latter kind when setting itself to do mischief and work its own will. Of all the differences lying between Calais and Dover, perhaps nothing strikes the traveller more than the difference in the national voice and manner of speech. The sharp, high pitched, strident voice of the French, with its clear accent and neat intonation, is exchanged for the loose, fluffy utterance of England, where clear enunciation is considered pedantic; where brave men cultivate a drawl, and pretty women a deep chest voice; where well-educated people think it no shame to run all their words into each other, and to let consonants and vowels drip out like so many drops of water, with not much more distinction between them; and where no one knows how to educate his organ artistically, without going into artificiality and affectation. And yet the cultivation of the voice is an art, and ought to be made as much a matter of education as a good carriage or a legible handwriting. We teach our children to sing, but we never teach them to speak beyond correcting a glaring piece of mispronunciation or so; in consequence of which we have all sorts of odd voices among us—short yelping voices like dogs, purring voices like cats, croakings, and lipings, and quackings, and chattering; a very menagerie in fact, to be heard in a room ten feet square, where a little rational cultivation would have reduced the whole of that vocal chaos to order and harmony, and made what is now painful and distasteful beautiful and seductive.

Mendelssohn.

By EDUARD DEVRIENT.*

A complete study of Mendelssohn, a study that would present to us, at one and the same time, the man and the artist, so intimately connected in his person, is something still to be written: we have scarcely begun to store up materials for it.

Among the collection of writings already made there is only one which deserves mention: the correspondence of the composer when on his travels, a correspondence published some years since. But another work to which I attach at least equal value has just appeared. It is a volume entitled My Reminiscences of Mendelssohn Bartholdy, by Eduard Devrient.

* From "La France Musicale."

The testimony contained in it is worth preserving. The author, as most people are aware, is descended from a family of dramatic artists who have been the pride of the German stage. Herr Eduard Devrient has fairly done his part to increase the glory of the name he bears; he has been, in succession, a good singer, a good actor, a tolerable dramatic author, and an excellent theatrical critic. In his retirement at Carlsruhe, he devotes the time not taken up by his official duties as manager to writing a History of the German Stage. The first three volumes have already appeared.

Herr Devrient's reminiscences go back to Mendelssohn's early boyhood. When Herr Devrient was received into the house of Herr Mendelssohn, senr., the latter's son was only thirteen, and Herr Devrient himself, though already a baritone at the Berlin Opera House, was not more than twenty.

It was, strange to say, the banker's eldest daughter who procured the singer's admission to her father's house. She was attending the course of study at the Academy of Singing, and had formed a friendship there with Herr Devrient's future wife. The intimacy between the two young ladies was the cause of Herr Devrient's being admitted to the parties given by the rich banker, and being invited to the Sunday Musical Matinees, when the precocious compositions of the son of the house were performed.

The boy himself conducted the performance of his works. Seated upon a raised cushion, young Felix was totally absorbed in his task. He governed singers and musicians with an easy, serious, and eager air. At the age of thirteen he had already written three operettas, and was engaged on an opera of greater proportions. The fact of seeing so many older persons ranged under his sceptre, did not, however, excite inordinately his boyish vanity. The sentiment predominating above all others in his breast was the pleasure of writing music, and the desire of acquiring knowledge. Immediately a piece was over, the little conductor always quickly put away the scorn before receiving the congratulations of his audience.

The father felt the danger to which he was exposing his boy, and took measures to combat the disastrous influence of these premature drawing-room successes. The son of Mendelssohn, the celebrated philosopher, he was himself a sensible man, endowed with a sure judgment and lofty character, and always exercised a salutary influence on the intellectual and moral development of young Felix. But he was not the person who discovered the boy's musical tendencies; it was the mother. From the day they were remarked, nothing was neglected to foster them, and the care of doing so was confided to Zelter, and to Berger—to professors who were masters of their art. When Mendelssohn had essayed his powers in a few compositions of some importance, his father, who shrank from no expense, placed at his disposal an orchestra comprising some of the best artists of the Royal Chapel. He thus furnished the young composer with a valuable opportunity of becoming acquainted with the nature and effect of each instrument and of calculating the harmonic value of his works.

The Musical Matinees, which were not, as might be supposed, devoted exclusively to the music of the son of the house, were attended by those members of the high society of Berlin who prided themselves upon their intellectual superiority. Among them were the celebrated Rachel, the wife of Varnhagen, and Heinrich Heine. If I mention these two names, instead of so many others worthy of being recorded, it is because there is a peculiarity of Mendelssohn's otherwise connected with them. Neither of these two persons of whom he made so much excited any interest in him; he was never attracted by women with literary pretensions, and the used up ways of Heine inspired him with a kind of aversion. One day, when they were talking of Jean Paul, for whom Mendelssohn professed a feeling of admiration very natural at his age, Heine said, in the nonchalant tone he had adopted: "What is Jean Paul? A man who never saw the sea!"

"That is true," replied young Felix, "he had no uncle Solomon to pay his travelling expenses for him."

This was just what Heinrich Heine's uncle had done for him. But if Mendelssohn cared nothing for Heine, all the greater, on the other hand, was the interest he took in Herr Eduard Devrient. There was only the difference of a very few years between the two friends, both of whom stood at the commencement of a career consecrated to art. From a frequent interchange of ideas and sentiments, of aspirations and hopes, there sprang up, very naturally, a desire to make a combined essay in an important work, to try their fortune in the same enterprise. They determined to write an opera together. The project was, however, only partially carried out.

Herr Devrient wrote a libretto—Hans Heiling, but did not succeed in pleasing his young colleague. The subject excited no inspiration in Mendelssohn, who found a thousand defects in it; he said that it reminded him too much of Der Freischütz, and sinned too much against probability, which, in his mind, was an imperious condition of every work of art. But Herr Devrient's labor was not thrown away. Marschner did not share Mendelssohn's scruples; he seized on the libretto which the young composer had disdained, and composed that Hans Heiling which is still a stock opera in Germany.

Herr Devrient was greatly disappointed at the failure of this attempt, for he believed in the dramatic powers of his friend. He strikes me as having been mistaken in this particular, for, during his whole artistic career, Mendelssohn never succeeded in writing anything particularly good in the shape of opera. Of his attempts when he was a very young man, The Marriage of Camacho was the only one ever represented in public, and that did not achieve the slightest success. The others, such, for instance, as The Uncle from Boston, which is considered the best, were performed nowhere but in his father's drawing room.

Other dramatic authors were not, however, more successful than Herr Devrient. During eighteen years, Mendelssohn, though always on the look-out, refused all the librettos offered him, and the reader may imagine that their number was large. Not one found grace in his eyes, or, at least, could inspire his fancy, which was evidently somewhat rebellious in this respect. And when at last, tired of seeking any longer, he fixed upon Geibel's Lorelei, and set to work, death came and snatched him from his labor. But, save for this circumstance, would musical literature have been enriched with an opera by Mendelssohn? The answer is doubtful; it is highly probable, on the contrary, that this essay would not have led to anything more than those which preceded it. "Mendelssohn," said Holtei, himself a libretto writer, "was too clever to be pleased with the subject of an opera."

The relations of the two friends towards each other suffered nothing from the ill-success of their first enterprise, and the cordiality of their intercourse was in no wise diminished; nay, they did not dissolve their artistic partnership. Their second venture succeeded better than their first. They have associated their names with one of the most important musical events of the present century, the revival of Bach's Passions-musik, which had fallen into utter oblivion. The performance of this music took place, under Mendelssohn's direction, in the month of March, 1829, which marks a new musical era. Bach's creation was a revelation in the way of sacred music, and it is a curious fact, as Mendelssohn was fond of saying, that the Church should be indebted for it to an actor and a Jew.

Felix was then twenty. Thanks, however, to his taste for bodily exercises, gymnastics, dancing, swimming, and riding he had attained his full physical development. But with unusual muscular vigor, he combined great nervous susceptibility. Anything like lively emotion threw him into transports that excited fears as to his reason. Such fits were followed by a lethargic sleep, which restored his equilibrium thus violently disturbed.

His personal appearance produced a favorable impression, and inspired sympathy at first sight. His features, which bore evidence of his eastern descent, were handsome; his glance especially had an admirable expression in it. There was a great deal of natural timidity about him, and this gave him, in his youth, an embarrassed air, but he lost it after rubbing against the world.

His defects were those of a man who has been an object of adulation from his infancy. Continuous absolute admiration became a necessity of his existence. He was so susceptible in matters of art that he nearly regarded as real enemies all those persons who were in any way reserved with respect to his compositions. He even pushed this feeling so far as to underestimate the real merit of those who had committed no fault but that of being indifferent to his musical powers.*

It was in this same year, 1829, that Mendelssohn made his first trip to England. The young composer, who was also a remarkably fine performer, excited general enthusiasm; musicians he impressed by the pre-eminence of his talent; and men of the world by his fortune, which put him on a level with themselves.

On his return from England, he found Herr Devrient installed in a Gartenhaus belonging to his father, and the intimacy of the two friends was still more strengthened in consequence. The following summer Mendelssohn proceeded to Italy, whence he brought back some highly unfavorable musical impressions. On his return to Berlin, he had the mortification of seeing Runghenhausen preferred to himself as director of the Singacademie. Being vexed at this, he went to Düsseldorf, to assist Immerman in his attempt to regenerate the German stage. The attempt did not succeed, and Mendelssohn separated, on very bad terms, from Immerman. I must, however, state that Herr Devrient has the frankness to confess that most of the blame must be laid on Mendelssohn, who, on this occasion as well as on others, appears to have given way to exaggerated susceptibility.

Shortly afterwards, Mendelssohn fixed his quarters at Leipzig, which became the town of his adoption, for he had a horror of Berlin. It was then that he married Mlle. Cecilia Jeanrenaud, of Frankfurt, and that he was placed at the head of the celebrated Gewandhaus Concerts, which, under his guidance, attained an immensely high reputation. On the accession of Friedrich Wilhelm IV. to the throne, that monarch endeavored to get Mendelssohn back to Berlin; and it was resolved to establish a Conservatory of Music, so that he might be appointed the director. The negotiations came to nothing, but they had at least the good effect of bringing about a reconciliation, to which we owe the music of Antigone, A Midsummer Night's Dream, Athalie, and Edipus Colonus. The performance of these compositions took Mendelssohn frequently to Berlin, but he could never make up his mind to settle there, despite the urgent solicitations of the King. His aversion for the Prussian capital was such that, when Herr Devrient, who had just been appointed stage-manager at the Theatre Royal, Dresden, asked Mendelssohn's advice as to his accepting the post, Mendelssohn answered—"The only question for consideration is—whether you have boxes and portmanteaus enough to contain your things; if not, I have some I can lend you. My dear Edouard, the first step outside Berlin is the first step to happiness."

Mendelssohn was in England for the second time,* when he received, in 1847, the intelligence of the sudden death of his sister Fanny, a lady distinguished for her refined and superior intellectual powers. Shortly after his return to Leipzig, at the commencement of autumn, Mendelssohn, still suffering from the effects of the loss he had sustained, was attacked with acute neuralgic pains, and violent headaches. This illness carried him off in a few days; he succumbed to it on the 4th November, at the age of thirty-nine. On the occasion of his last visit to Berlin, Fanny reproached him with not having spent her birthday with her for years. As he was bidding her good bye, he said; "You may rely on my being with you on the next birthday."

A special train conveyed the body to Berlin, and it was laid, on the 8th of November, near that of his sister, in the family vault. The 8th of November was the anniversary of Fanny's birth. Mendelssohn had kept his word.

Musical Correspondence.

PARIS, NOV. 22 (From a private letter).—Went yesterday afternoon to the Cirque Napoleon to hear Padeloup's Orchestra. They play almost to perfection; a little feeble in the clarinet and obœ, and decidedly so in the horns, but as nearly perfect as need be in other respects. We had a Suite by a certain Marsenet, which was interesting and stupid by turns. Rather inclined to be queer than beautiful. The last movement (alla marcia) was especially full of unexpected freaks of instrumentation. The public seemed to like it though. Next came an Adagio from one of Mozart's Symphonies. Beautifully played and enthusiastically received. Then came my favorite of favorites, that I never expected to hear out of Boston,—Schumann's Genoveva Overture. If the Leonora No. 3 is the king, this is certainly the princess of overtures. Padeloup took the Allegro a trifle fast for my taste, and the horns were almost inaudible in the little passage in triplets that keeps recurring throughout the movement; but the orchestra played con amore, and the public was rapturous. Then we had Beethoven's Symphony in C major, played to absolute perfection and cheered after every movement. The Andante just escaped an encore, and the Scherzo had to be repeated. I never saw so intelligently attentive an audience. In the trio of the Scherzo the whole house laughed, as they would at a Warren farce, as that little crescendo run on the violins led back to the regular beat on the reed instruments. It is something when an audience knows when a joke is meant.

The concert finished with the Tannhäuser Overture. Not so perfectly played as it might have been. The passage where the clarinet comes in with Venus's enticing theme was fearfully shaky. At the end the audience rose like one man and cheered like mad, and it took all Padeloup's generalship in getting the orchestra off the stage to prevent the whole overture from being bissée.

And now I will tell you a true story. When I first went to the opera here, I was struck with the thinness and weakness of the trombones as soon as I heard them. During the entr'acte I noticed that they were the Sax-trombones with cylinders and pistons. I noticed the same weakness in all the operas, but I thought it might be prejudice on my part. Yesterday at the concert I was so placed that I could only see the violins and a few 'celli. When the trombones came in in the Massenet Suite, where, by the way, they have a good deal to do, I said to myself I must for once own up to the Sax-trombones. I never heard such splendid tones in my life. Before the next movement the two men who had been standing up in front of me went away, and I saw three trombones up in the orchestra, all on the old slide pattern. The horns and even the trumpets (!) were without valves in all the classical pieces. It is a significant thing that in Paris, the head-quarters of Sax instruments, they should be the first to go back to the old horns and trumpets. Nevertheless, I admit that, when horns and trombones are so clumsily written for as in the Italian scores, the valve instruments are preferable.
